The mentioned section as it now exists, provides punishment for any person who kills, forcibly resists, opposes, impedes, intimidates or interferes with certain Federal officers, including United States marshals, any officer or employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, post-office inspectors, Secret Service operatives, any officer or enlisted man of the Coast Guard, and so forth, while engaged in the performance of official duties, or any person who kills or assaults any such officer on account of the performance of his official duties. It appears that there is at this time no appropriate Federal statute providing punishment in the case of such an act against an officer or enlisted person of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, or a member of the auxiliary military police of the Army of the United States, while engaged in the performance of official duties, or on account of the performance of official duties. It seems manifest that similar punishment should be provided in case of such attacks against personnel of the military and naval establishments.

Although section 1 provides only for the offense of killing, it is believed that the suggested amendment to that section would also have the effect of extending the scope of section 2 of the act of May 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 781; 18 U. S. C. 254), to cover officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and members of the auxiliary military police of the Army of the United States in the case of resisting, interfering with, or assaulting such personnel while engaged in the performance of official duties or on account of the performance of official duties, as section 2 by reference relates to assaults on all persons of the categories named in section 1, of the act.

The proposed amendment if enacted, will result in little if any, increased cost to the Government.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation for the consideration of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Members of the House that the Department of Defense is now in favor of the principle of this proposed amendment.

Nearly 3,300 Residents of the Twenty-second Congressional District of Pennsylvania Take Part in Newspaper Poll of Public Opinion on Current Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, 3,285 residents of Blair, Centre, and Clearfield Counties, comprising the Twenty-second Congressional District of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor to represent, participated in the newspaper poll conducted by the daily newspapers in that area.

A breakdown of the questionnaires by counties reveals that 933 residents of Blair County, 654 of Clearfield County, and 1,698 of Centre County participated in the poll of public opinion.

The tabulation of the 10 questions representing the views of 3,285 residents of this area follows:

	Yes	No
1. Should we withdraw from Korea immediately?	897	1,998
2. Should we drop the A-bomb now and take chances on Russia doing likewise?	579	2,142
3. Should we release the Chinese Nationalist Army and allow Chiang Kai-shek to wage war on the mainland against the Chinese Reds?	2,259	540
4. Should Red China be admitted to the United Nations?	405	2,880
5. Should we expect foreign nations to supply the bulk of the United Nations armed forces?	2,190	588
6. Should we send American troops to Europe?	1,717	1,452
7. Should we defend our outlying bases with air and sea power and keep our armies at home	1,725	1,164
8. If necessary, should we draft 18-year-olds?	2,220	960
9. Should we have stiff price and wage controls applied at the same time?	2,265	357
10. Should the President's budget of $71,600,000,000 be drastically cut, even if it means the cancellation of local nondefense projects?	2,805	408

NOTE.—Many participants did not answer all questions giving as their reason a lack of sufficient information on the subject to vote intelligently.

A study of the questionnaires discloses that about 25 percent of them were accompanied by explanatory letters either qualifying the vote on the various questions or discussing other subjects of national importance. Many stated that this was the first time they had ever written to their Congressman, and some said they had never realized that their opinions would be welcomed.

A large number of the questionnaires that were accompanied by letters revealed that the conclusions reached followed a family conference or a discussion of the subjects with neighbors. A great many residents voiced their concern over the seriousness of world conditions and their effect on our standard of living, and our future as a nation.

It is significant that not a single letter or questionnaire revealed a belligerent attitude on the part of newspaper readers. While there was constructive criticism expressed regarding some Government departments and individuals, yet the general feeling was to be helpful in our efforts to meet the present crisis.

In thanking all those who returned the questionnaires, and especially the newspapers for their splendid cooperation which made the poll possible, I call attention to the fact that last year in the first poll conducted 1,876 residents took part, compared with 3,285 who participated in this year's poll of public opinion. Such an increase of interest by the readers of the daily papers in this congressional district in the second annual poll is very gratifying.

Parity Is Not a Fair Guide as to What the Farmer Should Get for His Products

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMIE L. WHITTEN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I note those officials in charge of economic stabilization and price control are advocating that parity be frozen so as not to reflect increased costs which are being added to the sale price of what the farmers must buy. Some advocate forcing back to parity farm prices that exceed parity and freezing other farm prices before they reach parity. They would make a sad mistake to undertake any such action. In the first place, parity is not and has never been a definition of a fair price. It was worked out by the Congress as a means of setting a floor or support price on agricultural products to prevent depression and a breakdown in the national economy. The 90 percent of parity which is the support price for basic commodities may well be compared with the minimum wage which at 75 cents per hour is not considered by labor to be a fair price at all but a floor or minimum.

Parity theoretically is supposed to give to the farmers the same comparative purchasing power as they had in the base period 1909 to 1914 but if that be true and if it does give him the same comparative purchasing power with other segments of population such as they had in the base period of 1909 to 1914, at that time the farmer did not have sufficient purchasing power to provide himself with electricity or ordinary conveniences that others had. He did not have the automobiles that other segments of our population had. As a group the average farmer did not have purchasing power with which to provide himself with a home of equal convenience, including even indoor bath facilities to the extent that others had. During the base period it was the exception for the farmer to be able to send his boy or girl to college. Also, in the base period 1909 to 1914 land constituted the farmer's chief investment and in fact was about 70 percent of the value of the farm. If he had his land, he did not need to buy much else in order to farm.

Now, however, the value of the farm shown by recent surveys is about 45 percent land and 55 percent improvements including machinery which must be purchased at a high rate of cost, and in most cases, of short life. In the base period the farmer did not have to buy the very expensive farm equipment now necessary, such as tractors, threshing machines, combines, fertilizer distributors, and the thousand and one things which are absolutely necessary to operate a farm under present conditions, and, with the present labor shortage, such equipment is absolutely essential if he is to maintain his production, much less increase it. In other words, during the base period 1909 to 1914 the farmer did not have to buy these things which must be paid for from the prices he receives and as a matter of fact, on a comparative purchasing basis, at that time he was unable to buy these things which are now more than 50 percent of his investment in the farm. In 1907, shortly before the base period, it would take about 9.7 years for the cost of operations of the average farm to equal the farmer's investment in the farm. Under present conditions, however, it takes only 2.6 years for the annual cost of operations to equal the investment in the farm. In other words his cost of operation can cause him to lose his farm three times as fast now as in the base period. It is true that from the period 1907 to 1947 prices for agricultural products increased nine times, but during the same period the cost of operations increased 14 times. This is shown by surveys.

The point of all this is that if parity would give to the farmer comparative purchasing power with other segments of our population, equal to that on a comparative basis which he had in the base period 1909 to 1914, it would not enable him to in any way meet on the whole the increased demands on such purchasing power which the operation of his farm in our day requires.

All of this is to show that the word "parity" and the basis on which it is set up in no way is a fair guide as to what the farmer should be permitted to get for his products in the market place. In fact 90 percent of parity as has been stated is approximately equivalent to the 75-cent minimum wage. The average wage is around $1.25 an hour and on the same basis farm products to be on a comparative basis would have to be much higher than so-called parity. Some consumer groups may not agree with that. However, the facts that absolutely cannot be overlooked by the Government and those interested in keeping a sound basis for Government operation of balancing supply with demand and to provide a sufficient supply of food is the fact that parity does not include or recognize costs of production. Those fixing parity do not have to, nor do they, take into consideration the farmer's cost. It is also true that those in charge of price control can fix prices without regard to the farmer's cost of production. That does not mean, however, that the farmer is not going to take into consideration such cost. If he is going to hold his farm and avoid bankruptcy he has to consider costs. If he cannot make cost plus a reasonable profit on any given commodity he will turn to another or limit his cultivation to that which is least expensive. There is no need for Government leaders to fool themselves into believing that he will be able to maintain normal production, much less increase his production, because to increase his production beyond his normal production, with present labor shortages and high costs, is to increase the unit cost, especially in view of the present requirements of expensive fertilizers and other materials. Not only does he increase his per-unit cost but he depletes his soil or his farm plant. If, as the price-control authorities are threatening to do, they set out to let the costs of other things go up but prohibit such increased cost being reflected in increased parity or prices received, if they freeze parity they will in effect reduce production when we need increased production.

They can do that under the present law, but they cannot require the farmer to continue to produce at the present level, much less at a higher one.

If there is no money to be made in dairying, many of the dairy herds will be sold and the milk supply will get shorter and shorter. We have seen that in times past. Already it is hard to find labor to do this exacting work, which must be done at all hours of the day and part of the night, 7 days a week. If there is no money to be made in buying feeder cattle and feeding them corn and thereby increasing the supply of beef, the people in the Midwest will quit buying feeder cattle so as to increase the supply of beef or even to maintain it. It is difficult to get sufficient labor to chop and pick the present cotton acreage, and costs are terrific. How are the farmers to increase cotton production? Thus it goes throughout the whole field of farm production. The pressure is already great on the individual farmer to reduce his production because of the shortage of labor, machinery, and fertilizer. In his patriotic desire to meet his obligation the average farmer is trying to not only maintain but increase his production. But there is a limit as to how far he will or can go. He will pull in his production before he will lose money and eventually his farm.

The trouble is that with the increased demands for food for the Army, with the tremendous expenditures of money in national defense, which is giving increased purchasing power to some segments of our Nation, an unusual demand is being made on supplies of foodstuffs.

There is just more demand than there is food, notwithstanding the fact that on the over-all there is a greater production of agricultural products than ever before. This is working a real hardship on people with fixed income. The answer, however, is not to cut down production, which certainly would result from increasing the farmer's cost, but freezing his prices received at a level which would prevent such increased costs being reflected in his market price. The price-control people are given lots of authority under the law. They do not have to recognize cost in fixing price ceilings, but the farmer recognizes it. He is forced to recognize it, and the price-control people are merely sticking their heads in the sand if they do not recognize that fact.

This is no threat that I describe here, but a recognition of realities. I have the honor of serving as chairman of the subcommittee for appropriations handling agricultural appropriations in the House of Representatives. We deal with all agriculture. I am very much interested in agriculture and in the farmers but I, together with many others, felt that we would have all been better off had we frozen everything across the board at the time of the attack in Korea. Prices, wages, rents. We could not get the Congress to take such action. Since this was not done, however, there just is not any way for the Government to let costs of productoin go up, but freeze the price of farm products at a level which prevents taking into consideration such increased cost and then get increased production. If they do that they will reduce production and make a bad situation worse.

The Nation in this instance faces a fact and not a theory. Under our system of free enterprise we have provided by law the authority to freeze prices, but if costs go up, but the selling price stays the same, you will not have the same production, much less the increased production which after all is the only cure for our present difficulties. You may say, "Ration the supplies." That is easier said than done and supplies under that system dwindle rather than increase.

The Secretary of Agriculture has been assigned the task of getting increased farm production. If the Secretary would render real service to the consumers, including you and me, by increasing agricultural production, he must urge recognition of these facts by the stabilization and price-control authorities, and if possible prevent them from taking any such unfortunate action as to let costs go up but not be reflected in the price received.

We cannot have our cake and eat it too. At least, if the price received does not reflect increased cost of production there will be even less cake, and staple groceries as well.

Unity Comes the Hard Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, in the March 17 issue of Collier's magazine there appeared an editorial entitled "Unity Comes the Hard Way." I recommend that it be read by all who are interested in our Nation making a maximum military effort.

The editorial reads as follows:

UNITY COMES THE HARD WAY

It seems a long time ago, but actually it is less than a year and a half since the bitter, intemperate dispute which had rocked the Defense Department for months reached its climax with the firing of Admiral Louis E. Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations. This was the signal that the fancy Dans, as Gen. Omar Bradley christened the supporters of balanced naval power, had lost the theoretical argument over how the next war should be fought. Henceforth, the country's main defense was to be entrusted to strategic bombers.

Well, the next war began on June 25, 1950. It forced the unified armed services to relearn unity the hard way. It brought the military strategists back from theory to reality. And, at the sobering cost of thousands of casualties, it taught them some valuable lessons.

It showed, first of all, that no military group can predict what sort of a war a next war will be unless, perhaps, their government starts it. And the United States does not start wars.

It showed that a country cannot base its military planning on the hope of a quick, easy, one-weapon, one-shot victory. UN air power has been almost unopposed in Korea, yet air power has not won the war. There have been times when, to the embarrassment of neat theory, the UN forces were winning the war in the air and losing it on the ground.

The next war has also demonstrated something that the air-power enthusiasts were inclined to forget: That the moral and political consequences of using atomic weapons can outweigh the strategic value of those weapons.

The champions of strategic bombing criticized the Navy for an exaggerated insistence on the importance of close air support of ground troops. They saw the need of only a convoy Navy to haul men and supplies with Air Force protection. And they favored cutting the Marine Corps to a point near extinction.

The Korean War, and the Inchon invasion in particular, showed the error of that thinking. Even the flush-deck supercarrier, which was scoffed out of its first promise of existence, has been justified and authorized.

In saying this, Collier's in not trying to revive any old arguments. We are not minimizing the great importance of air power or ground power. We are not slighting the brilliance and bravery of the men who have employed those powers in Korea. But we are glad to recall that this magazine opened its pages last year to men like Admiral Denfeld, Rear Adm. Daniel V. Gallery, and Maj. Gen. Merritt A. Edson of the Marines, when their voices were officially silenced. We are glad to have published such articles as We Need Carriers and the B-36, by Richard Tregaskis, at a time when reasonable compromise was not a distinguishing feature of the "Battle of the Pentagon." And we are particularly happy, as all Americans must be, that the disagreements among the high brass had not wrecked the services' morale or seriously damaged their fighting efficiency when the unexpected crisis developed.

Now, in the light of Korea, it seems to us that, as one Marine Corps officer put it, the "fancy Dans" were right. And it might well mean the salvation of freedom that this was found out in time. We would not be so cold-blooded as to call the Korean War a breathing spell. Yet since the threat of general war remains, it is fortunate that our military leaders discovered in a limited war that a flexible, balanced, well-rounded armed force is still needed.

If further fighting breaks out, the aggressor and not the defenders of freedom will again have first choice of where and how it starts. So the free world must do more than exploit its great latent strength over the long haul. It must be ready to meet fresh attacks with versatility and adaptability as well as with power.

Let us hope that these facts, which have been established at such high cost of lives, will not be forgotten by well-meaning but stubborn men in another series of Pentagon squabbles.

Give MacArthur a Free Hand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, this news item which contains a report of Paul C. Smith, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, in connection with the freeing of MacArthur's hands, is very pertinent today. It is time to let a military leader fight the war and not a bunch of international politicians:

THE EDITOR VISITS FRONT IN KOREA—PAUL C. SMITH SAYS MACARTHUR CAN WIN IF HE IS GIVEN FREEDOM TO FIGHT

(By Earnest Hoberecht)

TOKYO, April 4.—Paul C. Smith, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, said today (Wednesday) in an interview that the United Nations forces in Korea can win the war if permitted to attack across the Yalu River into China.

"I think the present forces in Korea can win the war against the Chinese Armies in Korea if they are permitted to liquidate the present military handicaps which result from those directives which prevent them from operating on the other side of the Yalu River," said Smith, who visited North Korea with Gen. Douglas MacArthur Tuesday.

Smith gave his views on the Korean situation after he returned from Korea, where he flew Tuesday with MacArthur. He jeeped 15 miles into North Korea on the east coast with the United Nations commander in chief.

WAR EXPERIENCE

In World War II, Smith served in both the Marines and the Navy. He was a commander in the Navy at the time of the Japanese surrender.

"With our forces in the Orient," he said, "all we need is freedom to conduct a sound military operation."

He explained that this means that "when and if necessary, we knock out the supply lines of the Communist sources of power in Korea by air and sea.

"This means a sea blockade of China and air attacks where required," he pointed out.

"I admit," he said, "there is a calculated risk involved with the possibility of yet another intervention by Russia, but in view of China's repeatedly stated determination to drive us from Korea, it seems to me that anything short of acceptance of that risk will just result in no net gain for the anti-Communist forces of the world.

FREEDOM TO FIGHT

"These anti-Communist forces, of which the UN units in Korea are both the spearhead and the main body must be given freedom to fight as sound military leadership would normally fight or they are being sent to die for a lip service cause with their hands tied behind them."

Smith said he was deeply impressed with General MacArthur, whom he had never met previously.

"General MacArthur suffers only from two things," said Smith. He listed these as his fair-weather friends and his very petty detractors.

Smith said MacArthur suffered less at the hands of his petty detractors "because they really can't touch him much."

Smith said General MacArthur possesses one of the "greatest vocabularies that I have ever encountered."

"And," said Smith, "he impresses me as having even the greater distinction of knowing what every word means."

He expressed complete confidence in MacArthur's leadership.

He paid tribute to the field forces serving under MacArthur.

Smith said that in view of what MacArthur and his fighting men in the field have had to work with, the American people can be grateful as hell to this leader and his men.

Smith said after studying the situation and seeing considerable background material on the situation he was convinced that there has never been at any time a retreat.

TOUGH TERRAIN

He said that sometimes the United Nations forces were outnumbered as high as 20 to 1 and had to fight their way out but they were only fighting in a different direction, as Marine Maj. Gen. O. P. Smith had stated.

"The terrain in Korea is as rotten and rough as I have ever seen," the San Francisco editor said.

He said he was greatly impressed with the evidence of complete unification of the Armed Forces under General MacArthur. He said he had observed this at both the top level and the working level.

"The services work well together and understand each other's problems," he said. "Every unit has done a hell of a job."

Smith said he was convinced that the only thing General MacArthur needs—and which he should have fast—is clarification of the mission in Korea as well as Asia as a whole.

"If our mission is unification of Korea, then the thirty-eighth parallel is not a proper political question and it is a tactically improper military line."

Smith said, "One of the main jobs of the American people, who are 7,000 to 10,000 miles from the scene of the showdown, is to see that the outfits here from MacArthur to the newest recruit, have the wholehearted support of the Nation and those allied with them in the United Nations."

"It is difficult for anybody to keep his eye on the enemy at the front if he has to spend most of his time and energy pulling political stilettos out of his back," Smith said.

He said he fully understood that there are political questions which can be decided only at the highest levels in the United Nations.

He said he was convinced that this point is well understood by General MacArthur.

But he said he was not convinced that some of those in high political quarters understand the urgency of General MacArthur's position as a field commander.

"As a field commander," Smith said, "he has every right to point up the urgency of the situation and to meet the situation on the strength of his own resources when there is pussyfooting or quibbling and his over-all directives are inadequate or confusing."

Smith said he has been interested here in running down some of the so-called expert criticism of General MacArthur and his staff members.

For example, he said, he had been interested in the charges that some of MacArthur's staff had been with him too long.

On the basis of his experience here, he said he found this criticism completely invalid.

"I have been impressed with the exceptional competence of MacArthur's staff," Smith said. "This exceptional competence stems from the fact that they have been working together through thick and thin for a decade.

"Any idea that such experience and understanding within a top staff is bad rather than good is to me contrary to practical sense."

World Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH J. ADDONIZIO
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article that appeared in the New York Times on April 7, 1951, concerning the position of His Holiness Pope Pius XII on world government. The Pope stated that world government was in keeping with the traditional objectives of Roman Catholic doctrine which strives for peace. As a Catholic and supporter of the World Federation resolution in Congress, I am pleased at the Pope's position on this issue:

POPE BACKS PLAN FOR WORLD GOVERNMENT; SEES IT AS A MEANS TO ESTABLISH PEACE

ROME, April 6.—Pope Pius XII praised today the principle of world government as a means to establish peace and bring about collaboration among all the nations for the common good of mankind.

The papal thoughts on that subject were expressed in a speech to delegates from 22 countries, including the United States, attending the fourth annual congress of the World Federal Government Movement in Rome. Lord Boyd Orr of Britain is head of the movement, which has an estimated 150,000 members in Europe.

World government was in keeping with the traditional objectives of Roman Catholic doctrine, which strives for peace, the Pope said. A political organization of that nature is all the more necessary today "if only to end the armaments race that for tens of years has been ruining the nations and exhausting their resources with nothing to show for it," the Pope declared.

He warned, however, that world government must not be based on what he called "mechanical unitarianism" but on the broader and more humane principles that take into consideration and seek to safeguard and promote the welfare of the individual within society.

Although the Pontiff did not give a definition of what he meant by "mechanical unitarianism," it was clear from the contents of his speech that he was opposed to a federal organization that would regard individuals merely as voters and not as people in need of both spiritual and material aid, which should be first and foremost the concern of a world authority.

As illustration of his thoughts, the Pope deplored the fact that "in the national and constitutional field everywhere today the life of nations is disintegrated by the blind cult of numerical value."

He then added: "The citizen is a voter. But as such he is in reality no more than a unit whereof the total adds up to a majority or a minority, which the shifting of some votes, even only one, suffices to upset. The voter does not count if he is only a voter. Of his position and his task in the family and in his profession no heed is taken."

The Pope implied that present systems of government, based as they were on the "numerical" principle, had proved inadequate to cope with the problems of society and that a world organization should therefore "depart from the beaten track" and by taking advantage of the experience of history should be guided by "healthy social philosophy."

Harvard Offers Happy Hunting Grounds for Pinks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, with thousands of our fine young men suffering and dying in distant Korea it is little short of terrible for us to give shelter to many thousands whose principal purpose seems to be to find fault with our country and our Government.

The following article which appears in one of our leading newspapers on April 8, 1951, is very enlightening:

HARVARD OFFERS HAPPY HUNTING GROUNDS FOR REDS AND PINKS—RADICAL PROFESSORS GIVEN FREE REIN UNDER CLOAK OF ACADEMIC FREEDOM

(By William Fulton)

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., April 7.—Harvard University, going into the fourth century of operation as a brains factory this year, is a happy hunting grounds for Communists, doctrinaire pinks, and radicals of all hues. Many of the professors are leftists who subtly instill their propaganda into the budding brains of the students.

Under the protective umbrella of academic freedom the fomenting of subversive alien theories is allowed to go on unmolested. President James Bryan Conant, a red-hot interventionist and globalist, has refused to curb radicalism on the grounds his pedagogs should have freedom to search for the truth.

SPY TRIAL RECALLED

In the opinion of local law-enforcement officers and members of the legislature, the matter goes far beyond a mere question of academic discussion among radical professors and credulous students.

Recalling the various spy trials, investigators point out Cambridge is a focal point for subversive activity because of the many atomic energy specialists here and work going forward on atomic energy projects. The projects are under way not only at Harvard but also at the neighboring Massachusetts Institute of Technology which has its share of fellow travelers.

In their assessment of the dangers involved local investigators have not forgotten Alger Hiss, former top State Department official and Roosevelt adviser, went through Harvard Law School. Hiss is now serving a 5-year sentence for perjury, in which his clandestine peddling of war secrets to a Soviet spy ring was involved.

LAW SCHOOL UNDER FIRE

It is the law school that is particularly under fire today. Samuel P. Sears, an alumnus of both the law school and Harvard College, now president of the Massachusetts Bar Association, recently said he thought it about time Harvard cleaned house and stopped encouraging and playing host to the Communist Party.

Sears is not the only Harvard alumnus hot under the collar over the way affairs are conducted back on the campus, or "yard," as they call it here. There is increasing criticism, particularly among Harvard men who have sons fighting against communism in Korea while the Red doctrine is allowed to flourish back at the old alma mater.

ALUMNI REFUSE DONATIONS

Alumni have refused to make donations because of their strong feeling over the situation at Harvard.

Undergraduates in Harvard College with whom this correspondent talked admitted they knew of Communists among their fellow students but were inclined to minimize the danger. They parroted their professors' phrases about "academic freedom," "search for truth," "liberalism," and the like.

One student said when a leftist professor's subject was remote from the political field, as for example geology, the pedagogue carried on his propaganda at "bull sessions" outside the classroom or by other activities, such as getting youths to attend meetings for some cause or other.

This corroborated the findings of City Councilman John D. Lynch, banker and former mayor of Cambridge.

"I've talked with students," he said. "They tell me about professors inviting them to left-wing meetings, and then the first thing you know they are filled up with this evil stuff."

Lynch, who says the city of Cambridge is controlled by Harvard influence, vainly attempted last fall to force the registration of all Communists in the vicinity. He did, however, succeed in having a copy of the dossier, "Red-ucators at Harvard University," placed on file for public perusal at the city clerk's office a few months ago.

"Red-ucators at Harvard," an exposé of the Communist-front affiliations and connections of 76 faculty members, was compiled by the National Council for American Education, with offices at 3 Maiden Lane, New York City. It shows affiliation with Stalinoid movements during recent years, principally since the end of World War II.

The "Red-ucators" list was checked against the Guide to Subversive Organizations and Publications, printed on March 3 of this year under the auspices of the Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities. The Guide lists various organizations deemed to be "outright Communist or Communist-front enterprises."

Harvard faculty members showed up with affiliations with 124 Communist fronts.

The check against the congressional list revealed 64 on the "Red-ucators" roster of Harvard were identified with Red facade groups. Some have retired as "emeritus" since the canvass was made but carried on the front activities while working full time in the classroom and are still carried in the university catalog.

NAMES AND FRONTS

These 64 and the number of Communist fronts with which they have been affiliated are as follows:

Comfort A. Adams, professor of electrical engineering, 12 Red-front connections.

Douglas P. Adams, visiting lecturer on engineering sciences and applied physics, two.

Gordon W. Allport, professor of psychology, 12.

Leona Baumgartner, visiting lecturer on maternal and child health, two.

Francis Birch, professor of geology, two.

Garrett Birkhoff, professor of mathematics, one.

Brand Blanshard, lecturer, one.

Bart Jan Bok, professor of applied astronomy, eight.

Edwin G. Boring, professor psychology, three.

Percy W. Bridgman, one.

HISTORY PROFESSOR NAMED

Clarence C. Brinton, professor ancient and modern history, two.

Charles F. Brooks, professor of meteorology, five.

Jerome S. Bruner, associate professor of social psychology, one.

William H. Burton, lecturer on the principles of teaching, two.

Allan M. Butler, professor of pediatrics, eight.

Hugh Cabot, lecturer on human relations, six.

Zechariah Chaffee, jr., professor of law, five.

Halvor N. Christensen, assistant professor of biological chemistry, one.

John Ciardi, assistant professor of English composition, two.

Stanley Cobb, professor of neuropathology, one.

Thomas C. Cochran, visiting lecturer on entrepreneurial history, four.

Albert S. Coolidge, lecturer on chemistry, 12.

William J. Crozier, professor of general physiology, two.

Edwin M. Dodd, professor of law, two.

Frederick M. Eliot, preacher, 14.

Kendall Emerson, associate in medicine, two.

John K. Fairbank, professor of history, one.

Arizona Reclamation Muddle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD the article entitled "Arizona Reclamation Muddle," by Oliver Carlson, a very able writer. It should speak for itself:

ARIZONA RECLAMATION MUDDLE

(By Oliver Carlson)

Reclamation is a sacred word to the people of the water-hungry States of the Far West. Ever since the days of Brigham Young in Utah a hundred years ago, Westerners have been reclaiming arid lands and turning them into fertile farms and orchards. Slowly and painfully they have learned how to impound the water from melting snows, from the occasional rains, and from mighty rivers such as the Colorado and the Columbia. The great urban and industrial centers of southern California would be nonexistent but for the genius of reclamation engineers. The careful husbanding and scientific distribution of the impounded water have increased the well-being of farmers and city folk alike throughout the entire West.

Every Westerner knows this. That is why reclamation is a sacred word to him. That is why reclamation has become a potent factor in western politics. In recent years almost every ambitious politician, no matter what his party label, has promised his constituents more water through greater and ever greater reclamation projects.

For the past 3 years Congress has been considering the most fantastic reclamation project—as to scope, cost, and amount of land to be reclaimed—ever to be conceived by the United States Bureau of Reclamation. Known as the central Arizona project, this amazing irrigation plan was approved by the Senate of the United States last year and may very well have been passed by the Senate again by the time this article is in print.

The overwhelming mass of Americans have never heard or read about the central Arizona project. Most of those who have heard about it think of it primarily as a battle between the States of California and Arizona for the use of Colorado River water—with big, prosperous California seeking to deny little, underpopulated Arizona its just share of this water. Public sympathy, therefore, quite naturally goes to the underdog—to Arizona. The propagandists and lobbyists for this project have succeeded in keeping public attention focused on the have-versus-have-not aspect of the controversy rather than on whether it is economically justifiable or financially sound. What does the central Arizona project propose to do? Its primary purpose is to rescue approximately 150,000 acres of Arizona desert land which were put under cultivation during the war-boom days of the early 1940's, and to supply water for a possible additional 100,000 acres.

To achieve this rescue it is proposed (1) to build a mighty dam on the Colorado River above Hoover Dam; (2) to build, below Parker Dam, 4 pump lifts which would raise 1,200,000 acre-feet of irrigation water to a height of almost a thousand feet; and (3) a network of aqueducts and canals for transporting this water over 315 miles across Arizona where it finally would be used to grow ordinary field crops.

Here, indeed, is an engineer's dream. Here is to be erected a mighty Niagara in reverse, with 10,000,000,000 pounds of water being lifted to a height of 985 feet every 24 hours. The amount of electric power needed just to lift this water from Lake Havasu to the top of the ridge would be more than ample to power a thousand large factories or to meet the domestic needs of a city of half a million population.

The cost of this amazing project was estimated by the Bureau of Reclamation at $738,000,000 in 1948. In view of the Bureau's long record of underestimating costs, plus the increased costs for both labor and materials since 1948, it is a safe assumption that original costs on the central Arizona project would exceed a billion dollars today. This is five times the cost of the Hoover Dam, many times the cost of the Panama Canal, much more than the cost of developing the TVA, and far greater than the cost of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway.

The area to be benefited is all within the State of Arizona, and the project would directly benefit only about 25,000 farmers. Secretary of the Interior Oscar Chapman and his Reclamation Bureau's report admitted that there are only about 6,000 farms within the project area and that, of these, 420 farms contain 55 percent of the land to be irrigated. In other words, the project would give benefits of more than $550,000 to each of these 420 large landholders, and of tens of thousands of dollars to each of the other 5,600 farm owners.

If the people of Arizona wish to make such magnificent gifts to a few of their farmers, we in the other 47 States have nothing to say about it. But when the entire billion-dollar cost of this project is to be borne by the taxpayers of the Nation, for the benefit of a handful of land speculators in Arizona, then the matter is very much our concern. And that is precisely what the central Arizona project proposes.

Furthermore, the Bureau of Reclamation insists that the Arizona farmers who are to receive the water can afford to pay only $4.50 per acre foot for it. But, on the basis of the 50-year repayment period proposed, the cost of delivering this water would amount to $18 per acre foot annually—or approximately four times the charge estimated by the Bureau. Here again the burden of cost would fall upon the taxpayers from Maine to Washington, and from Minnesota to Mississippi.

Former Senator Downey, of California, testified last year:

"Central Arizona land is worth at most $300 per acre * * * but at $300 per acre, the whole irrigated area of central Arizona, less than 600,000 acres, could be bought for $180,000,000, and the 150,000 acres at stake could be bought for $45,000,000."

I find that the United States Agricultural Census for 1945 lists the total value of all farm lands and buildings in the State of Arizona at $287,000,000. The original expenditures for the central Arizona project would be almost three times that figure.

There are times and conditions under which we cannot count the dollars-and-cents expenditures for a project. Could it be that the products to be grown on the rescued land are so vital to our national existence that we must not count the cost? They are potatoes, wheat, corn, cotton, barley, oats, and sorghum. Are these scarce products? Quite the contrary—they are precisely the ones which have been in oversupply year after year. They are the ones for which the American taxpayer has paid out hundreds of millions of dollars for price-support programs precisely because they were a drug on the market. To spend an additional billion dollars in Arizona to keep these surplus crops on the market appears to be the height of economic stupidity.

At this point readers may well ask themselves how such a fantastic project can receive serious consideration by Congress or be seriously proposed by the Department of the Interior and its Reclamation Bureau.

First and foremost, this billion-dollar project has vast political implications. The project, it has been estimated, would take from 8 to 12 years to complete. A working force of from ten to twenty thousand people would be constantly employed within the State. The number of Federal patronage jobs would be very great, and the spending of a billion dollars in a State with a population of approximately 750,000 would give the party in power a complete stranglehold over the people of the State. To land speculators, contractors, jobbers, liquor dealers, gamblers, and union bosses, it should prove a bonanza of fabulous dimensions. And a grab-bag pattern would have been set, which politicians and land speculators in other Western States would rapidly seek to follow. For there are still millions of potential irrigable acres in the West. The Bureau of Reclamation has already worked out plans for projects which would cost nearly $19,000,000,000, and it has on its drawing boards an additional set of projects with an estimated cost of $29,000,000,000.

Here indeed are projects to gladden the heart of every believer in the continued expansion of big government. But it is a frightening prospect to all others.

Bernard DeVoto, who was born in the West and knows it well, called this development "A state of mind * * * that could produce a national disaster.

"The engineering projects in the West (he wrote) amount to an American 5-year plan, 50-year plan, and 100-year plan rolled up together. They are going to be carried through as far as the credit of the United States will permit. The western bloc in Congress will see to it that they are, and Senator DOUGLAS' superb and wholly futile attack on the last pork bill shows what the technique is. What President Truman said about these projects on his western tour amounted to just this: I bought the West 2 years ago and I'm here to assure you that there is enough money so that you'll be happy to stay bought. There is no party line in these matters, the only answer a Republican candidate would bother to make out West would be a promise to pay still more.

"Meanwhile the 5-50-100-year plan calls for by far the largest expenditure the United States has ever made for internal improvements, by far the largest it has ever made for anything except war and defense. Ninety percent of its objectives, at this stage, are entirely hypothetical. An undetermined part of them are also fantasy, guess, mirage, dream, vision, hope; some part of them will fail; some part of them may turn out to be fairly large-scale disasters."

It is high time that the people of the Western States look more closely at the reclamation projects offered to them by the Bureau of Reclamation and power-hungry politicians. No land should be reclaimed and irrigated at excessive cost, or to produce crops of which we already have a surplus or which can be produced cheaper elsewhere. There are tens of millions of acres of cultivatable land in the Midwest, the deep South, and the East which can be reclaimed at a fraction of the cost of western lands. In these areas the problem is simple—that of draining swamp lands and of building dykes and levees.

A group of experts at Stanford University who have been working on a water resources policy for the United States declared in their group report that "agricultural production in excess of its present output must increasingly rely on the area of the Nation which has a net surplus of precipitation, i. e., the eastern half." And they warned: "If irrigation to expand farm production in the West should be given priority, the transfer of population westward would have to stop far short of what it otherwise might be * * * therefore, the use of water for agricultural irrigation should by no means have priority when it would curtail the desirable expansion of homes or industry."

These experts further insisted: "In our view there is no longer (if there ever was) any economic or social justification for subsidizing Federal irrigation projects, whether by charging no interest on allocated costs, leniency in levying interest-free charges on users of irrigation water, or by transfer of either surplus power revenues or interest collected on the power investment. These practices have been the source of waste of Federal funds, which will presumably be multiplied many times if the practices are continued."

Arizona has in Senator ERNEST W. MCFARLAND (majority leader of the Senate) and Senator CARL HAYDEN two astute and powerful champions of the fantastic central Arizona project. By political logrolling, trading, and through their key positions on the Rules and Appropriations Committees, these Senators were able to get their measure passed by a vote of 55 to 28.

The present national emergency may give pause to many Senators and Congressmen before they vote for this measure again in 1951. On the other hand, it is entirely possible that politicians will attempt to tie it in with national emergency measures.

Making Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in the April 4 issue of the Christian Science Monitor. If the United States is to assist India at this time, action must be taken by the Congress without delay. I hope the legislation will come before the House so the entire membership can work its will on this vital problem.

The editorial reads as follows:

MAKING COMMUNISTS

Some Members of Congress who, on paper, are most passionate anti-Communists have found an extremely effective way of making Communists. It is to let 100,000,000 people in India go hungry while Americans sit tightly and comfortably on a stored surplus of wheat amounting to several times the famine need in that land.

Congress has had before it since February 12 a recommendation to give India a needed 2,000,000 tons of grain besides the roughly 2,000,000 tons that nation is buying in the United States and 2,000,000 tons it is buying elsewhere.

Meanwhile, a great deal is said in many quarters about convincing the rest of the world of the advantages of democracy and free enterprise, about selling capitalism instead of communism.

In the state of Bihar in India the grain ration has been reduced below 9 ounces a day and is considered less than enough to assure survival for long of those who depend on the ration alone. Relief of such conditions takes weeks even after shipment of grain is authorized and other provinces are approaching similar distress.

In such circumstances discussion of ideologies becomes academic, but Communist incitement and agitation thrive. So great an American as Senator Borah, an authority on the United States Constitution and its importance, said in 1934, "The people can't eat the Constitution."

The people of India cannot satisfyingly fill their stomachs with preachments on freedom and opportunity if they have not the opportunity to eat. It rests with the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives to put on the legislative calendar a bill which would give them a little nourishing evidence of the free world's efficiency and its interest in their fate.

Now It's Meat Tax To Control Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by John C. Davis, from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of April 7, 1951:

NOW IT'S MEAT TAX TO CONTROL INFLATION

(By John C. Davis)

According to a United Press dispatch from Washington on April 2, the House-Senate Economic Committee has just released its annual statement. Attached to this document is a report of suggestions compiled by the committee's staff of economic experts and advisers. It contains a suggestion that the committee recommend a luxury tax upon meat as a means of controlling inflation.

Just how a tax that would increase the already high price of meat would help to hold down inflation is a bit obscure. It becomes more confusing when the average citizen recalls that another Government agency, the Office of Price Stabilization, is busy thinking of ways and means to bring prices down, notably that of meat, to control inflation.

PAPA KNOWS BEST

Doubtless in due time, our present paternalistic administration that would have us view things not as they are but as we are told they are by "papa" will get around to explaining it all. Our proper function in this socialistic scheme of things is just to pay and pay but never question why. But the idiocy of one governmental body recommending taxes that will raise prices to control inflation while another attempts to hold prices down to control inflation is not the most startling piece of misinformation in this report.

Justifying its reasoning for a luxury meat tax, the report explains that "from the sheer standpoint of production, meat, it has often been pointed out, is in reality a luxury food."

Such a statement coming from a supposedly responsible Government advisory staff is not only amazing; it is incredible in the ignorance expressed of this Nation's agricultural pattern and the influence of that pattern upon our American way of life.

WHAT PAPA DOESN'T KNOW

Meat and meat products—pork, beef, milk, cheese, butter, and eggs—are the chief income producers that give our farmers the highest standard of living of any similar group on earth. Any governmental tax that would raise consumer prices of these would curtail consumption and lower farm income, already below parity with other branches of our economy.

If the clammy hand of taxation, which incidentally is the power to destroy a free economy, were to fasten upon these items and grow strong enough to force farmers to change our pattern of agriculture, it could be a national calamity. As matters stand, we grow crops, feed them through livestock and eat the livestock instead of eating the crops directly from the land, as do the less-favored peoples of the world.

It is our diet of high protein, carbohydrates, vitamins, and mineral meat products that gives us the drive and energy that is the envy of the rest of the world. Even in countries with living standards above those of the peoples who eat directly from the land, only the upper classes enjoy an animal diet comparable to our average. It is one of the reasons those favored few are the upper classes since what you eat determines in large measure what you are.

CRONY FEEDING

A change in our agricultural pattern that would produce a change in our eating habits might produce a class society here. Such a change would have fat political bureaucrats munching upon filet mignons while the rest of us eat mush.

Aside from its effect upon our diet a change in our agricultural pattern would have far-reaching effect upon our entire industrial system. Consider that almost the entire refrigeration industry is based upon animal agriculture. You do not need much refrigeration if the diet is raw corn, wheat, oats, and potatoes. Four million of the eight million trucks in the Nation are engaged primarily in transporting meat and meat products from farm to processor to market and our tables.

The above are just a few illustrations of why meat is not a luxury but a necessity in our American way of life. The staff of economic advisers that advised the House-Senate economic committee otherwise must have been kidding—let's hope.

Amendment to S. 1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL J. KILDAY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday, in the consideration of S. 1, I stated that at the proper time I would offer an amendment in connection with the Executive order providing for examinations of college students as a basis for deferment. At that time I submitted tentative language of that amendment. After further consideration I have decided to revise the language of the amendment. The revision does not change the purpose of the amendment. Should the amendment be adopted, local boards will pass upon educational deferments as has been the case in the past. That the language of the revision may be available to the membership prior to the consideration of the bill, I include the same, as follows:

"Notwithstanding any provisions of this act, no local board of the selective-service system shall be required to postpone or defer any person by reason of his activity in study, research, or medical, dental, optometric, osteopathic, chiropractic, scientific, or other endeavors found to be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest solely on the basis of any test, examination, selection system, class standing, or any other means conducted, sponsored, administered, or prepared by any agency or department of the Federal Government or any private institution, corporation, association, partnership, or individual employed by any agency or department of the Federal Government."

"The Chips Are Down—the World Is Now in a Fight—Unless Every Man in This Room Stands Solidly Behind Our Nation's Defense Mobilizer, Charlie Wilson, and Helps Him Save Our Country, There Will Be No Country Left for Us To Save"—Frank W. Boykin

OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, several days ago, the Members of this House witnessed a scene depicting the ever-increasing costs of food—a problem which concerns every housewife in these United States. I have reference to five of our very distinguished women colleagues, who carried in food baskets containing the amount of food that could have been bought, in 1909, with a $5 bill, as contrasted with what was bought in 1919, 1929, 1939, and in 1950.

Picturesque as was that presentation, the American people have, as yet, seen nothing that even approximates true inflation of our own money or price structure, as compared with what has happened in many, many other countries. Drastic as we have found the increased costs of food stuff and other necessities and goods, I doubt if much of the increase in prices that we Americans experienced, prior to 1950, should be classed as true inflation.

Personally, I incline to the belief that the costs which previously so adversely characterized our price structure in the past 20 years were an increasing high level of prices, which were bound to follow in the wake of the higher standards of living, of higher wages, shorter work hours, and other factors that make up the American way of life which our people have enjoyed.

In other words, I think that, up until last June, we were merely living in a high-price era, rather than in what others have come to know as an inflationary period.

Mr. Speaker, when I think of inflation, I do not have in mind an uncontrolled inflation—wrecking the price structure of a nation by debauching its currency to such a low value that it takes an astronomical sum to make even the most meager purchase. I know that our people here in the United States can feel inflation, and feel it badly, when prices rise and get out of line as little as from 2 percent to 10 percent.

I am, however, reminded of what a friend who, upon his return from Greece, told me but a year or so ago. He said that, in 1937, the drachma had a value of 111 to the American dollar—that, in 1947, the same drachma had dropped to a point where it took 8,000 drachmas to buy one American dollar—but that, in 1950, and despite all the acknowledged benefits that the Marshall plan has brought to that little democracy, its internal monetary system is debased to a point where there are now from 15,000 to 20,000 drachmas to the dollar.

To express it still another way—think of figuring your daily wages in "the millions per day," and you will have some idea of the conditions that developed in Greece. There, a package of cigarettes now cost anywhere from 25,000 to 37,500 drachmas—and a pair of shoes costs from 350,000 to 600,000 drachmas—while a suit of medium-grade clothes costs well up in the millions of drachmas.

More particularly, when I think of inflation as it might come to us in America, I am reminded of what happened in Germany, subsequent to World War II, when it required half a million German marks, which had been previously worth as much as 100,000 dollars in American money, to buy a single copy of a daily newspaper.

In that never-to-be-forgotten period of German inflation, German paper money became so cheap that it had greater value when it was packed into bales, shipped across the ocean, and sold as scrap paper in the markets of the United States * * * than it did as currency in Germany.

Mr. Speaker, I need not point out to you that it is that very type of inflation that now threatens these United States. Neither must I stress the fact that it was the threat of that kind of inflation which caused President Truman, some ninety-odd days ago, to ask the Honorable Charles E. Wilson, then president of the General Electric Co., to come to Washington to direct the Office of Defense Mobilization—the most important office in the United States of America, outside of the Presidency itself.

The Office of Defense Mobilization is charged, by Congress, with doing any and all things necessary to secure the peace and defenses of this Nation. Among these are the establishment of fair, equitable, and effective controls over wages, prices, materials, and production.

Mr. Speaker, no man in the history of this world, either in peace or in war, has been burdened with a more difficult task than that now confronting Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization.

By the same token, I doubt if in the history of this Nation a more representative and disinterested group of Americans ever sat down to break bread together than was that group assembled in the Speaker's private dining room Tuesday, March 13, at midday.

The roster of the men assembled included not alone Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff of these United States, but Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Chief of Staff, United States Army; Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, Chief of Naval Operations; Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, United States Air Force together with the heads of other executive departments of Government, and a score or more of Representatives and Senators—all members of House and Senate committees.

They were assembled at the invitation of the Honorable FRANK W. BOYKIN, and, acting as cohost was the Honorable L. MENDEL RIVERS, Representative to Congress from South Carolina.

All had come to do honor to Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization, and the resounding acclaim which his name brought forth gave greater evidence than word can express of the respect and esteem in which he is held by every man present.

Mr. Speaker, your own generous, tribute and evaluation of the worth and merit of C. E. Wilson to his country in this crisis was second not even to the gracious and generous tribute paid him by FRANK BOYKIN.

Congressman BOYKIN told of conditions which face not alone this Nation but the whole world in this present hour of tension and darkness.

He pulled no punches, either in describing the situation which confronts us as a Nation nor in describing the backbiting and vituperation currently being leveled at the heads of Government doing their very best to bring us out of the depths of despondency and despair and lead us again into the valley of peace and national security.

In telling his guests of Charles Wilson, FRANK BOYKIN described an incident that occurred at a dinner which he gave some years ago. President Roosevelt, who was scheduled to make an address, phoned to say that due to his personal fatigue at that moment, he begged to be excused from attending the dinner. He asked FRANK if he could send Charlie Wilson, "the great president of the General Electric Co., instead of coming myself." The President, however, told of how tired he was, and stated that "You couldn't get my chair up there without making a lot of preparation," and so Charlie Wilson came over alone. "And it was at that time," Mr. BOYKIN said, "that I first got acquainted with him."

Mr. Speaker, there are few men that have ever walked across the pages of American history whose experience has been more peculiar, unique, and extraordinary, or more American than has been that of Charles Edward Wilson, who was president of the General Electric Co. from January 1, 1940, until he resigned on December 16, 1950.

Here is a man who spent his entire business career, except for such times as he served his country, with one single employer—at a time that saw the ever-expanding electrical industry develop in the United States.

It was in 1899, at the tender age of 12, that Charles Wilson entered the employ of the Sprague Electric Co. of New York—one of the organizations which later went to make up the corporate structure of the General Electric Co. Since that time, he served in practically every function of that great business and industry—and on September 1, 1949, completed 50 years of service with the General Electric family.

Mr. Speaker, these 50 years have seen not alone the electrification of American industry and the home but they have, at the same time, seen the rise of the United States to a great industrial nation and a place of undisputed supremacy.

Power, lighting, communications, telegraphy, telephone, and radio, entertainment, industrial and electrochemical processes, the Nation's transportation, its heating and refrigeration, have all been transformed during the very time that Charlie Wilson has worked in the industry. There is hardly an article of daily life that had not, in some wise, been touched by the great magic of electric power. These are inclusive of all things from newspapers to carpets, hydroelectric dams and electric blankets, the Nation's skyscrapers as well as its morning coffee.

Due, in no small measure, to the generation and transmission of electrical energy came the rising standard of living which we now enjoy and the American way of life. During the first half of the twentieth century, the workweek has been cut from 61 hours in 1900 to a mere 40 hours per week as of today.

Mr. Speaker, the saga of Charlie E. Wilson is not the story of a man concerned, per se, solely with a great business concern, but rather with an era that characterized the entire expansion and diversification of American industry as well as with the forces that have made this country the greatest on the face of the earth.

The General Electric Co., as is true of a great many business houses have long since ceased to exist as merely manufacturers and sellers. Today many of these concerns are the driving forces in government and in social progress.

Mr. Speaker, our Government today has within its power the ability to influence the course and the character of all private enterprise, and that is, indeed, a heavy responsibility because it reaches into every land and into every level of society. What industry does today may be of historic significance whether it concerns atomic power at one end of the scale or the betterment of human relations at the other.

Mr. Speaker, Charlie Wilson attended the elementary schools of New York City, and, at the age of 12, started his career as an office boy in the Sprague Electric Co. At Sprague Electric, he moved from position to position, and took the advice of his factory superintendent "look forward and equip yourself for the next job."

At night school, he learned cost accounting, general accounting, and enrolled in correspondence courses, one upon another, in practically all phases of engineering. The cost of these courses he paid by tutoring backward students in physics, mathematics, and other courses that he himself had previously completed.

Through these years of hard work he equipped himself with the physical fitness necessary to meet every requirement demanded of those who, having built empires, now watched, with the sun at their backs, Charlie Wilson advance across the horizon.

He was named assistant to the vice president at about the time that President Hoover was elected to office in 1928. Mr. Wilson's efforts were then primarily devoted, however, to the multitudinous problems of manufacture. In 1930 he was elected vice president of the company and a member of the newly formed appliance sales committee.

It was not until he was elected executive vice president that he moved his offices from Schenectady to New York City. Two years later, in 1939, the board of directors of the great General Electric Co. elected Charlie Wilson the fourth president of the company—into whose employment he had entered 40 years before. He had, indeed, proven a worthy successor to such men as Charles A. Coffin, Edwin W. Rice, Jr., and Gerard Swope—as well as a coworker with the world-renowned Owen D. Young, long general counsel and chairman of the board.

Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary for me to recapitulate to you the tremendous labor pains suffered by this Nation in its attempt to give birth to increased industrial production in the prewar period of World War II.

Time after time all efforts failed, and every board superimposed upon all others to bring up the Nation's productivity—one after the other—bogged down.

September of 1942 found this Nation in a death struggle to increase our national production of war material. It was then that Charlie Wilson resigned all business connections, came to Washington, and, at the request of President Roosevelt, became the Executive Vice Chairman of the War Production Board, armed with complete authority over all war production.

As wartime boss of the United States production effort Charlie Wilson achieved spectacular successes—and particularly so in the construction of aircraft, shipbuilding, munitions production, and in all other war accoutrement programs. These began to reach unprecedented heights when subject to the magic wand built of the experience in direction and production abilities of the new production boss.

When war ended his resignation was finally accepted by President Roosevelt—and, like Cincinnatus, Charles Wilson, returning to his plow, was again elected president of the General Electric Co. on September 8, 1944.

Long distinguished among his colleagues for his creative ability in industrial production as well as his demonstrated interest in expanding the distribution of goods to absorb unemployment and promote higher living and working standards for all, he stands today—preeminent in the field of humanities as well as of industries.

Congressman BOYKIN stated that "The chips are down and the world now is in a tight place." He challenged every man in that room "To get behind Charlie Wilson," and, as he put it "Help this man save our country—or else there will be no country left to us to save."

Mr. Wilson's response was modest, simple, and direct!

He told his audience that he has, on more than one occasion, been accused of being "big business." But, no one ever thought of Charlie Wilson as anything but a little fellow when he started in with Sprague, 52 years ago today. He saw General Electric Co. grow as this Nation grew—from the period that marked the horseless carriage to the present age of the atom bomb, high-frequency circuits, television, guided missiles, and supersonic speeds.

In his boyhood, this America of ours was not even a first-class power. The world powers were Russia, Germany, Italy, Austria, Hungary, France, and the British Empire. No one ever thought to invite the representatives of the United States to sit down at any round table discussion of world affairs. But, Mr. Speaker, America has traveled far—and it has traveled fast, and today we are classed as first in the family of nations.

The last time our now Chief of Defense Mobilization came to Washington, he came down here to do a job, and then return to his work. But, this time, he has made public announcement that he has retired from General Electric, and has come down here to do a job that was so stupendous that he himself doesn't know whether he can do it or not. But the American people know he can.

He has intimated that he has no misgivings whatever as to the ability of our Nation to produce all the physical goods that we need to secure our peace and our defenses, and that this Nation, will be reasonably mighty by the end of this year—and that in another 2 years, it will be so mighty that neither Russia, nor any other nation in this world, will even bother us.

Mr. Wilson, in his report to the Nation made it clear that our potential productivity is so great, that we can ultimately impose our military production on top of our civilian economy, and, without so much as affecting our normal life.

He has, however, given full warning that inflation is the thing that could destroy our great might. It is to that end that we must hold down all prices, labor, agricultural, and all others, and, at the same time, keep all costs and prices in balance.

It is Charlie Wilson's faith that the dignity of man and of labor was born into the bone and the sinew of every American. He would be untrue to his own character if he should fail in any position which he might hold—to sit down and discuss fairly and justly all labor grievances with any representatives of organized labor that the rank and file saw fit to nominate to discuss that question with him.

Charles Wilson was a laborer and a member of a labor union—and is proud of it. And I am happy to learn that some of the differences that precipitated a sharp controversy between the mobilization director and labor representatives apparently have been resolved.

When at President Truman's request, Mr. Wilson left General Electric to take over the Office of Defense Mobilization, he, and those associated with him in the defense effort, approached the job—not as leaders of industry or of agriculture—not as lawyers—not as doctors—not as engineers or as economists. They approached all problems which confronted them first, and last, as Americans.

Mr. Speaker, next to the Russian Comintern, the greatest enemy of this country is inflation for, like a prairie fire, it will inevitably consume every last thing that lies in its path. Millions of wage earners today are asking themselves the question, "How can I provide food for the table in my home and pay for the other necessities of life in the face of the ever-increasing and rising costs that confront us each succeeding day?"

Mr. Speaker, let me point out, as Mr. Wilson has, that the Nation's budget this year is in the round sum of $71,000,000,000. These appropriations could be dissipated in the form of higher prices without adding one iota to the defense of this Nation.

Take the price of a pair of combat boots. Prior to Korea, they sold at $5.72, yet these same boots today cost our defense services $11.61—or an increase of nearly 100 percent. Twelve-ounce twill serge, which was bought for uniforms in May of 1950, for $3.54 a yard, is today costing $6.69 per yard—or an increase of 88½ percent—while cotton twill has jumped from 46.8 cents per yard to nearly 86 cents per yard.

During the same period, Garand rifles, which 9 months ago, cost a mere $41 each are currently quoted at $64—while Bailey bridges have jumped from $37,000 to $55,000 per unit.

Mr. Speaker, I want to mention here that all the taxes that we in the Congress have been asked to levy, if inflation is not controlled, would not even be able to meet the cost of providing for the Nation's defenses, to say nothing of all other services.

Now of course it is unnecessary to tell you that all of these increases in price are not attributable altogether either to the cost of raw materials or the labor necessary to the production thereof. But if and when labor costs are increased, material costs are likewise increased—distribution costs are increased—and the ultimate prices to the consumers are increased. It is the ultimate consumer—be he a farmer, an industrial worker, or the Government itself, who buys the goods and pays the bill.

Were we to make an extensive grant or generally increase wages or costs in any line whatever, be it agricultural, manufacture, transportation, or distribution—increased selling costs would follow, just as surely as night follows day.

Then, with newer and still higher prices prevailing in the consumer market, immediate outcry would be heard—and justifiably so—for further wage increases all across the board and a still newer price spiral generated.

When control of prices across the board is established, the responsible officials acknowledged that was not the ideal procedure to follow with respect to certain groups of labor and certain commodities. But they had to start somewhere to establish a cut-off point—and time has already proven that what they did was the wise thing.

Of course, the Office of Wage Stabilization, within the Defense Mobilization set-up, was faced with an accomplished fact when they agreed to grant a 22-percent increase to the United Mine Workers of America. That contract had been signed, sealed, and delivered, and it was not in their power to abate the same.

If the price of automobiles and trucks are advanced, the cost of all Army motor vehicles go up in proportion and Federal taxes will have to be raised still higher in order to get the money with which to procure them for our armed services.

Mr. Speaker, we must remember, at all times, that our armed services use many articles and goods that are used in everyday civilian economy—motor, oil, gasoline, hardware, metal goods, motor vehicles, clothing, shoes, and other items.

Uncontrolled and sharp competition between civilian use and defense needs could only result in higher prices, and hence, in higher taxes.

It is because of these facts, that we must control inflation by the application of price and wage controls, and the allocation of materials. The policies established to carry out these controls cannot be arrived at by any committee gathered around a table, each man representing some special interest or some special group.

They must be determined altogether with a view to what is best for our Nation and its future security.

These controls must be determined fairly, equitably, and dispassionately, or else we shall find ourselves engulfed in an economic chaos, from which, to my mind, there can be no other but a tortuous escape. I believe this is what Charles Wilson and his associates are trying to do. Let us support them in doing it.

Mr. Speaker, this job has got to be done—that it is a tremendous task and can be done only by someone like Charles E. Wilson, whose leadership, broad vision, and wealth of experience, when translated into action, programs will be carried out in behalf of the conservation of the taxpayers' dollars, the Nation's security, and the peace of the world.

Probe of United States Gold Policy Would Outdraw Kefauver

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the following article by Fulton Lewis, Jr., which appeared in the Grand Rapids Press, has created considerable interest in and criticism of such Government policies among citizens in western Michigan. So far I have been unable to find any logical answer or explanation.

Mr. Lewis' article is as follows:

PROBE OF UNITED STATES GOLD POLICY WOULD OUTDRAW KEFAUVER

(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

WASHINGTON.—Judging from the mail response to my comments in this space on the Government's silly policy of selling gold to foreigners for $35 an ounce, a public hearing on Federal monetary policies might even outdraw Senator KEFAUVER.

I pointed out that foreign governments and individuals can buy United States gold at $35 an ounce and resell it in Europe and elsewhere at $57 an ounce. I have since found that I was slightly out of step with fiscal realities. United States Treasury Department losses, as noted herein previously, were about $1,000,000,000 annually. I figured low on all counts.

EUROPE BUYS FOR $35, THEN SELLS FOR $70

Refined gold can be bought for $35 an ounce from the Treasury, but instead of being purchased at the rate of a billion dollars annually, foreign buyers are gobbling it up at the rate of two billion. As for resale value overseas, $57 an ounce is merely the bargaining price. Experts say the normal overseas asking price for an ounce of gold is probably closer to $70 an ounce and that if you find someone who is really greedy, you can get more than $100 an ounce. In fact, the British Government, which buys large quantities from our Treasury Department, has set a monetary value of $101.17 an ounce, according to United States Mint figures.

If you have a pot of gold—and you are breaking the law if you have—the thing to do, if you want to make a neat profit, is trot over to France and sell it. Even better, set up a dummy corporation with offices overseas and then you can buy and sell gold legally. Smuggling gold out of this country is on the increase, but customs officials are alerted to examine anyone wandering around the docks looking as if he had lead in his pants.

ALL DEMAND AMERICA MAKE PAYMENT IN GOLD

Some countries, including Russia, demand gold when we buy anything from them—and that is where you and I, as taxpayers, take a beating from the low evaluation of gold. For instance, less than a year ago an ounce of gold would have bought 60 pounds of tin. Today it will buy 15 pounds. The same applies to raw rubber and other industrial materials purchased overseas. If the Treasury Department hiked up the value per ounce of United States gold to somewhere near the world market, we wouldn't be taking such a beating from foreign traders, but with United States gold stabilized at $35 an ounce foreign traders can continue to hike the price of their goods and we must continue to shell out more gold to pay for it.

Current shipments of gold per week out of the country average almost as much gold as is now produced in the United States in a year. Back in 1933 the British abandoned the gold standard. Gold was worth $20.67 an ounce then. We shelled out so much of it to the British that in May of 1933 Congress passed a law nationalizing gold trading and making it a crime for a private United States citizen to trade in gold.

BUYING OR SELLING, WE END UP ON SHORT END

In view of current headlines, it is interesting to note that at that time the RFC started buying back, at $35 an ounce, most of the gold we had sold to the British for $20.67, which may account for some of the weird fiscal policies still practiced there today.

Only gold-backed currency rates high in the world today. This is even more true when war threatens. Everybody wants gold. In the United States there is the general feeling that most of the gold in the world is buried at Fort Knox, Ky.

Here are the facts: Our total supply of gold on the basis of the $35-an-ounce price would pay for less than one-third of the 1952 budget now before Congress. In fact, gold buried in Fort Knox and elsewhere backs up less than 10 percent of the money in circulation today, and this does not include the billions of dollars worth of Government bonds extant.

Everybody but us taxpayers makes money from our low gold price. India, Britain, Russia, France, and other nations sell us goods for gold at $35 an ounce. At the same time we ship Marshall-plan countries goods and machinery paid for with American dollars. Then the Marshall-plan countries sell the goods and machinery to Russia and to one another for gold that brings over $100 an ounce. While they build up their gold reserves, ours are depleted.

Since the British devalued the pound some 15 months ago—a step similar, in result, to going off the gold standard in 1933—the United States has lost the equivalent of 30 percent of all the gold produced in the United States in the last 150 years. If the British can hold off for another 20 years, maybe we can get more gold mines operating in the United States so we can build up our supplies again for another raid on Fort Knox.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Philip W. Porter, from the Cleveland Plain Dealer of April 7, 1951:

PORTER ON PRICE CONTROL—WAILS AND MOANS FROM ALL SIDES INDICATE THAT IT SHOULD END SOON—IF NOT SOONER

(By Philip W. Porter)

The attempt at price control was expected to end in a farce, but it has reached that stage even sooner than anticipated. Already, though all the red tape, gobble-dygook and snooping jobs haven't even been filled, the signs of disintegration are evident. And long before the law expires June 30 you'll begin to hear cries from many quarters that it ought to be scrapped. Speed the day!

One particularly poignant wail is already coming from the union bosses, who were long the principal advocates of price control. What they really wanted was price control without wage control; they also hoped to call the signals in the top office. However, wage control is in the law, and Charles Wilson, whom they can't intimidate, is in the top office, so they are now yipping their heads off.

Another groan is coming from the cotton bloc, which resented its ceilings bitterly and you can bet it won't be long before the Congressmen from the cattle raising States will also be moaning, for OPS has already nicely loused up the meat growing and slaughtering business, just as did its predecessors, OPA.

Farmers are not delivering as many cattle to be slaughtered. Signs of skirting the law are appearing in upgrading of poor quality meats and insistence on tie-ins with scarce items. Packing-house managers are going crazy with the silly and useless bookkeeping required to fix profit margins and it won't be long before OPS will be discovering there is a black market. It couldn't be otherwise.

WINS UNPOPULARITY CONTEST

If ever there was a piece of unpopular legislative nonsense, this is it. A recent Gallup poll showed that 75 percent were dissatisfied with it and 65 percent expected prices to go higher. Most of them had the silly notion, cultivated by politicians who flaunted the magic word "controls" before the voters, that all we needed to reduce prices was for Congress to pass a new law. They found out differently. Congress can't repeal or amend the law of supply and demand.

The afore-mentioned groups are opposed to the price-wage control law for special selfish reasons. But you don't need any better reason than this: Prices can't be fixed except in a slave state, with a policeman watching every family, or a docile country where everybody obeys without thought of self or resistance. Since we are adequately supplied with selfishness and signs of resistance are many, price-fixing has already degenerated into just a roost for more job holders and paper-pushers. People generally are either ignoring it or just plain confused as to what it's all about. Who can make any sense out of the mumbo-jumbo?

PRICE INDEXES DROP

Meanwhile, the most ironic possible thing is happening. Weekly and monthly price indexes are dropping. Retailers are suddenly getting inventory-happy and starting to advertise some big price cuts. The television industry is already knocking prices down in large chunks and big electrical appliances are also going begging. There are ample signs that buyers have zipped up their pocketbooks after the scare splurges of several months ago. It's similar to what happened in early 1949. The folks who helped accelerate the inflation by buying too much all at once are already helping produce a slowdown in business. They've already bought and are now paying.

This noticeable slowdown, widely commented on by business analysts, hasn't shown up yet as much as it will soon in all the indexes, but is noticeable even now in food. The Dun & Bradstreet index is down for the third week, the lowest since the controls were applied. And don't forget that most food was not controlled. It started down without artificial wand-waving, of its own accord, because the demand was less. Simple, isn't it?

RAT RACE OF CONFUSION

So, while Mike DiSalle's operatives are just getting into high gear with nonunderstandable directives, mark-ups, mark-downs, and all-out rat race of confusion, designed in theory to keep prices from going up, prices on plenty of items are sliding down fast, and others are likely to drop in the future. How silly can you get in Government? We need this expensive price-control machinery, complete with new job holders, as much as a hole in the head.

All we need right now is allocations of scarce metals and other materials used in production of war goods. Yet OPS is fretting around about the price of potato chips, parking lot fees and flowers. Such stuff is peanuts, merely an annoyance. How could it affect the general price level?

Well, I suppose the boys drawing Federal checks, putting new titles after their names and writing letters to each other, have to do something to look busy.

American Air Power in a Struggle With Soviet Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky entitled "Reds Can't Shift Base Once War Has Started," which appeared in the New York Journal-American March 25, 1951. I believe Major de Seversky's comments deserve national attention.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REDS CAN'T SHIFT BASE ONCE WAR HAS STARTED

(By Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky)

American air power of the right kind and the right size could knock out the war-making industry of Soviet Russia. That much is conceded even by most military men who are skeptical about all-out aerial strategy.

But what good will it do to disarm the Soviets in Russia, they ask, if Stalin can occupy Western Europe, organize its industrial potential, and continue aggression from the new base?

The picture that our top military men are trying to sell to the American people is roughly this: After our atomic attack, Soviet industry in ruins at home, but the Soviet regime still supreme, resting on economic strength beyond its own frontiers. It will function even better, some of them warn, from its new industrial citadel.

SAME OLD STORY

This argument has a familiar ring. We heard it in the final stages of our war with Japan. As the industrial set-up on the Mikado's home islands crumbled to ashes under the concentrated B-29 offensive, our old-style strategists refused to see the possibility of victory.

Japan, they pointed out, still had a great industrial base and some 6,000,000 fresh and well-equipped soldiers in Manchuria. Its war machine would simply be moved to Manchuria, and the struggle would go on for years.

Events quickly showed how grotesque was this concept. Having been thoroughly disarmed at home, Japan gave up, though its Manchurian potential was still intact. With the homeland reduced to impotence, it became politically and psychologically impossible to continue the contest from an alien base.

PAID THROUGH NOSE

It was because of this fallacious concept and the archaic belief that a war cannot be won without a show-down bayonet battle that our leadership was so anxious to draw Stalin into the Pacific war.

To buy Stalin's entry, we paid through the nose with vast concessions to the Soviets in Manchuria. We are still paying through the nose by the appalling casualties in Korea. Let it be remembered that Chinese Communist victories and our present desperate position in Korea are the direct result of those concessions.

Yet the very military men who were so tragically wrong 6 years ago are urging the selfsame fallacy today. They insist that Soviet Russia, though knocked out at home, could maintain the struggle from Western Europe. That is what I deny.

They forget that a regimented dictatorship cannot survive once its aura of invincibility at home is destroyed. Even in normal times the Kremlin needs huge armed forces, a colossal secret police system, a great empire of concentration camps to hold its subjects in line.

WILL NEED HOME ARMIES

How long will it hold them once its industries are wrecked, communications smashed, all normal life disrupted, while American air forces cruise at will in the Russian skies? How long will the restive satellite peoples of Eastern Europe continue to obey their hated Communist masters under those conditions?

With industry halted and life paralyzed by punishment from the air, Russia will be rocked by explosive discontents and perhaps revolutions. The Kremlin will need its best armies for domestic use. It could not possibly sustain the fighting spirit of its troops abroad in any case, each soldier knowing that his loved ones at home are caught in a maelstrom of disorder, hunger, and violence.

We know that Moscow today is obliged to use drastic measures to isolate its occupation forces in Germany and Austria from the local population and to stop the epidemics of desertion. If this is true in relative peacetime, with the Kremlin's prestige higher than ever before, how will it control its occupation forces under continuous air attack, the home base destroyed and the regime's pretensions of unbeatable power discredited?

FINAL BLOW FROM AIR

When the Soviet octopus has been struck in its heart, its tentacles around other countries will fall limp. Only superior strategic air power can deliver that blow.

Our military spokesmen insist that the Russian army, after its own country has been devastated, can pick up its stockpiles, shift bodily to Europe, impose itself on western civilization and live happily ever after.

More than that, they insist that the invaders can then proceed to transform Europe's industries into an industrial power superior to that of the United States. If the Russian soldier-peasants can perform such a miracle, then there is some magic in communism after all, and the free world is doomed anyhow.

But no such miracle would transpire. Stripped of prestige and productive capacity at home by our Air Force, the Soviet regime would cease to be a military treat. Its efforts to create a new industrial base could readily be canceled out by selective bombing.

Its transport and communications could be cut faster than they could be rebuilt. Life would in effect be brought to a standstill by such aerial siege. Stalin's armies would then be open to leisurely and systematic suffocation from overhead and would deteriorate into a helpless mob of displaced persons.

True, air siege means a certain amount of destruction by bombing. But how about the "slow retreat" by inadequate American and Allied ground forces? We need only look at devastated Korea to realize what this would do to Europe. Yet this is the only alternative offered.

COULD WRECK EUROPE

Admittedly such forces would not be enough to hold Europe against the overwhelming might of the Red armies. But they would perhaps slow up the conquest, retreating slowly, and thus chew up the Kremlin's stockpiles of weapons and fuel. Further, if worse comes to worst and we are pushed off the continent, we would destroy the European industrial potential to prevent it from falling into Russian hands.

By some strange quirk of logic, our military mentors look calmly at the prospect of total annihilation of West European civilization in a mile-by-mile scorched earth struggle from the Elbe to the Atlantic. But they shrink in horror from limited and highly selective destruction from the air. Somehow the brand of destruction with which they are more familiar seems to them more acceptable.

Ground forces sufficient to stop the Soviet armies might land and ultimately take the offensive are another matter. But we do not have them. With our limited manpower we can never have them. Those who are trying to stampede the United States into the rearming of Europe—which means war—on the assumption that Russia is already cowed by our atomic stockpile, are courting disaster.

RUSSIANS KNOW

Russian experts have studied the results of bombardment in Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and were invited to the atomic tests at Bikini. From information published they know the capabilities of our Air Force.

Having similar information, being acquainted with the nature of Russian targets and estimating their air defenses, I fear that should we attack Russia today with our present skeleton strategic Air Force we would invite a Pearl Harbor in reverse.

We would sacrifice the precious nucleus of our strategic air power, squander our atomic bombs by inflicting only indecisive damage, and then we, like the Japanese after the battle of Midway, would have nothing left with which to follow up to a decision.

Let's have a big stick first, then we can do what we please.

Deferment of College Students

OF
HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the recent Executive order providing for a blanket deferment policy for college students has brought about a critical situation in Kent County, Mich. The Grand Rapids Herald and the Grand Rapids Press have written editorials in which I concur. In addition, I include in my remarks a column on the same general problem by Lowell Mellett.

The three newspaper comments follow:

[From the Grand Rapids Herald]

IN A "CLASSLESS" SOCIETY

Kent County Draft Board No. 43 acted patriotically and in the best interest of the Nation it serves when it formally protested the President's order granting deferments to hundreds of thousands of college students, with no specific obligation to serve later.

This board and others like it, together with other protesting citizens, will have saved the Selective Service System from the worst of possible mistakes if it brings about the reexamination and correction of this policy.

For this is class legislation in a historically classless society.

It sets apart a whole group, not because as individuals they may be able to contribute more to the national defense as civilians than as soldiers but only because they are enrolled in colleges or can in the future get under the wire before they reach draft age and manage to keep up their grades.

An aptitude test is being set up, but this, be it noted, is secondary. Only students already enrolled are eligible to take it. Such a test in no way sorts out the geniuses and the brilliant men whose continued technical training conceivably might be in the national interest. The nonstudent is barred. The apprentice in a shop doesn't get a chance at it.

Rather it harks back to the iniquitous Civil War practice of buying draft substitutes. The youth whose only advantage is parents with money enough to keep him in school can be deferred. The youth who must go to work, or who simply prefers to learn on the job, gets no such break.

In his speech here Tuesday night, President Otto A. Seyferth of the United States Chamber of Commerce said that "for the first time in our history, we have begun to set class against class. Under the political leadership of men who cared more for votes than for the good of their country, we have been led to forget the essentially classless character of our society."

He wasn't talking about the draft policy, but here it is again. The college class is set against the noncollege class.

Mr. Seyferth also said, speaking of controls, that they can succeed only to the extent that the people accept them willingly. That applies with equal force to any law, including the draft law.

There lies the great danger. We need the draft. We must have it in this period of peril. We cannot afford resistance to it or even nonacceptance of its fairness, and this singling out of a whole group of young men is manifestly unfair.

Members of Board No. 43 are indignant over the discrimination. They are not alone.

Such wholesale deferments as are contemplated cannot be justified on any ground.

We have been talking about universal military training. The first word is the key to its success—universal. There should be no blanket exceptions.

It would be regrettable if able members of draft boards were to find it necessary to resign because of their objections, as of course they must do if they cannot conscientiously comply with what they consider to be an obnoxious rule. It would be equally regrettable if they were to be removed by higher authority because of their protests.

It would, indeed, be most unfortunate—and most dangerous—to allow discrimination in favor of one large group of men merely because they managed to get into college before being drafted.

[From the Grand Rapids Press]

DEFERRING COLLEGE STUDENTS

President Truman's draft deferment plan for college students has provoked loud protests. The plan's critics are opposed to determining whether a young men shall or shall not be drafted on the basis of intelligence and aptitude tests. They contend that this would set up a standard for military service that is both undemocratic and unfair. Grand Rapids draft board members have been among the first to complain.

These objections hardly can be ignored. While it is true that persons with money could buy their way out of the Union Army in Civil War days, this Nation otherwise never has made money, intelligence, or anything of the sort the deciding factor in raising an army. The rich and poor alike are expected to serve. And up to now the genius and the average man have been also.

Under the President's plan, however, about half of the men now in college could be expected to score high enough to stay in school. The other half would have to don uniforms. One grave question raised by this setup is whether deferment wouldn't actually amount to exemption from military service. If so, it would come dangerously close to creating an elite corps, which is something that we could expect the majority of Americans to oppose violently. Nor would it be a kindness to the supposedly favored group.

For it we look ahead down the lifetime of these exempted students, it will be a poor service to them and their children to mark them in this way, as having sought and received exemption for scholarship only—as against other citizens who stood ready to fight when the Nation needed its citizens to stand up for its very life. If a large number of these potential scientists, doctors, lawyers, engineers, etc., are actually needed for continuity of research and development in the war effort, why not have them drafted and assigned to these specific war training purposes, with nominal pay as Reservists so long as they proceed with their education, but with transfer to the Armed Forces if they should fail to meet the grade? On graduation they would be assigned to definite scientific war projects or as doctors, judge advocates, Army or Navy dentists, etc., to the extent required at the time.

To exempt all students on a sole basis of scholarship, aptitude, and intelligence, without considering whether their courses would be of any military use or any war industry benefit, seems fundamentally wrong. It may excuse itself for colleges desperately in need of students and funds—but not on the far more important basis of justice both to the pupils involved and to the millions who could not claim exemption.

The Grand Rapids draft board protest is in advance of actual receipt of the cards to be mailed in by students, and far ahead of the examinations which are supposed to screen out and protect the brightest half of the million male college students in America. It is a protest on the whole principle involved. We believe it will be widely echoed.

BRIGHT BOYS POSE A PROBLEM—BUT SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM'S APPROACH CARRIES TOO MANY UNPLEASANT IMPLICATIONS

(By Lowell Mellett)

One wonders if our Selective Service System isn't in danger of becoming too selective.

Heretofore it has operated to exclude from the armed services a certain percentage of our boys on the ground that they are too dumb to fight or, at least, too lacking in education. Now it is proposed to exclude, or defer for the time being, a certain percentage on the ground that they are too bright to fight. We are to have a military machine manned by men who are neither too dumb nor too bright; just right.

It may not work out exactly that way, to be sure. The bright boys won't actually be excluded because they are bright. They are only to be deferred if they desire to be and many, without doubt, will prefer to fight.

This state of affairs appears to be the result of 2 years of heavy thinking on the part of some of the Nation's leading educators, who undertook the task at the request of the Government. It is an answer to the problem that comes up in every major war; how to prevent the interruption of the education of the boys in college or on their way to college. That's a serious problem for the boys involved and for the parents who are making it possible for them to achieve an education. Just as serious as the problem of the boys whose parents cannot send them to college, including the boys who must work to help support their families and who are getting their education in the form of the trade or the business they may be learning. Just as serious, but no more so.

But, it is said, there is another and even higher purpose in this proposed separation of the sheep and the goats. It is necessary, it is said, to develop, through education, the brain power that will enable our country to compete on better than even terms with the rest of the world in this educated age. That is a way of saying that this country must have an intellectual elite, a group to do our thinking for us while others do the fighting. Modern war, it is said, requires that.

But going to college and learning to think are not precisely the same thing. The pages of history have been brightened by the names of boys who never got to college, but became great thinkers nevertheless. Abraham Lincoln for one. Jesus Christ for another.

The day may come, and it will be a great day if it does, when every child will be able to obtain all the education he can hold. But in this rich country we haven't yet made certain that every child shall have even the beginning of an education. For some there are literally no schools. The schools are only for the fortunate. Now we propose to double the good fortune of the fortunate.

It doesn't seem to conform to the ideal of democracy we are voicing to the world. It is about as democratic as the draft system that operated in the North during the Civil War. Then the parents of a boy who had been drafted could buy a substitute for him, if they had $150. Now they can obtain his deferment by sending him to college. They can if he is just reasonably bright.

The bald fact is that this country must either be a democracy or something else.

The new system of selection revised for our fighting forces seems perfectly designed to make it something else.

Service of the Forty-fifth Division, and Comment on General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT S. KERR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release I issued yesterday regarding the use of the personnel of the Forty-fifth Division, and also commenting on General MacArthur.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Secretary of the Army Pace has assured me that there is no plan to use the personnel of the Forty-fifth Division for combat relief in the Army rotation program just announced for Korea.

With Oklahoma's National Guard bound for Japan, I have received a good many queries as to whether their possible movement to Korea might be hastened by the new rotation system which will bring home a good many of our fighting men. The answer is "No," according to Secretary Pace.

Replacements for that program will come in the future, as in the past, from training centers in this country. Secretary Pace is very much aware that divisional morale and tradition has far too great a value to be damaged by breaking up the Forty-fifth in any way.

Secretary Pace reiterates that the division will first complete its training. If and when it does move, the entire division will go together. No units or individuals will be withdrawn for replacements or other uses, it was stated.

The Secretary of the Army tells me again that there is still no plan to use the Forty-fifth for other than occupational purposes in Japan. However, any plan is always subject to change upon the decision of the theater commander, who is ———? Who is ———? Oh, yes; his name is MacArthur.

And speaking of General MacArthur, I should like to add his name to my list of letter writers who need the writer's cramps.

As the big chief in the Far East, General MacArthur is said to wear many hats to represent his many titles. But he isn't satisfied with all that big brass on his head. Now he is trying to grab the high silk topper of the diplomat. I must say it looks inappropriate with his military uniform.

With our Oklahoma boys assigned to the Far East, I have an added concern for what is happening out there. How can our general welfare be served by General MacArthur's open disregard of superior authority, his failure to cooperate with his own Government or promote harmony with our allies?

I'm not denying that he is still MacArthur the Magnificent, but I think the prolonged performance of his one-man act is wearing the patience of the rest of the team mighty thin.

In fact, it is getting about as threadbare as the general's much-touted oriental prestige. The time may be nearer than we think when the over-all cost of keeping MacArthur as the theater commander will be greater than the value of his position with the Asiatics.

Sometimes I fear that parts of what MacArthur is doing could get us deeper into war instead of successfully ending the one we are already in.

There seems to be a new wave of argument and confusion as to our specific purposes in Korea. The answer is very definite and very simple: Our aim wherever we are and in whatever we do is peace. We do not seek to go beyond that. Under no circumstances can we afford to stop short of it.

While we are conducting the Korean campaign on its present basis, it would be nothing short of insanity to take any action that might provoke an all-out conflagration. Our efforts must continue to limit the conflict in every possible way in the hope of achieving peace at the earliest possible moment.

Again, I repeat, our aim is more peace and less war.

Appropriation for Federal Civil Defense Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL T. DURHAM

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am astonished and alarmed by the severe slashing of more than 75 percent from the first appropriation for the Federal Civil Defense Administration as reported in the third supplemental appropriations bill of the House for 1951.

There is no question that this action of the Appropriations Committee will have grave, if not fatal, consequences to the civil-defense program throughout the Nation, as well as to our entire security program. This action by the House committee will set the civil-defense program back at least 6 months even if all the funds are restored. The States and the cities and their people have been waiting to see if this Congress lives up to the serious responsibilities which it laid down for itself in the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950. Now we have solidified public apathy by our own actions.

In the States, governors have been urging their legislatures to provide funds and machinery to take advantage of such Federal aid as might become available under our law, as well as for their own administration of civil defense. With one eye on the apparently healthy Korean situation of the past few weeks, most of these State legislatures have held off waiting to see what we were going to do. As of today, 28 of them are still in session and must be dismayed and disgusted with the news they received from Washington last Friday.

This Nation and this Congress willingly spend billions of dollars for munitions in the military services and yet the Congress refuses to provide even a token protection of the home front which makes a military war effort possible.

This Appropriations Committee report reduces the Civil Defense Agency to a small advisory group, with no real means of helping States and cities get ready to help themselves, except by training some trainers and distributing a few pamphlets. This action negates the whole principle of civil defense, as it was thoroughly understood by the House Armed Services Subcommittee last December, and as it was understood by the full committee.

The Federal responsibility in civil defense goes far beyond the distribution of educational material and the training of State and local training supervisors, plus a meager amount for equipment and shelter facilities. One of the fundamental principles is that the Federal Government shall assist the States by contributions to build up their ability to meet enemy attack, and keep the production line going, to the end that our military forces may continue to receive the support they need in the prosecution of a war.

In the early spring of 1950 the Joint Atomic Energy Committee of both Houses began exhaustive executive hearings on the civil defense problem. The record of that testimony shows that the National Security Resources Board, then in charge of civil defense by Executive order, was making realistic progress in preparing a program to protect the lives and property and production of 150,000,000 American people.

The reports of the joint committee hearings and those which followed in the Senate and House Armed Services Committee are grim records of the realities of civil defense.

Because civil defense was recognized as a key of our security program, members of the Eighty-first Congress reacted in a sound and wise fashion by passing with one dissenting vote, Public Law 920—the Civil Defense Act of 1950.

In the declaration of policy for that act it says flatly "it is the policy and intent of Congress to provide a plan of civil defense for the protection of life and property in the United States from attack." The remainder of that act, which grants widespread powers and delegations of authority to the civil defense authorities at the Federal, State, and local levels, is a tribute to the Congress because it met the vast civil-defense problem by significant action.

Now, I must point out that we are ridiculing the policies of this Congress and hoodwinking the American people by this ruthless elimination of funds for a soundly conceived program to protect our entire home front.

Fundamentally, what the action of the House Appropriations Committee does is tell the Civil Defense Administration that it can plan for a disaster but that it can have virtually no means to prepare for that emergency.

I ask you to give serious consideration to the program activities which are wiped out by the action of the Appropriations Committee.

The entire civil defense research and development program in a field which the Appropriations Committee admits is full of unanswered problems, has been completely eliminated.

A. The entire program for blood plasma and blood substitute research has been wiped out.

B. The committee action grants the Civil Defense Agency $75,000,000 for shelter construction. Then the committee denies its own statement that the answers have not been found to the shelter problem by refusing to grant any money to the administration for shelter research, both on existing structures and on actual tests of American-type shelters which must be made under atomic blasts.

C. The action of the House committee effectively eliminates further progress in our defenses against biological warfare.

D. Funds have also been eliminated for the development of a badly needed hospital mobilization and operation plan for wartime disasters.

E. One of the major responsibilities of the Federal Government as set forth in Public Law 920 is the provision of substantial stockpiles of civil defense emergency materials to be used in the case of disaster by the States and cities. Principal among these materials for Federal stockpiling, as recognized by the Eighty-first Congress, were a large number of medical supplies, including first aid items, first-aid station supplies, medical and surgical instruments for emergency treatment of casualties, mobile laboratories for detection purposes, vaccines for immunization against biological warfare, blood-transfusion equipment, blood substitutes and blood plasma, Geiger counters and other radiological safety instruments, and a number of other such crucial items.

Without these items in adequate stockpile in advance of attack the Congress recognized in Public Law 920 that the casualty rate in event of attack on our cities would be severely higher. Yet the committee eliminated all funds for such stockpiling.

I will not take the time of the House to discuss in detail the various reductions which have been made by the Appropriations Committee. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks for the RECORD and by such means will comment upon the committee report point by point. Some of the statements made in this report are manifestly unfair.

I am mystified to note in the report by the House Appropriations Committee that "the committee is rather amazed at the approach the Civil Defense Administration appears to be taking with reference to these activities." A little more study of the problem would have indicated that nothing could have been a more contrary statement of fact.

I particularly want to take issue with the so-called nebulous nature of the civil-defense warning system which the committee said had been coordinated "only slightly" with the military forces.

Contrary to the committee report, the Defense Department, and particularly the Air Force, have testified repeatedly that there is absolutely not "a wholly adequate and efficient civilian attack warning system" in the Air Force or anywhere else. The Air Force testified before the Armed Services Committees that it desired that civil defense take over the public warning phase of the Nationwide warning system. The fact has been widely known and understood in the Congress for many months. The Air Force has flatly testified that it has not the personnel nor the funds, nor does it seek the responsibility of handling the civil air-raid-warning program. In this connection, may I also comment that the recognition by the Appropriations Committee to the Defense Department that it make every effort to expand the present radar system is a sound one. May I point out, however, that radar does not alert the public. No matter how well the Defense Department improved its radar system it would be absolutely useless for public warning unless there is established now, under the Civil Defense Administration, in coordination with the Air Force, a wholly adequate public warning system.

During the past year, whenever the headlines in Korea took a turn for the worse, the States and the cities and the public and the press exerted a great deal of pressure on the Congress and on the executive department to do something about civil defense. That "doing something about civil defense" was meant in the sense of doing something honest and concrete and in the magnitude of the problem. No token gesture was called for. But I must say that the action of the House Appropriations Committee is literally and psychologically not even a token gesture for the protection of the home front through the civil-defense program.

We learned from bitter experience in World War II, and then from Korea, that preparedness and mobilization are not faucets that can be turned on and off at the whim of any morning's headline. Despite the fact that we should have learned that lesson we are acting entirely contrary to it in this rash handling of the civil defense program.

I ask you not to be misled by the fact that the total suggested appropriation is $186,000,000; $100,000,000 of that is locked up by a provision of the bill which provides that it can be used only when a civil defense emergency is declared. In terms of modern warfare, that means after the bombs have fallen—when it will be of no value.

If the remainder of 1951 is our period of greatest danger from enemy action, as the committee report states, we are saying in effect to the American people that nothing can be done for you right now. After the bombs fall and there are casualties by the hundreds of thousands we will be very pleased to furnish $100,000,000 in cash as substitutes for blood and blood plasma, for monitoring instruments, and for innoculations against biological and chemical warfare. I am certain it will provide a great deal of comfort to the public to know that instead of the things they will need immediately for those who survive an enemy attack, our Congress will be happy to provide them with dollar bills instead of bandages and blood.

We have been accused for the past several years of "government by crisis." Certainly the history of civil defense in the past year shows just that. We have blown hot and cold on it in direct proportion to the criticality of the international situation. If this big enemy push that is being predicted should come to pass with all the forces that we are told are massed in North Korea and Manchuria, you will be hearing from home again on the subject of "Why didn't you do something about civil defense?"

I urge that we stop this backing and filling and make up our minds that we were right last January when we authorized an all out civil defense program for this country. As long as there is the faintest threat of war we will need a strong and well organized home front defense. We will not get it by starving it to death while it is just getting started.

The public impact of this action by the House Appropriations Committee can hardly be retrieved by any action of the Congress. Looking back on our past history I can believe that it is precisely in the pattern that an enemy would ask of this Nation—the graver the crisis, the more inadequate the action by the Federal Government. I feel certain that such an action by the Appropriations Committee and by this Congress is aid and comfort to the enemy of the highest order.

Government of Petroleum, by Petroleum, for Petroleum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Harold L. Ickes, former Secretary of the Interior, in Cleveland, Ohio, February 24, 1951, at the annual convention of Americans for Democratic Action.

I am advised by the Public Printer that the manuscript is estimated to make two and one-third pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at a cost of $191.34.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY HAROLD L. ICKES, FORMER SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION AT CLEVELAND, OHIO, FEBRUARY 24, 1951

GOVERNMENT OF PETROLEUM, BY PETROLEUM, FOR PETROLEUM

I appreciate this opportunity to speak before this convention of Americans for Democratic Action. Every citizen who is concerned that laws in the interest of the public welfare should be passed by the Congress and enforced by the executive and judicial branches of the Government knows pretty generally what the ADA has stood for in the past and he knows that it is good. He knows that he can have confidence that, if the ADA continues along the course that it has so far followed, it will be, in the future, as it is now, one of the greatest influences in the country in encouraging our Government to put the welfare and peaceful security of the people above all other considerations, especially personal, political considerations.

We have great problems to solve, not only internationally, as I need not tell you, but in the domestic field. We cannot afford, because of our concern and anxiety over what may happen in Europe, or what is happening today in Asia, to be indifferent to what is happening at home. Just as a pickpocket can employ his skill to the best advantage and with the greatest immunity to himself in a crowd whose necks are straining in an effort to see some curiously exciting object, so does a political crook know that he is safest in plying his even more obnoxious trade at home when the attention of the people is monopolized in the direction of Russia or China or Korea where American troops are fighting or may be called upon to fight.

With this in mind, I shall discuss with you today the subject of oil—off-shore oil, tidelands oil—federally owned oil that has already been discovered in vast quantities and rich quality off the shores of California, Texas, and Louisiana, with prospects of finding more along the seacoasts of other States. In addition, there is an almost certainty of discovering, on the Continental Shelf, lying seaward of the Pacific Coast, unpredictable quantities after the technicians have developed ways and means for discovering and capturing it. The considerations have persuaded me in considering what to talk about today to fall back on the subject of oil, upon which I have had something to say in the past, and as to which I may have more to say in the future. One inducement to talk about oil is the fact that, as was expected, there has been introduced in the Eighty-second Congress a Senate joint resolution which seems to consider, first, the interests of the private oil industry, and, second, the coastline States.

In the apparent nature of an afterthought, there is a suggestion that perhaps the people of the United States who own these offshore oil lands, according to the United States Supreme Court, may also have an interest which should be given some recognition. I have been referring to Senate Joint Resolution No. 20, introduced on January 18 by Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, for himself and Senator ANDERSON, of New Mexico, a resolution upon which hearings have already been held by the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Then, on the morning of February 15, when I was reading, at the breakfast table, my copy of the Washington Post, which I am sure you will agree with me is one of the outstanding and most reliable newspapers in the United States, my eye was struck by a headline on the front page: "Army Studies Lower Draft Standards." The article itself was under the byline of Sam Stavisky, with whose name in connection with responsible stories, readers of the Post have become accustomed. The subhead was to the effect that "two new methods would be applied to those who flunk intelligence tests." The first paragraph of the lead announced: "The Army has under study two plans for lowering induction standards for draft-age men who fail the mental qualification test, it was learned yesterday."

"One approach would permit the induction of a percentage of substandard selectees, as fixed or suggested by Congress."

"The other approach would allow the induction of virtually any physically-fit man who knew his right hand from his left."

Omitting several intervening paragraphs, I came to the concluding one: "In World War II, mental standards for induction were progressively lowered. After failing the standard test, the draftee was given a literary examination, a test by pantomime (whatever that may mean), and then an individual psychiatrical test before being rejected as useless to the Army. The wartime bottom-of-the-barrel mental rejection rate was 8 to 9 percent, or one out of four of all draftees rejected."

I confess that there was nothing in this article to make me thrust out my chest in my pride at being an American. However, I did feel that I would like to do something to help in a distressing and almost unbelievable situation. So I began to look up other facts and figures. I discovered, what you probably already know, and that is that the percentage of our total adult population, of less than 4 years of schooling in the United States, amounts to 13.5 percent. This percentage ranges from 8.3 percent in the West to 22.9 percent in the South and 10.1 percent in the North. Glancing down the lists of the States, one discovers a 4.1 percent illiteracy in Iowa, which jumps and dodges to a high of 35.7 percent in Louisiana. It appears that 4 years of school, or less, is generally considered the jumping-off place of literacy by the armed services.

Considering the percentages of adult illiteracy in the population of various countries, we find that Finland is the most literate of all, with an average of illiteracy of only one-tenth of 1 percent. It could well be that the intellectual qualities of the Finns have had something to do with their willingness to fight for their liberty even against that monster that dwells in the Kremlin as well as their knowledge of how most effectively to do this.

The United States measures literacy by asking a person if he is literate. This might be regarded as self-serving testimony in connection with which I suggest that there might properly be a preliminary question which would be, "Do you know what literate means?" My guess would be that such a question would cause confusion in the minds of at least some who are ready to vouch for their own literacy. The illiteracy of the United States, which I have quoted as being 13.5 percent of the adult population, really means the percentage of that population with less than 4 years of schooling. In truth, in these days in the United States, an adult with less than 4 years of schooling would hardly rate as literate by any realistic standard.

It cannot be determined by statistics whether a man can be a brave and intelligent soldier, whether literate or illiterate. There have been fine soldiers who could not read or write, just as there have been highly educated ones who do better in the classroom than on a battlefield. However, there is nothing for Americans to be proud of in the fact that the percentage of our adult population with less than 4 years of schooling, amounts to 13.5 percent. No one could deny that even a good soldier might be a better one if he had a better education. He would have a better opportunity to know what he is fighting for. Least of all, can we be proud of our too high a degree of illiteracy when we consider that a citizen in a country that is self-governing needs, above all other things, intelligence based upon an adequate education in order to qualify him to be the kind of a citizen that we can depend upon to understand our institutions and be willing to fight for them.

The trouble with our educational system is that we have allowed it to become run down at the heel. We have money to spend for other things, and we spend it, in large measure, at the expense of our children. Of course, no child can go from an underprivileged home where he does not have enough to eat or wear or enough heat to keep him warm and expect him to compete on an equal basis with children from homes where such conditions do not prevail. At the very least, we ought to give underprivileged children the chance to acquire an education, because that is the surest way of eventually improving the economic and social conditions of our down-at-the-heel residential areas, both urban and rural. We are willing to tax ourselves for roads. We are willing to buy automobiles even when we cannot afford them and the gasoline at the continuously rising prices with which to operate them. Why read if one can go to a movie? Why pick up a book or a serious magazine when it takes time from comic strips? We have money to spend lavishly on war which is the greatest waste of money conceivable. We even have money to pour into the "operation rat hole" operated by Chiang Kai-shek, whether hiding out on Formosa or not. We are finding money to hand out to the Fascist dictator of Spain, Franco. His impoverished and half-starved country does not have sufficient credit to borrow from private sources, the money that he wants to squander on his spoon-fed army, but there in the background is the United States Treasury, out of which, not only he, but his fellow dictator—Salazar of Portugal—have received, and still expect to receive, millions upon millions of dollars, not for education, but to maintain themselves in power and to keep satisfied greedy and corrupt retainers who make it possible for the dictators to use their ill-begotten power to oppress the people and deny them any semblance to liberty.

There is wealth enough in this country to educate every child up to the limit of his capacity to acquire and use that education. Beyond that point, I would not go, even if I had all the money in the world. But we have been as careless with our wealth as we have about the education and welfare of our underprivileged children and even of those children who come from middle-class homes and who have to depend, for their primary education at least, upon schools built and maintained by the taxpayers. Recently, the Supreme Court told us on six separate occasions that the offshore oil lands, especially those off of the coast of California, Texas, and Louisiana, belong to all of the people. Until the decision in the case of the United States of America against California which was orginally instituted by your outstanding national chairman, Francis Biddle, when he was Attorney General, we suddenly found ourselves in possession of mineral wealth in the form of petroleum, the value of which can hardly be estimated. Dr. E. L. De Golyer, of Dallas, Tex., probably the most outstanding petroleum geologist of the United States or even of the world, wrote an article for Life, a little over a year ago, in which he estimated that there might be ten and a half billion barrels of oil along the Texas and Louisiana coasts alone. This figure did not include California, Mississippi, Florida, or any other coast-line State along which oil has been or may be discovered. Other estimates are lower than that of Dr. De Golyer, but, on the contrary, there is one that holds out the hope that there may be perhaps one thousand billion barrels under the 10,000,000 square miles of ocean bottom that constitutes the various Continental Shelves of the world.

It is interesting to know that the Geological Survey in the Department of the Interior, which, generally speaking, is conservative in its estimates, thinks that there may be 13,000,000,000 barrels on the Continental Shelf adjoining Texas and Louisiana, with an additional 2,000,000,000 barrels lying seaward of the coast of California. This would make 15,000,000,000 barrels within the projected boundaries of the United States, rather than the De Golyer estimate of 10,500,000,000 barrels. Let us regard the Geological Survey estimate of 15,000,000,000 barrels along the Texas, Louisiana, and California coasts and ignore all other estimates or possibilities. After all speculation on the basis of 1,000,000,000,000 barrels, or even of one-tenth of that number, might be so fantastic as to be confusing, to the average mind.

The average price of crude oil today is $2.56 a barrel. On the basis of this price, the 15,000,000,000 barrels of the Geological Survey would reach the enormous sum of $38,400,000,000. This is better than a tidy sum, and it might grow beyond imagination if a greater quantity of oil should ultimately be discovered or if the price, as the result of increased demand, should go even higher. Those of you who have to buy food and clothing and shelter should be grateful for the bargain prices that you pay due to the prompt action of the Government in cutting them back; or have Washington officials only promised to cut them back sometime, somehow? In any event, the cost of petroleum and its products is continuing to rise along with an increasing demand that has become so large that it cannot now be satisfied by the crude oil produced domestically. As I predicted in a magazine article some years ago, considerably before the event, we are now, on balance, an importing nation as to petroleum, and therefore no longer an exporting nation.

If this wealth belongs to the United States, why should not all of the States share it in proportion to population and need? New Mexico has an illiteracy rate, according to the Army standards, of 27.3 percent, yet we find the junior Senator from that State joining forces with Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, which has a more fortunate illiteracy rate, to enrich the oil companies, as well as the Coastal States, and give as little as possible to the United States, including the State of New Mexico.

South Carolina, with a 34.7 percent illiteracy rate, to say nothing of Mississippi, which is 30.2 percent illiterate, certainly need more money for their schools. We cannot develop evenly as a nation, or even regard each other with that degree of affection and respect that makes for a homogeneous citizenship, if such a large proportion in some States are in the classification of "poor relation" as compared with others in the more fortunate States of Oregon, Idaho, Maine, and Minnesota.

Or, if we don't want to spend any part of this money on education, why not hold it in reserve for the use of our Armed Forces? Compare our fortunate situation, with respect to oil, with that of Russia. Some of us look under the bed every night before turning in in the full expectation of finding at least one Russian Communist armed to the beard. We spend much valuable time, that could be put to better use, wondering, not whether Stalin is going to strike, but when. In doing so, we overlook entirely the fact that a modern war cannot be waged without oil and there is not sufficient oil within the vast domains of the Russian empire to justify the risk of going to war when the United States would be the principal opponent. What defeated Hitler and Mussolini, particularly, and to a lesser degree, Japan, in the last war, was their lack of oil as compared with our comparative plentitude. So there is much to be said for setting up an Armed Forces reserve out of these oil-rich lands of which we find ourselves the fortunate possessors.

Or, there is the matter of the national debt. The gross public debt today stands at $255,900,000,000. Rather, this was the figure as of February 12, 1951. My suspicion is that, without even having taken a good long breath, the public debt is going to begin to grow again. Astronomical figures could beget astronomical figures. How about applying some of the wealth that will accrue to us from our oil to reducing the public debt? Certainly, those American citizens who were persuaded by their patriotic enthusiasm to buy E bonds would like to see something done to restore the dollar at least to the value approximating what it was when they bought these bonds.

Here are two other alternatives that can be proposed for giving ourselves the benefits that we are entitled to have from our ownership of petroleum. However, I come back again to the thesis that the best use to which we could put this money would be for education. A democracy needs education, as the human body does air and a good circulation. Without an education, which, after all, must be paid for, we are defrauding our children of their very birthright, their most valuable possible asset. I have suggested in the past, and I propose again, that the Federal Government create a trust out of these offshore oil lands modeled on the Rockefeller Foundation which, by comparison with the Federal investment, would become a dwarf. Here would be a huge sum of money increased as probable new discoveries of oil would be made that would be beyond the budget and would not have to be supported by Federal taxation. If wisely administered by competent officials under carefully drawn legislation, this would supply the people with the education that is particularly essential if our form of government is to endure.

The National Education Association, basing its estimate upon recent birthrate figures, has warned that by 1955, only 4 years away, the number of children waiting for admission to our public schools will be larger by seven millions than it was a year ago. Understandably, it asks, "How will this 30 percent increase—over the enrollment of 24,373,000 in 1948 to an estimated 31,393,000 in 1955—affect the already complicated problems of school finance and teacher supply?" Already there is a drastic shortage of teachers. According to an article some time ago in the New York Times, "Every State in the Union needs more qualified teachers." We can't get teachers, especially qualified teachers, for our children without paying them. We all know that inflation has hit those of our citizens who have to depend upon a fixed income, such as the teacher does upon his salary, even more than people who are in business and can raise prices to keep pace with the advance in costs. We have to have money to build new schools, as well as to maintain and improve old ones. Only money can buy the supplies necessary to educate our children and only money can pay for the lunches that are so essential, especially to undernourished children who have to sustain their bodies if they are to improve their minds.

One would have thought that the discovery of this vast new wealth would have inspired some degree of statesmanship in the Congress. One might have expected an enlightened and patriotic competition among statesmen to see what could be done with this unexpected and greatly appreciated wealth to advance the welfare of the people. Fortunately, there are some Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives who are not willing to use this money for the further enrichment of those who already have more than is good for them, either as citizens or as Members of Congress. Instead of seriously considering how best to use this unexpected wealth to promote the public welfare, many Members of Congress act as if it were not income to be used for the benefit of the people but swag to be divided among freebooters.

One would expect a man like Senator MCCARRAN to deny benefits to the people of Nevada who have mistakenly elected him to the Senate time after time, but it is a surprising role in which Senator O'MAHONEY has cast himself. The Kerr gas bill of the last session of Congress was bad enough. Here was an unholy effort by greedy and selfish rich men, their lawyers and lobbyists, and others wholly subservient to the oil and gas interest to increase the price of natural gas. But even higher prices for natural gas would not have been nearly so bad for the Nation as that money that should accrue to the Federal Treasury for the equitable benefit of all of our citizens should be diverted to States that have already profited inequitably out of public property to the detriment of people in less fortunately situated States and to grasping, selfish, and not always too scrupulous oil interests with which to increase their own emoluments and give larger dividends to their stockholders.

I challenge anyone to show at any point along the long corridor of history such improvidence, waste, and outright thievery as can be read in the bold-face type in which the chronicle of the ruthless development and use of American oil has been written. American oil companies, generally speaking, have no feeling of deference for their Government and show no consideration to the American people. It is a case of grabbing while the grabbing is good. When it comes to foreign countries these interests do act with some degree of consideration, but that is because they have to. Four American companies, to cite only one example, Standard of California, Standard of New Jersey, Socony Vacuum, and Texas, operating as the Arabian-American Oil Co., pay into the Treasury of King Ibn-Saud of Saudi Arabia 50 percent of the net profits after making allowance for customs duties and taxes. Compare this return with the paltry royalties exacted in this company by the States or Nation from oil companies operating under concessions. To be sure, King Ibn-Saud is only an ill-educated absolute monarch in a desert land where his downtrodden subjects are little better than serfs. But he knows how to bring the powerful and arrogant American oil companies to heel while our policy is to try to smother them with favors and add to their fat, perhaps in the hope that they may die of their own obesity. We simply do not have the heart to refuse them extra helpings of dessert while throwing a thin dry crust to the underprivileged people of America, some of whom have the absurd idea that, to some degree at least, our natural resources, and especially petroleum, should be so managed that our institutions may receive a greater benefit from them than they have been vouchsafed in the past. If Saudi Arabia had such an intelligent government as the United States, the oil companies that I have mentioned would receive more lenient treatment. They would be allowed by King Ibn-Saud to live in the manner to which they are accustomed in the United States. They would be required to be satisfied to pay more meager royalties. Least of all, would they be expected to pay such meager royalties. Least of all, would they be expected to share their profits in any percentage, let alone on a practically 50-percent basis. On the contrary, they would exact of the King a generous allowance for depletion because, after all, he cannot guarantee for all time to come to renew his oil resources so that the lessee companies may continue to accrue more and more profits.

There may be instances when Members of Congress, who have investments in oil or who represent oil interests, either as lawyers or in some other capacity, who have been able to consider objectively, and from the point of view of the public interest, bills introduced in Congress for the benefit of the oil industry. However, at the moment, I cannot call the name of any such Member. The oil companies are the most favored among American industries. When they operate on public lands, they pay an average royalty per barrel of about 12½ percent. Of this, 37½ percent goes to the State in which the oil is produced, 52½ percent into the reclamation fund, while a bare 10 percent dribbles into the Federal Treasury. On some State-owned lands, such as in California, they pay higher royalties, but in no instance do they pay as much as they do to King Ibn-Saud of Saudi Arabia. While taking the riches out of the earth that were put there by the Creator for the benefit of all, the oil interests demand that the United States Treasury make them a depletion allowance in their income-tax returns of a mere 27½ percent. President Truman has pointed out the iniquity of such a tax and it is indeed iniquitous. It amounts to a subsidy paid out of the United States Treasury to the oil interests that we already are allowing to exploit, for private profit, this great natural wealth. It is a charge collected from the Government to pay the expenses of the companies in exploring for more petroleum to exploit for their own private profit. It would require a Gilbert and Sullivan to do justice to a cynical situation that has in it more sadness than humor.

What is the answer to the question, "Why do the oil companies have such potent influence in Congress?" That is indeed an easy one. The answer is campaign contributions; newspaper and magazine display advertising running into the millions of dollars every year; high retainers paid to influential lawyers; and funds supplied heedlessly for expensive and far-flung lobbies. In connection with the stupendous sums paid for advertising by the oil companies, it should be borne in mind (1) that little, if any, advertising is required to stimulate a market of eager buyers; (2) that probably we are on the verge of a scarcity of gasoline which may require rationing and which already has required a reduction in quality; (3) that the companies charge their advertising as expenses of doing business so that in reality they are paid, if not in whole, at least in large part, by the United States Treasury. We taxpayers are making allowances to the oil interests out of their income taxes which they use to build up public favor with the press in return for which, as a whole, the newspapers of the United States today are so little critical of the oil interests that they will not even print the news if it is regarded as being even slightly adverse. They go further and lower soundproof curtains around any man who insists that further favors be denied this already greatly pampered private interest.

One is tempted to paraphrase the great utterance of Abraham Lincoln's, "Ours is a Government of petroleum, by petroleum, for petroleum."

Grazing Problems of Blackfeet Indians of Montana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, during the past few months a situation has arisen on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in Montana which has been a source of great concern to me. The members of the Blackfeet Tribe had protested action by the Bureau of Indian Affairs in issuing grazing permits for the use of some Indian land over the objections of the Blackfeet Tribal Council. This council had adopted several resolutions—all by unanimous votes—withholding consent to such sales of grazing permits. The Indians contended that the action of the Bureau was in defiance of the Federal laws requiring the "consent of the tribe" before such transactions could be effected.

Adding to the friction between the Blackfeet Tribe and the Indian Bureau were several other points of contention, one of which was a proposed increase by the Indian Bureau in the minimum grazing fees for allotted Indian lands, which would have been very injurious to the Indians who engaged in the raising of livestock on a limited scale. This proposed increase, while it might not have been disadvantageous to large-scale livestock men, could easily have made it impossible for many Indians to bid on grazing permits because of the prohibitive fees.

On these issues, an appeal was recently submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for a determination on all questions. I am happy to say that a final decision favorable to the Indians has just been made, and it is indeed gratifying to me to know that the Indian Bureau will no longer lease Blackfeet tribal lands without tribal consent, and that hereafter Blackfeet Indian range users will be exempt from all restrictions not applied to non-Indians.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an unusually well-informed comment on the Blackfeet problem which appeared recently in the New York Times.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

BLACKFEET ON THE WARPATH

It has been many a year since the Blackfeet Indians of Montana have been in the news. In the newspapers of a hundred years ago and less they were in them all too frequently, as all who ran up against them agreed. What brings them back into the news today is no exploring party wiped out, no wagon train waylaid, no Army fort attacked, but a simple and chronic quarrel between Indians and whites, over the use of Indian lands for grazing. That's the very place where many a good western movie has begun. The Indian Bureau, so the Blackfeet tribal council says, is violating the law by issuing grazing permits for the use of Indian land without tribal consent. The chairman of the council further adds that the Indian Bureau "is doing its best to stir up an old-fashioned cowboy and Indian war."

BLACKFEET FOR BUFFALO

A century ago the Blackfeet were one of the leading plains tribes of Indians. They and their fathers before them camped and hunted from the north Saskatchewan to the headwaters of the Missouri, over thousands of miles of land, pitching their circular tents wherever the buffalo might be, as unrooted as the wind of the prairies. They were a warlike people and famous for their horsemanship. By their own folklore they were an ancient people; the sun had been their mentor. It was the sun who told one ancestor how he might best catch buffalo, by rubbing his feet with a black medicine. From that prescription came the tribal name.

THE ROAD WEST

The Blackfeet could defend their range, far up into Canada and as far south as the Great Salt Lake, against invasion by other tribes, and they tried to defend it against the invasion of the white man. They were one of the hazards to any exploration of the Northwest. Time and again the explorers' chronicles of a century ago include the line, "• • • then we were attacked by the Blackfeet." They might hold their range against the Crow and the Assiniboine, but they lost out against the white man. In 1855 they were pushed onto a reservation that ran from the Continental Divide to the Dakotas. Once cornered there, the white man used two lethal weapons against them—the whisky bottle and control over food supplies as the number of buffalo decreased. During the winter of 1883, when Government rations to the Blackfeet were reduced, more than 600 died.

TWO THOUSAND THREE HUNDRED AND FORTY-THREE SQUARE MILES

Today the few thousand remaining Blackfeet live on their reservation in the northwest corner of the State, by the little town of Browning. The whole tribe owns 2,343 square miles of land, much of it of little value; the average family has about 400 acres. The Blackfeet garden a bit and raise a few cattle. Many of them have gone to Indian schools and speak much better English than the passing tourist who believes that the one universal phrase among all Indians is "Heap big chief, ugh." Over the years their huge reservation has been whittled away from them—often, to be sure, at a price. They were eventually paid $450,000 for land taken from them by Executive orders of Presidents Grant and Hayes. They got another $1,500,000 for the eastern part of Glacier National Park, which was cut out of their reservation. Some of that money went for irrigation, the rest for avocation. Today they receive some income as royalty payments from nearby oil wells.

A NEW WEAPON

Times change. Faced with what they considered encroachment on their lands a century ago, they would have come riding in silently on the usurpers by night. The rosy dawn would have shown not one live Indian for miles around, nor one live usurper. Today it is different. The chairman of the Blackfeet Tribal Council tells reporters of the wrongs he feels being done to his people. "The Indian Bureau," he says, "is fooling some cattlemen and sheepmen by telling them that the Blackfeet Council has consented to grazing permits, when, in fact, the council has adopted several resolutions, all by unanimous vote, withholding consent."

Resolutions? Unanimous vote? Withholding consent? Instead of answering with arrow, tomahawk, or Winchester stolen from an Army fort on the upper Big Horn, the Blackfeet today do battle armed with Robert's Rules of Order.

The Visit of the President of France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a column by one of our great journalists, Anne O'Hare McCormick, printed in the New York Times of April 4. There are many who feel that Mrs. McCormick's columns show more insight into the problems of our foreign policy than those of any other journalist. This column appeals to me not merely because I was so deeply impressed and emotionally moved by President Auriol's speech to the joint session of Congress, but also because my father spent most of his life as a professor of romance languages and a teacher of French, and Mrs. McCormick reminds me of my boyhood when my father and mother gave me undying respect for the French people and the great and unrivalled traditions of French culture.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABROAD—THE STARS AND STRIPES AND THE TRICOLOR

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

This week New York rolled out the red carpet and waved the flags for the visit of the President of the French Republic. It was not a perfunctory welcome. New Yorkers like to see the Tricolor and the Stars and Stripes flying side by side in the windy canyons of our town. The red, white and blues make a different pattern, but they have a special kinship, evoking memories of the time when the oldest existing great republics were young together, and stirred by the same revolutionary dream.

New York liked the glimpses it had of the smiling face of the President and the tone of the speeches he made on so many occasions. They were variations of the same theme, but a theme developed with deep sincerity, with a delightfully Gallic blend of wit and seriousness, and with such feeling that, though he spoke in French, listeners who did not know the language understood what he meant.

Nor was M. Auriol a perfunctory visitor. Overworked as he was in days crowded with receptions, dinners, functions of all kinds, he appeared to enjoy the whirl he was given. He was as enthusiastic and exclamatory about New York, "the audacious, the organizer, the generous, the ever-changing," as if he had not come from the city that all Frenchmen, and most other people, regard as the matchless mistress of all cities.

INSTABILITY VERSUS CHANGE

He seemed to like being here, in short. So did Mme. Auriol, and the response to this show of pleasure in our company demonstrated a rather touching fact about the United States. It shows that we feel the need to be assured that we have friends as much as other people—perhaps more, for it is doubtful if any great power before us cared so much for the opinion of others. We are so rich and self-sufficient that it is hard for allies to understand that we yearn to be loved, too. It is true, nevertheless. In bringing the two countries closer together M. Auriol gave as much as he received.

Certainly he labored hard, and successfully, to make France better understood. Before he left Paris he spent weary days and nights patching up a political crisis, and he goes back to face another. The present Government was formed to prepare for elections that cannot be postponed much longer, but for this reason it is peculiarly vulnerable to the jockeying for position of the various parties as well as to the pressure of the mounting inflation that shakes every other government. Yet M. Auriol has been at pains to point out that the constant shifts of administration that mark the course of the Fourth Republic—and the Third, for that matter—are not as significant as its continuity of policy. In his address at the mayor's dinner at the Waldorf he quoted a French writer to the effect that "under the appearances of instability there are no changes in our country, whereas in certain other countries under the appearance of stability there are changes."

It is true that under a succession of weak and precarious governments France has managed to find and maintain a middle-of-the-road course since the war. The Communists have been kept out of power and the balance between right and left has somehow been preserved. Only two Ministers, Georges Bidault and Robert Schuman, both of the same party, have directed foreign policy, with the result that it has followed a firmer and more consistent line than our own. In his attitude toward Germany, M. Schuman has not been diverted by the divagations of the United States and Britain. He has stuck stoutly to the thesis that the Schuman plan for pooling coal and steel—which means putting under joint direction the war potential of France and Germany—is the precondition to any discussion of armament. The French can be accused of obstinacy or obstructionism in international affairs but not of changing their policy with changes of government.

CONTRASTING SYSTEMS

It is true also that Britain has staged a revolution since the war under the appearance of stability. Probably no other country in history has carried out so drastic an economic and social upheaval without a sign of disorder. For 6 years the Labor Government has been the steadiest in Europe; and while it cannot function much longer on a hairline margin, there will be no violent upset if it falls. But the contrast between the political habits and behavior of France and Britain does not alter the fact that the rotating teams at the top have not interrupted the remarkable progress of French recovery or altered the direction of policy. By some dangerous legerdemain (which they enjoy) the French manage to govern without government.

M. Auriol is the head of the state. Yet in spite of the President's clear and cogent explanations of a system in which he is the one sign of continuity, it is not political France that he suggests as he moves among us. Rather he is the typical "bonhomme" of a nation which has always been stronger than its government. He is the citizen whose language we understand without translation because he speaks the "lingua franca" of free men. When he says that this France can never be neutral in a battle for freedom we believe him because he expresses something that the excesses and corruptions of democracy cannot smother, something that echoes in our own minds and hearts. This is the bedrock of the enduring understanding between America and France; we are children of the same half-forgotten revolution, and M. Auriol has done much to reestablish the kinship.

What of Congress in Atomic War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, one of the problems of the atomic age is to anticipate the destruction of key Government officials through an atomic attack and to devise a means by which the Government can continue to operate effectively with as many constitutional safeguards as is possible. A thoughtful and provocative study on this subject has been made by Clinton Rossiter, of Cornell University, which I commend to the consideration of those who are concerned with this matter. Mr. Rossiter's article is as follows:

WHAT OF CONGRESS IN ATOMIC WAR?

(By Clinton Rossiter, Cornell University)

The people of the United States are bracing themselves reluctantly for the shock of atomic war. Within the limiting framework of American political and economic freedom, preparations are being made institutionally and psychologically for a catastrophe beyond imagination. Although the pace of preparation goes on more haltingly than this country's wisest heads would like, the Korean incident has speeded up noticeably the tempo of active (military) and passive (civil) defense.

I

It does not take too extravagant an imagination to outline the probable shape of the National Government in the event of atomic war—or, more specifically, in the event of an atomic attack upon the American continent at least as devastating as 15 or 20 Hiroshimas though not so devastating as to leave no cities to salvage or people to save. A look at our present institutions of government and a review of past national emergencies (especially the first weeks of the Civil War) should result in these hard but inevitable predictions:

1. The focus of government, to which all executive and military officials will look for authority, will be the constitutional power of the President as Commander in Chief. The first President, or acting President, to face atomic war will be a Lincoln 10 times over.

2. The top governing agencies—President, department heads, Chiefs of Staff, area commanders—will operate under a Nation-wide declaration of martial law.

3. The governors of the 48 States and their executive-military subordinates—National Guard commanders, mayors, county executives, chiefs of police—will likewise govern strongly, in cooperation with Federal officials.

4. If in the next few years permanent, effective organizations of civil defense are developed at the several levels of government, these too will join in the great emergency effort.

One way or another, government will be almost completely an executive-military affair, with the accent on law and order rather than on liberty and justice. The absolute weapon will have brought absolute government. These are dismal predictions that will stick in the throat of any free citizen of this Republic, but the facts of atomic war must be faced and must be called by their right names.

II

So much for the executive branch and its key office, the Presidency. But what of our other great political institution, the Congress of the United States? Where does the National Legislature fit into this pattern of strong and arbitrary government? Before answering this question properly, one even more challenging problem must be taken into consideration: Is there a place for Congress in all-out emergency government? Indeed, is it at all desirable to have a Congress in atomic war?

The answer should be an unhesitating yes—unless Americans are to despair of the vitality of constitutional government. The uses of a legislature in periods of extreme national emergency are almost inestimable, as the British House of Commons proved in 1940–41, and as we must believe the United States Congress would prove with similar force in a similar state of affairs.

If it is the President's special duty to make emergency government effective and powerful, it is the duty of the Congress to make such government responsible and constitutional. The great functions of Congress in time of peace—legislation, appropriation, criticism, control, investigation, education—are modified, but not rendered inoperative, in time of war, even atomic war. Most important, Congress is the only institution with the residual authority to break up the emergency concentration of powers in the executive branch.

The leading arguments of those who would dispense with Congress altogether in severe crises—that unity of purpose and performance must be achieved at all costs, and that Congress would be the fly in the ointment of harmony—were exploded quite convincingly in the first weeks of the Korean emergency. In time of unmistakable national danger Congress stands as ready as the President to forget politics, personalities, and the antipathies inherent in the American system of independent executive and legislative branches.

It is a difficult role that the legislature has to play in modern crisis government, but it is one that the stage managers of democracy will dispense with at their peril. The fact that the mark of constitutional democracy at peace is a robust legislative assembly is prima facie evidence that it ought to be maintained as far as practical in time of war. Congress should not carelessly be discarded as unfit for emergency service. There may be conditions of transient crisis when it can do no more than watch and wait, but watching and waiting has saved more than one free people from destruction. And certainly in any protracted emergency the dictates of constitutional government would seem to make imperative the continuous session of the Nation's representatives.

III

A major dilemma arises if the above-mentioned premises are accepted. On one hand, it is agreed that Congress has important, even indispensable, functions in the Government which will meet atomic attack. On the other hand, the probability must be faced that Congress will be prevented physically—that is, by atomic destruction—from sitting at Washington. It is an extremely difficult affair for a deliberative, multimembered group with an established place of doing business to move to another location under emergency conditions and continue to function effectively, or even legitimately. Perhaps more important—if one can imagine Congress meeting in Mammoth Cave, Sun Valley, or Senator BYRD's apple orchard—it is altogether possible that neither House could muster a quorum, thanks to several well-placed hits and the difficulties (under State legislation) of filling vacancies in Congress, especially in the House of Representatives. The United States might well be left for a considerable length of time without a legislature meeting the requirements of the Constitution.

The solution of this dilemma is as simple as it is unusual: the statutory creation of a joint interim committee of 15 or 20 leading Members of both Houses and parties. In time of acute national emergency this committee would come into existence automatically whenever Congress could not sit, and would go out of existence just as automatically when the two Houses were able to convene. This interim committee would be given a standing mandate to act for the whole Congress in the former situation and to report to the whole Congress in the latter. Although such a committee could not be constitutionally empowered to legislate in place of Congress, it could be granted both contingent authority to declare emergency laws in or out of effect and full powers of investigation and criticism.

This supercommittee would do away with the manifest inexpediency and confusion of 10 or 12 standing committees and 30 or 40 of their subcommittees looking for trouble all over the stricken Nation. With its relations to the President and the Department of Defense carefully blocked out, as an entire body and through subcommittees of its own it could attach itself to the agencies prosecuting the emergency government. Like Walter Gagehot's famous queen, the committee would assert "the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn." Most important, it could recommend officially to the President the termination of martial law or of any other extraordinary emergency activity.

IV

Fifteen or 20 members of this committee would seem to be the largest number that could move around in a body and meet in one small room (or cave), the smallest number that would represent all important groups and interests in the American community and thus lend the Government the coalition character so essential in democratic emergency government. The personnel would have to be selected with excessive care. At least half the members would probably be ex-officio appointments—the Vice President (who could serve as chairman), the Speaker of the House, the President Pro Tempore of the Senate, the majority and minority floor leaders, and perhaps the ranking Members of the important standing committees. The remaining places would best be filled by a group of young, strong, able men of varying political and sectional backgrounds. Were such a committee of 20 being set up now, it might include Barkley, McKellar, Lucas, McMahon, Tydings, Taft, Vandenberg, Lodge, Wiley, Rayburn, McCormack, Vinson, Monroney, Kennedy, Martin, Case of New Jersey, Halleck, and three other outstanding younger Members of the House. Or perhaps some of the older men—such as Senators MCKELLAR and VANDENBERG—would have to give way to juniors with less prestige but more stamina. A line of succession 8 or 10 deep could be staked out for each place on the committee.

Obviously, this committee would be moving on untrodden ground. There is nothing in American, and less in European or Latin-American, experience to assure that an interim committee with virtually unlimited authority would operate successfully in so delicate a situation. The mere proposal of such a departure from our ancient ways presents perplexing constitutional, political, and moral difficulties. Yet, in the event of a novel type of national emergency the American political genius and the American constitutional system should both be sufficiently flexible to permit the erection of an equally novel legislative institution.

This proposal has been made in the most general terms, for it is a scheme that would have to be worked out with great deliberation and good will by the leaders of Congress and the President. The suggested interim committee, or something much like it, would be the one alternative to no Congress at all, and Americans would commit a serious mistake not to consider every feasible substitute before dispensing altogether with congressional authority in atomic war. With the bonds of civilized society loosened and unraveled, the President and his chief commanders may be forced to wield the most naked sort of power to hold the country together. In such an event, a tough-minded, able, independent committee not beholden to the President for continued existence would help mightily to keep his feet in the paths of democracy. Such an autonomous council would provide both the restraint and the support the President would find helpful in making his emergency regime effective and responsible.

Since it is to the particular interest of Congress to make its own authority felt in the event of atomic attack, it is plainly up to Congress to take the first step in this direction. The possibility of a joint interim emergency committee should be thoroughly explored in the Eighty-second Congress.

Proposed Deferment of College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial regarding the proposed deferment of college students, recently published in the Port Washington Herald, of Port Washington, Wis.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WANTED: AN ANSWER

"President Truman in a sweeping order Saturday authorized draft deferments for hundreds of thousands of college boys whose grades are good or who pass a special aptitude test."

Why?

To provide future leaders of this Nation? There is no doubt but what this country could stand some trained men at the helm. And neither is there any doubt but what college training is necessary for that task.

But is it fair to defer men who have an opportunity to attend college while those less privileged are to be drafted?

The argument is offered that the test is based on aptitude. If that is true, why can't these youths, who purportedly are the future leaders of the Nation, serve as all other men must do? And if these youths have this alleged superior ability, couldn't they resume their studies after their term of service as was done after the second blood draining contest?

Or is it possible that life is so much more dear for these elite than for those of the common herd that it must be preserved?

The sweeping order is an ill concealed attempt to save the skins of those who have the financial opportunities to attend a university. It is a scheme whereby a youth, who is not a complete moron, can purchase immunity from service in the Armed Forces. What provision is made for the student, who through working for funds to finance his education, is forced to drop out one semester to build up his backlog. Regardless of his academic standing, he becomes eligible for induction.

If ever a violation of the Constitution was flaunted in the face of the American public, this order is that instance.

If money can protect some Americans, why not hire the Hessians and protect them all?

Why?

This question will be sent to Senators A. WILEY and J. MCCARTHY and Congressman VAN PELT.

Live Safely, Live Happily

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, John G. Decker, son of Mr. and Mrs. Woodrow Decker, of Milo, Maine, the winner of the national speaking contest sponsored by an Omaha insurance company, came to Washington Thursday, April 5, to receive an award as the winner of the contest. He was accompanied by his coach, Mrs. Pauline Kelleher, a Milo high-school teacher of English and Latin, who as a hobby attempts to interest her students in entering all writing and speaking contests. She modestly said that was the first national contest any of her students ever won.

John Decker started this whirlwind contest in February of this year by winning at his own high-school contest with the delivery of the self-written address which I hold in my hand. He then went on to the State of Maine finals in Bangor, Maine, and as the winner of the Maine contest journeyed to New Hampshire, again to defeat the two other entries in the northern New England region. The next stop for the young orator was New York City, to compete with the finalists from the eight other United States regions. The happy ending is that John Decker won the national speaking contest, and as the winner receives a $1,000 scholarship to any college of his choice, and since John is a high-school senior, this scholarship is most opportune. His high school also receives a $1,000 award. The brief Washington visit was terminated Thursday afternoon at 3:30 as Vice President BARKLEY extended his congratulations.

With such talent and such financial assurance of his future, John Decker is a very lucky young man. I extend to him my congratulations and best wishes.

Mr. Decker's oration makes very good reading, and I believe the Members of this body would enjoy it. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIVE SAFELY, LIVE HAPPILY

(By John G. Decker)

In my fancy, I have created the pleasant, average American town of Smithville, United States of America. It could be in California or Tennessee, or it could be in Maine. Children romp in the pleasant streets. Their merry shouts fill the crisp, autumn air. There is a flash of a careening car, a shriek of brakes and the car comes to a jerking stop—but too late. As the quickly gathered crowd raises the broken body of a child there arises a solemn and often heard murmur; "He was speeding."

It is a bright summer's day. On the shores of Lake Windermere, England's knight of speed, Sir Henry Seagrave, steps into his powerful twin-engined speed craft. He is strapped into the seat and the engines start. Out across the placid waters shoots the powerful craft. He deftly makes the circuit once, twice, then suddenly, as he speeds by the third time, the powerful motors literally rip the boat apart. Tragedy reigns, and Mercury, the God of Speed, has taken another life. Comes the echo; "He was speeding."

The night is dark, the moon has flitted behind a cloud, the engineer of a great streamlined train speeding across the continent wants to get home to his wife and children. He opens the throttle just a little wider. The great iron monster shudders as it rounds the last turns on the road home, and with a violent snap flicks off the tracks.

Speed again has taken its toll. It has once again deprived many of their desire to live safely, to live happily.

These incidents are typical of the cost we pay for speed and more speed. Each year these incidents and many like them are multiplied many thousands of times, in our homes, on our highways, and in our factories.

Our mania for speed is characteristic of our everyday life. We begin our day in our factory or school where the highest virtue is speed. After a half day spent in this atmosphere we rush across the streets barely missing onrushing cars with their drivers also bent on speed. We eat a quick lunch and repeat the same performance for the afternoon. At night we probably dance to a speedy, fast jazz band, finally going to bed to take a quick sleep to wake the next morning to start the new day in a world with too much speed. We are living to the tune of hurrying feet and the hum and buzz of speed in general.

Speed is a wonderful thing. It has enabled us to rise to a great Nation, in fact, the greatest of all nations both commercially and economically, but it has also pushed us towards attaining the high accident and death rate that we now have. Our fire trucks and fighter planes need to be swift and speedy, and our doctor's hands need to be fast and sure, but it is the misapplication of this type of speed that is costing us thousands of lives each year. We who have made speed our slave are now letting it backfire and become our master. Speed must not be allowed to take the driver's seats in our cars, our planes, and our lives in order for Americans to live safely, to live happily.

America is looking through eyes that see not: they do not see that child playing in the road; they do not see that car coming at them as they stop from the sidewalk; they do not see that the faster you go does not necessarily mean you will reach your destination quicker. Their mind is possessed with one word—speed. Our cemeteries are full of people who looked through eyes that did not see. Americans must make a choice; whether to be speed demons or to stop, look, and listen once in a while and live a little safer and a lot longer.

A man, sometimes young, sometimes middle-aged or older, takes a drink or two on the way home from the club in the late evening. Not a great deal, but just a little; anyway, just a little drink couldn't hurt anybody. As he nears the suburbs the smooth concrete just seems to roll away under his vision and he presses a little harder on the accelerator. "Joe Smith only got 80 miles an hour out of his car on this stretch, but I know I can beat that without even trying." He is beating Joe Smith's record, too, even though he doesn't see that car coming from the side road with his best friend, Tom Brown, in it. His name was in the headlines the next day—not for breaking Joe Smith's record but for putting his best friend in the hospital for weeks and demolishing his new car. Just a little drink—but it helped no one to live more happily. Speeding and its devastating effects cannot be confined to the highway alone, either. It harbors itself in the home when Dad trips on Junior's toys, at school when we trip on the stairs, and in the workshop when the worker loses a finger trying to be just a little more efficient and, above all, a little speedier. Safety devices help but many are not foolproof.

In the fall of the year, in our State of Maine, thousands of hunters take to the woods in search of deer and other game. But last year and in previous years this army took the lives of more than a score of their buddies. Why? Because some of them were after just one thing and didn't care how they got it. They shot and looked later. They were in too much of a hurry to let others live safely—live happily.

There are many other types of accidents and one of the most disastrous of these is fires. Yet, one of these tragedies takes place every 20 seconds. Ninety percent of these are caused by pure carelessness. Why do people gamble with so many lives and homes at stake? The odds are against them and they know it, but they continue every 20 seconds to break a home, burn a building, and destroy the happiness of many.

These types of accidents are no respecter of persons; they strike in all places and against all colors and creeds, in the home, at the individual and at the masses.

An incident that illustrates this happened not many weeks ago. Over the Yankee network flashed the news bulletin of the crash of a troop train near Wilkes-Barre, Pa. More than a score of American soldiers on their way to fight for a great cause were killed in this tragedy. During the mass funeral the tolling of the great bells of every church, Catholic and Protestant alike, filled the great Wyoming Valley.

Yes, the effects of accidents are no respecter of persons and we encounter them wherever we go—from the man in the office who would always make a fast buck if he could, but would gamble his life away in trying to get across the road a little faster, to the boy in the home who is just too busy to take care of his toys.

America is often called the melting pot of nations because of the many races and creeds of which it is made up. But no race or creed has escaped the ravages of speed and accidents in the United States.

All have suffered, and all will continue to suffer until the people of America come to the realization that man is not invincible, and that he's rapidly losing his dominion over speed and machines.

A week ago yesterday the newspapers carried a striking headline "61 killed in railroad wreck." A jam-packed Pennsylvania commuter train was speeding along and suddenly derailed. The cars telescoped into a mass of sharp, deadly metal wreckage killing 61 passengers instantly. The cause? One passenger who was lucky enough to escape injury said, "I noticed the engineer trying to stop her. He was doing his level best to hold her back. He was trying to stop her." But a little push on the throttle turned this train into a raging monster.

Engines and machines can be rebuilt, and new parts substituted for old, but the human body is not so constructed. A pair of eyes once gone is gone forever. A life once taken can never be restored. Americans of today don't seem to realize this. They're continually letting machines, the slaves, speed, the slave, become the masters, the captains of our lives. America must examine herself and come to the realization that we're headed down the wrong road and we're going too fast. We must stop, look, and listen in order to live safely—to live happily.

No Wonder the Senator Wept

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the House an editorial which appeared in the Los Angeles Mirror on Monday, March 19, 1951. This editorial is another discussion of the sad plight of our Government as a result of the present low level of ethics now prevailing.

Mr. T. B. Cosgrove, an attorney and a prominent civic leader in Los Angeles, has directed my attention to this editorial. I believe that every Member of the House will find it worthy of consideration. It follows:

NO WONDER THE SENATOR WEPT

The picture of aging Senator TOBEY of New Hampshire weeping for a return to moral and ethical values in the United States made a dramatic moment in the Kefauver crime investigation hearings.

Well might the Senators weep, and honest Americans with them.

No one can read the headlines from Washington for the past 6 months without a deep feeling that the United States is suffering from moral atrophy and ethical dry rot.

While American kids are dying in Korea, smart operators with White House connections are getting theirs in ways which are shady, if not illegal.

Fast buck boys with an in are placed in fat jobs with companies beholden to the RFC for loans made with tax money, at the behest of Bill Boyle, the national chairman of the Democratic Party. (RFC Director Walter Lee Dunham testified that Boyle and Donald Dawson, a White House employee, had pressured him to find places for their pets in such companies.)

A White House stenographer gets a $9,450 mink coat, charged to the account of a lawyer operating with unusual success before the RFC. Her husband gets an $18,000-a-year job with Lustron, Inc., obligated to RFC for a $37,500,000 loan, and does no work for his $1,500-a-month salary. He had an "in." He worked for Boyle as advance man for several Presidential tours.

A former Congressman testified that a syndicate of Washington smarties engineered a deal to buy surplus tankers. They put up only $100,000 capital, and cut up a $5,000,000 profit melon. They knew the right people.

Gen. Harry Vaughan, the President's pal, pressured Government officials to cut corners in sugar allocations for his political playmates, and was all messed up in the deep freeze "gifts" to top brass.

This week's latest scandal, which passes almost unnoticed, is the disclosure that the Coast Guard is providing a safe draft dodgers' paradise for the young sons and nephews of Washington "insiders."

The Coast Guard is at full strength, but they are enlisting around 40 recruits a week, almost all of the them from Washington, most of them draft eligible who are kinfolks of VIPs. There have been instances where these favored relatives have been driven to the USCG recruiting offices in Government limousines.

A special port brigade has been set up in Washington by the USCG, a happy billet for draft evaders. They only have to report for a drill once a week, but it makes them draft-proof.

This country and our way of life are gravely threatened by the vicious march of communism in the world. That is not the only threat to this country, however. The threat of rot and corruption and special privilege is serious.

By the strict letter of the law, these shady Washington deals may not be penal offenses, but they are moral offenses. Enrichment of insiders by favoritism is not less wrong in 1951 Washington than it was in Rome of 50 B. C. or Marie Antoinette's Paris.

It was heart-rot that caused the collapse of Rome and France, the atrophy of public morals, the greed of smart operators with an "in."

It could happen here.

Senator TOBEY wept openly at disclosures that the whole fabric of Government is shot through with "fixes" and "ins." It may be the tragedy of our time that so few men weep, or even pay much attention, as the tradition of clean Government grows daily more smirched.

The Burden of Taxation in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a front-page editorial entitled "Down the Road to Disaster," published in the Philadelphia Dispatch of April 1, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOWN THE ROAD TO DISASTER

Taxation in the United States is now approaching a point where a citizen is practically working for the Government.

With Federal, State, and city taxes growing by leaps and bounds, the people are now asking just when and where this tax octopus is going to stop. Taxes just can't rise forever.

The time is not far away when the Government will take most of the earned dollar from the pocket of the taxpayer. With three forms of Government taking a bite from the dollar, just what will the taxpayer have left?

Already the flow of new capital into private business has been slackened because the Government gets an increasing slice of profits. Incentive of the individual has been crippled.

Responsible officials who continue to find the easiest way out by imposing new taxes should take time out and read the history of the world to see what happens to nations which have bled the taxpayers white.

The Townsend Clubs Are Here To Stay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, whenever a red-hot issue of the Binghamton Press which directly or indirectly concerns your Congressman comes off the rollers, somebody manages to waylay the issue which comes to my Washington desk. This has happened on a number of occasions, so I realize there is collusion somewhere.

Therefore I did not see the vicious attack upon the Townsend organization of Broome County in last Friday's issue. The Press issues of Thursday, Saturday, and Sunday had reached me, but I was still curious about what happened Friday.

I found out soon enough; and, for their information, all I have to do is obtain a copy from the Library of Congress. I will doubtless continue to see the missing Press issues through this medium as I do not think they will dare hold up the copy that the Library receives.

Friday's Press carried what I thought it would, a scathing affront upon the whole Townsend movement by the mayor of Binghamton.

It is well known that some of the wealthy advertisers of local newspapers have sworn to get the Townsendites because they allow free speech in their meetings. Not being able to control their leaders or members, the bosses are determined the Townsend clubs must go.

They chose the mayor of Binghamton to sound off their initial blast, because he has been presented to the public by the Binghamton Press in a simon-pure role without a flaw or a word ever having been said against him.

I am predicting that he will neither scare the Townsend clubs out of existence in the Triple Cities nor weaken their position as the strongest political group in the southern tier.

In 1940, the present mayor of Binghamton ran against your Congressman and was supported by the press, the old guard, and every other pompous antagonist I ever had in Broome County. The record shows that the greatest plurality ever amassed by any candidate in our section was given to me, not because I was especially outstanding, but because the people had absolutely no use for the type of opposition they lined up against me.

The same gang is now dedicated to breaking up the Townsend organization, once and for all and they will go to gangster lengths to accomplish it. I might add this mob is nonpartisan.

But they can count on my getting into this fight on the side of the Americans in the Townsend movement. They can be sure that I will not stand idly by and let them ruin the painstaking work of so many years put forth by the Townsendites.

If they should succeed, because of their widespread real-estate holdings, to deprive Townsend clubs of places to assemble, thus violating the United States Constitution and further presecuting the Americans of my district, I will personally see to it that fitting places are provided in the Triple Cities for the Townsend clubs to meet.

The mayor may be all-powerful, with the weight of the press behind him, the force of radio, and the might of financial wizards as backers, but he cannot blot out the Townsend clubs from the valley of opportunity.

They are there to stay.

Necessity of an American Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the question has been raised more than once, in connection with proposed legislation to aid the United States merchant marine, Why a merchant marine?

An article in the Mooremack News for March 1951, entitled "Korean Epic," and an editorial entitled "Why a Merchant Marine?" give very persuasive answers to the question as to the need of maintaining and supporting a merchant marine whose first loyalty and efforts will be devoted to the interests of the United States in war as well as in peace.

I ask unanimous consent that the article and editorial be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Mooremack News of March 1951]

KOREAN EPIC

In the past few weeks stories have drifted back from Korea, through letters and news dispatches, feature pieces in the newspapers, and official Washington statements, telling of the tremendous role played by American merchant ships in the difficult tasks faced by the United Nations forces in the Pacific war.

Moore-McCormack Lines has been honored by the participation of several of its ships in the operation, including the most fantastic incident of all, involving the vessel Meredith Victory which, late in December, evacuated more than 14,000 persons from Hungnam, Korea, to Pusan, a nightmarish voyage that lasted three terrible days.

Both the Mormacmoon and the Hunter Victory which, along with the Meredith Victory, have been under charter by Mooremack to the Military Sea Transportation Service, also have written chapters in this newest record of achievement and have been accorded formal acknowledgment by the Governmen*.

The Meredith Victory story, however, tops everything else in sheer drama. Indeed, when the first reports came in, officials of Military Sea Transportation Service and Mooremack expressed disbelief that this ship, built to carry 12 passengers, commanded by Capt. L. P. LaRue, of Philadelphia, had actually carried 14,000. But quick checks supported the first report, and letters from men who were aboard.

Hardly were the fear-driven passengers aboard the ship after a desperate flight across the country, according to Dino S. Savastio, the ship's mate, than calls came to help with the delivery of mothers, five of whom gave birth within the first 24 hours. "There I stood with babies all around and something doing every minute," he wrote his parents in Franklin Square, Long Island, as reported by the Nassau County paper Newsday.

The Philadelphia Bulletin, reporting the Meredith Victory story with special relish since her master, Capt. L. P. LaRue, is a native of that city, said that the crew had loaded the 14,000 Koreans by using booms and makeshift elevators and when the ship was loaded, she shoved off. One picture, reproduced on this page, shows a makeshift elevator in operation.

Formal naval commendation for their work came to all of the Mooremack ships and to those of other operators as well. Vice Admiral C. T. Joy, USN, of the Far East command, sent this message to Captain LaRue:

"My most sincere congratulations on a job well done. Your performance throughout the Korean campaign has always been notable. In the successful redeployment of ground forces from northeast Korea your initiative and your enthusiastic and prompt response to all demands indicate that your organization is at its best when the chips are down. The merchant mariners who performed for you did so silently but their accomplishment speaks loudly. I find it comforting to work with such teammates."

Capt. A. F. Junker, USN, Deputy Commander of the MSTS, Western Pacific, transmitting Admiral Joy's message, added this on his own: "The cooperation and assistance of the merchant marine in the above-mentioned operation adds but one more page of glory to merchant-marine history, and I desire to add my own congratulations to those of Admiral Joy."

Charles Regal, editor of the column, Down the Hatch, for the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, wrote:

"Man of the year in this, man of the year in that. How about the ship of the year? As far as Down the Hatch is concerned, 1950's outstanding merchant ship was the steamship Meredith Victory, the ship that on December 22 evacuated 14,000 South Korean refugees in one load."

Mr. Regal quoted Capt. Raymond Fosse of the transport Sergeant Truman Kimbro, as follows, describing his thought when he saw the Meredith Victory approach Pusan:

"When we first saw that Victory ship we couldn't figure out what in the world it had on deck. From a distance it was simply a dark, solid mass. As the ship came nearer we could see it was human beings. They were packed so close you wondered how they could breathe. And there wasn't a sound from them. They just stood there, silently, waiting. Even the babies and children were strangely quiet. Unless you saw it, you couldn't believe it."

Mr. Regal said of the Meredith Victory's 14,000: "That surely was the largest number of persons ever taken aboard a freighter, of any size, and it may be the largest load ever taken by any ship. The Queen Mary (81,235 gross tons) reportedly averaged ten to twelve thousands troops during the war. (The Meredith Victory is listed at 7,607 tons)." Inquiry at the New York offices of the Cunard White Star Line revealed that the largest passenger load ever carried by either of the Queen ships during the war was 15,000. The Queen Elizabeth in peacetime can carry 2,200 passengers, the Queen Mary, 2,000, as against the Meredith Victory's 14,000. The feat of the latter at Korea becomes the more striking on the basis of comparison.

The Mormacmoon, too, found drama when she was assigned to the Hungnam operation to pick up 2,800 evacuees. The Koreans, carrying rations of fish and rice, were sent to the ship's hold where many of them climbed into trucks and, despite orders from the ship's officers, proceeded to run truck motors to offset the cold. Fifty Koreans were overcome by the fumes, and their lives were saved only because the ship's officers carried them to the deck and worked on them. This detail of the story, also carried by Newsday, was reported in a letter by James G. Wilkerson, her second mate, of Bellerose, Long Island, to his parents.

The effort of the Hunter Victory in this operation may be gaged by the following letter to the president of Moore-McCormack Lines, sent from Pusan by the Reverend Father P. H. Cleary, a chaplain, a member of the Maryknoll order of priests:

"Permit me to convey to you an expression of congratulations and sincere thanks for the splendid conduct of the officers and crew of your ship Hunter Victory in its recent evacuation operation of our forces from Hungnam to Pusan.

"The group with which I came out, Tenth Corps, loaded Saturday night, December 16, left Hungnam early Sunday morning, the 17th, arrived Pusan Tuesday the 19th.

"As we neared Pusan, I have never heard of any ship's personnel from all sides such acclamations of praise as came spontaneously from the officers of the Tenth Corps for the officers and crew of the Hunter Victory. The way they had gone all out to take care of us and make us as comfortable as possible at the cost of innumerable privations and actual hardships to themselves was the general topic of conversation among the groups of Army men wherever they gathered about the ship. The gratitude of all was sincere and deep. Personally, the officer whom I wish to commend most highly is the chief steward, Mr. John J. McGee. He went all out, performed a difficult job with unfailing courtesy and good humor successfully and to the delight of all aboard.

"I know that several of the Tenth Corps officers intended to write you to express their thanks and appreciation. The press of present circumstances of war and the crowded conditions here at the port may prevent their doing so. As the Catholic chaplain aboard, I wish to perform the very pleasant duty of addressing you in their behalf. Only the conditions I have just referred to have prevented me from doing so more promptly.

"With every assurance of grateful respect for you and your worthy representatives on the Hunter Victory."

A. V. Moore, president of the company, replying to Father Cleary, expressed his appreciation and that of the company, advised Father Cleary that he was sending a copy of the letter to Captain Preusch and Chief Steward McGee, and added:

"I know all the officers and crew of the Hunter Victory will indeed be most pleased to see that their efforts to serve under extremely difficult conditions were so well received. Yes, indeed, all of us admire the courage of all those engaged in this present crisis in Korea. May the prayers of those at home help to speed a just peace and end this worldly unrest."

Capt. Philip W. Atkinson, of the Mormacmoon, is a veteran Mooremack skipper. A native of Fitchburg, Mass., he worked up to chief officer through several of the company's ships, including the Saquache, the Carplaka, Argosy, Scanmail, Scanpenn, Scanstates, Scanyork, and others, and got his first command in 1936, the Cliffwood.

Captain LaRue won promotions through chief officer and became master of the Smith Thompson in 1944, then the George B. McClellan, and the Whittier Victory. He served 6 months as first officer of the Uruguay, commanded the Deborah Gannett and the Mormacwren before taking command of the Meredith Victory in July of 1950.

Capt. Charles H. Preusch, of the Hunter Victory, was born in Elmhurst, went to sea after his high-school work, as an assistant purser, then studied at City College, worked as a clerk and mechanic until he entered the Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point in 1942. He was graduated in 1944, worked up from cadet through chief mate on several ships and obtained his first command, the Hunter Victory, in August of 1950.

[From the Mooremack News of March 1951]

WHY A MERCHANT MARINE?

Every so often the question is raised—Why a merchant marine? The fact that it has been answered a thousand times seems not to matter; again and again the facts must be presented in reply to the arguments that you can build a ship at lower cost in a foreign yard, and man her much more cheaply with non-Americans. So why not build our ships in foreign yards? And why not man them with foreigners and operate them under another flag? Why not, indeed?

Of course, anyone who knows the story of the merchant fleet in the recent war does not ask these questions. The men who served in the war and saw our ships in action as transports of men and matériél, especially those high officers of Army and Navy who have openly and gladly conceded that their branches of our Armed Forces could never have achieved their wartime records without the help of merchant ships, are not likely to ask, either. But unfortunately such folk appear to be in the minority.

Something of a new type of answer may be found on pages 4 and 5 of this issue of the Mooremack News, in the stories of the Mormacmoon, the Meredith Victory, and the Hunter Victory. When reading that story, remember that the United States is not now at war, that we as a Nation are merely participating in Korea as a unit of the United Nations.

But these American merchant ships have served, nevertheless, as part of our Nation's contribution to the great cause that involves the democratic peoples of the world. Because we have merchant ships we were able to send them to help with such tasks as that article describes.

Imagine a ship built to accommodate 12 passengers, and in an emergency moving 14,000 panic-stricken souls from the scene of their peril, the young officers burdened with problems beyond anything they had ever imagined in their days of training. That is the Meredith Victory's story. Yet she was only one of more than 300 ships, merchant ships, at work on the Korean assignment.

Assistant Secretary of the Navy Koehler, addressing the Propeller Club of the Port of New York, in January, described the Hungnam evacuation, the operation in which the Meredith Victory achieved her almost unbelievable feat. He said that "in the face of greatest possible odds, despite the handicaps of terrain and worse weather, and regardless of enemy assaults, the Navy safely loaded aboard ship and evacuated 105,000 fighting men, 100,000 civilians, 17,500 vehicles and 350,000 measurement tons of material."

Quoting Vice Admiral Struble, who was present at the operation, he said that for the first time in history, "an entire army with all its supplies and equipment has been successfully deployed by sea in the face of emergency pressure." Then Mr. Koehler added, as his own words, the following very significant and very gallant expression of the sentiments of the Navy:

"While this is no time for self-adulation, to suppress a surge of pride at this accomplishment would be somewhat less than human. Nor should I fail to point out to you that it would obviously have been a physical impossibility to carry out this staggering task without the ships and crews of the American merchant marine who were a vital component of this operation.

"Not only at Hungnam, but at Pusan, Inchon, and other Korean ports these merchant vessesl have played vital roles in every operation since hostilities began. Consequently, our traditional 'Well done' goes equally to the American merchant marine and to the Navy."

If additional figures are needed, here are a few. In a 4-month period following the outbreak of the Korean hostilities nearly 4,000,000 tons of cargo, exclusive of petroleum products, were moved from the continental United States to the Pacific theater in support of the United Nations forces. Of this, more than 80 percent moved in privately owned American flag ships. In addition, 185,000 military passengers were moved to the fighting front.

Any sound student of national defense or national economy will explain quickly enough that the merchant marine stands abreast the Army, Navy, and Air Force in the waging of war, an essential peacetime protection to our foreign trade in the fierce competition that exists for markets throughout the world. They will point out, too, that millions of dollars spent in labor and materials in the construction of a ship and then in operating her, are part of our national income. They would not be if the ship were built abroad and manned by foreign crews.

The distressing feature of all this is that the lesson seems never really to be absorbed. There must be other Hungnams, other Meredith Victories. And even then we will find ourselves facing that question: Why a merchant marine?

Overseas Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK T. BOW
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution unanimously adopted on February 8, 1951, at the regular session of American Legion Post No. 519 of Mineral City, Ohio:

Inasmuch as we are in an undeclared war, or police action, in Korea, and our boys have not been told why they are fighting, and our casualties are mounting higher, and none of our leaders can give us any information as to what we expect to gain; we hereby request that our troops be withdrawn from Korea and returned home, and furthermore we urge that no more troops be sent overseas to fight the battle of the world unless it is on a voluntary basis. Several States have already passed the same resolution and the issue is being pressed by some of the biggest men in the Nation.

We do not believe that it is just or right that a boy born in America must face years of military service for the sake of a foreign entanglement and we further resolve that the power to wage an undeclared war or police action rest solely in the hands of Congress, who are the sole representatives of the people, that we may not be involved in any more Koreas.

We believe these measures are in the best interest of our beloved country, that it may serve the purpose of saving our economy, our resources, and our youth.

A Second Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Lowell (Mass.) Sun of April 6, 1951:

A SECOND FRONT

A second front on the Chinese mainland has been proposed by General MacArthur in a letter to Congressman MARTIN of Massachusetts, minority leader in the House.

The commander in Asia believes the time has come when the United States and the United Nations must take a realistic view of the position of the Chinese Nationalist forces under Chiang Kai-shek in Formosa, and without too much delay agree that this Chinese force, poised for action when given the word, must enter the campaign in Asia.

General MacArthur wants a second front on the Chinese mainland with Chiang's armies, reinforced by American equipment and military strategists, leading the campaign against the Chinese Communists. That, of course, would immediately relieve pressure in Korea; it would mean that the Chinese Reds would be caught in a great pincer movement. It is doubtful that they could escape, unless given help from the Soviets.

Up to this point, the arguments against using Chinese Nationalists have been based primarily on the opinion that by giving the green light to Chiang, the Russian Reds would immediately become active belligerents and world war III would be started.

Russia, however, is not so devoted to the Chinese that it is going to enter a "do or die" campaign in China. A second front, added to the present retreat of the Chinese Reds in Korea, would be enough to convince the war lords in Moscow that this is no time to jump into a losing cause.

General MacArthur has no doubt weighed all the possibilities of his proposal to use the Chinese Nationalists before sending them on to Washington. He is certainly not anxious to advocate any arrangement which will automatically touch off the big guns of world war III.

Meanwhile, however, we again repeat that this would be an excellent time for General MacArthur to come back to the United States to have a few direct talks with both the President and Congress. Letter-writing serves a purpose, but direct contact would be much more beneficial in unpredictable situations such as we are now in. Moreover, we believe that if the able commander in Korea should come to Washington for but a flying visit and should place all of his ideas on the congressional table—making certain allowances for military security—he would be given complete sanction to move ahead in his own capable way. He might not have any difficulty in convincing this Government of the advantages of a second front with the Chinese Nationalist forces in the front ranks.

Illegal Mexican Immigration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a series of five articles by Gladwin Hill, dealing with the illegal Mexican immigration into Southwest United States, which appeared in the New York Times March 25 to 29. Notwithstanding the estimated cost of printing these articles is $430.50, it is most timely that the economic and sociological problems analyzed in them be now brought to the attention of Senators and Representatives. The Nation's manpower needs are becoming acute. The agreement with Mexico is up for renewal. Legislation is about to be reported out in the House and Senate. The report of the President's Commission on Migrant Farm Labor has just emphasized again the grave consequences of our neglect of this situation. And the so-called wet-back traffic affords alarming opportunities for the entry of Communist spies and saboteurs.

The New York Times has again performed a significant public service in arranging for this survey and printing its findings on this problem.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of March 25, 1951]

MILLION A YEAR FLEE MEXICO ONLY TO FIND PEONAGE HERE—ILLEGAL MIGRATION ACROSS 1,600-MILE BORDER BY SEASONAL SLAVE LABOR DEPRESSES LATIN AND UNITED STATES LEVELS ALIKE

(By Gladwin Hill)

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., March 24.—A visitor to the Southwest today has to make a double mental adjustment to comprehend the conditions he finds.

First, he has to think back 20 years to prohibition days, when wholesale violation of the laws of the United States was being ignored, tacitly sanctioned or overtly encouraged by a large cross-section of the population.

Second, he has to project himself in imagination back a full century to the days of slavery, when the systematic exploitation of an underprivileged class of humanity as cheap labor was an accepted part of the American social and economic order.

Then the observer has to compound mentally these two diverse anomalies and conceive of their existence in 1951.

For that, in effect, is the situation today in the Southwest, and in parts of the deep South and the far West as well, arising from the ceaseless and steadily increasing tide of illegal immigration from Mexico into the United States.

This illegal immigration now amounts to more than 1,000,000 individuals a year. They sneak across the thinly patrolled 1,600-mile border between Brownsville, Tex., and San Diego, Calif., in an unending hegira from Mexican unemployment and wage levels as low as 40 cents a day, seeking farm work and any other labor available in this country.

Some 500,000 of these wetbacks—so-called because of those who swim the Rio Grande, the Texas-Mexico boundary—were caught by the United States Immigration and Naturalization Services' border patrol last year and put back across the international line.

The estimate of a total traffic of 1,000,000 is conservative, based on the surmise that for every one caught there is one who isn't caught. Most immigration officers would concede a more likely average of 5 or 10 to 1, and for some areas responsible estimates go as high as 100 to 1; in such a reckoning many of the total would be not different individuals, but repeaters who recross after having been deported.

There are fewer than 900 border patrol officers to guard the whole 1,600 miles of boundary, and sometimes the deportees get back into the United States before the deporting officers do. Some Mexicans have been deported as many as 20 times, only to return again and again.

SOME RETURN, SOME STAY

A large number of wetbacks regularly slip back into Mexico after seasonal farm work ends. But tens of thousands of others have remained in the United States, managing to settle down in semihiding in hundreds of communities along the border, or becoming transient laborers and filtering northward over the western half of the country all the way to the Canadian border.

Technically every one of these wetbacks is an illegal alien, the same as a foreigner who slipped through the paradoxically tight immigration patrols at Ellis Island—a violator of the Federal law, subject to imprisonment.

But because the bulk of this immigration is tidal, advancing and receding with the regularity of the seasons, it has come to be taken for granted, both by the United States border population and the Nation at large.

Superficially, the wetback traffic is just a picturesque cat-and-mouse game on a grand scale between a mass of amiable Latins and an overwhelmed border patrol.

In actuality, however, a year's study of the situation by this correspondent, ending in a recent 5,000-mile tour of the border area, shows it to be a phenomenon whose real economic and social implications should shock the average American when fully known and comprehended.

PEONAGE AND SLAVERY

The impression is widespread that these Mexicans simply come over as a regular essential and harmless supplement to the domestic harvest forces.

The fact is that they are attracted by the glittering prospect of high American wages, and in many cases actively recruited by large-scale ranchers or their representatives, only to work for wages that have been described by United States immigration officers as tantamount to peonage and under conditions compared on the same authority to antebellum slavery.

"This traffic in contraband labor actually is worse in its elements than either prohibition or slavery," a nationally prominent figure in the Southwest commented a few days ago. "Prohibition involved only traffic in alcohol. This is traffic in human beings. And in slavery some responsibility, at least, was acknowledged for the release of the slaves. Here there is none."

The wetback, a penniless fugitive, has to take whatever wages are offered, which, because of the multitude of wetbacks available, usually are at a bare existence level or below it. His traditional housing is the crudest form of shack or hovel, wherever he can find it, or just the open air. His status denies him access to regular community legal and welfare agencies. If he doesn't like his situation he can go back where he came from. There are thousands of other hopefuls south of the border ready to take his place.

AMERICAN LEVELS DEPRESSED

Aside from the abuses to which these Mexicans themselves are subject, the traffic in wetbacks has manifestly baneful effects on the citizenry with which they mingle.

In many sections of Texas, Arizona, California and other areas they depress the general standards of wages and working conditions below the accepted American levels. Instead of supplementing the domestic labor force they undercut it, taking jobs from tens of thousands of native citizens, farm and urban workers alike.

In the agricultural field, particularly, the resulting native displaced persons have to join the great stream of migrant labor that fans out annually northward all the way from New York to Oregon, working a good deal of the time for substandard wages and working conditions and, in turn, taking jobs from resident local workers.

From a sociological standpoint, the wetback traffic has obliterated the border completely, transforming the 3,000,000 Spanish-American citizens of the Southwest—many of whose families have been in the area for centuries—into a cultural peninsula of Mexico, retarding their assimilation, in the opinion of experts, by a generation or more, and perpetuating and aggravating some of the worst conditions of health, education and social, economic and political unintegration that can be found in the country.

Finally, the wetback traffic has engendered, in somewhat the way prohibition did, an atmosphere of amorality and warped thinking which demonstrably extends from the farmer exploiters of wetback labor through their communities and local and State officials, to the highest levels of the Federal Government.

IT'S OUT IN THE OPEN

Although this may sound sensational, the remarkable thing is that there is no secrecy about the situation. Despite an elaborate legendry that has grown up to screen it, and occasional efforts to dissimulate the facts, most of the details are matters of formal public record or common knowledge in the region.

The main problem in inquiring into it is to preserve one's sense of proportion and avoid entanglement in the falsework of rationalization that has grown up over the years to justify the system and maintain it.

The wetback situation is of particular pertinence at this time. The defense emergency has evoked official proposals for the importation of hundreds of thousands of workers from outside the continental United States.

Before Congress is a draft extension of the 1949 agreement between the United States and Mexico, which expires in June, governing the so-called "importation" of Mexican farm workers under contracts which in actuality have degenerated into the legalization of wetbacks.

Before President Truman is the initial report of the special lay commission he appointed last summer to investigate the problems of migrant farm labor and the wetback evil.

Also, it has lately been realized that the wetback traffic offers a wide-open avenue for Communist spies to enter the country. There is no public record of any having been caught lately. But immigration officers acknowledge that every year at least a handful of Europeans, some of them with Communist backgrounds, are netted among the wetbacks, and that in cold fact Joseph Stalin might adopt a perfunctory disguise and walk into the country this way.

Legal immigration into the United States from Mexico—on which there is no quota limit—involves such complications as fees, literacy standards, job assurance, and consular approval. It is much easier to sail, wade, or swim the Rio Grande, seldom more than 100 yards wide, or just to walk across the largely unfenced dry sections of the border.

Such an illegal crossing is a misdemeanor the first time and a felony after an initial deportation, subject to 2 years' imprisonment and $1,000 fine. But the wetbacks numbers largely defy prosecution.

Detention facilities and court dockets are so crowded that anything beyond quick deportation of first offenders has had to be abandoned. The latest authoritative analysis indicates that only about 25 of every 10,000 caught are prosecuted.

So the influx has snowballed. In the San Antonio immigration district, the largest of three covering the border, the number of apprehensions—generally conceded to be in direct proportion to the total traffic—has jumped from 43,000 in 1945 to 215,000 last year.

In the Los Angeles district, covering California and western Arizona, they jumped from 4,000 in 1943 to 230,000 last year. And the traffic is mounting steadily. The Los Angeles district's apprehensions in January and February of last year totaled 19,500; for the same period this year they were 33,800.

The wetback traffic dwarfs the legal contracting of Mexican labor under the international agreement, and has become almost inextricably enmeshed with it. At the moment, according to the United States Employment Service, there are about 28,000 contract Mexicans in the country. Most of them were not imported at all, but are exwetbacks who were rounded up north of the border, processed at border immigration and consular stations, and given legal work permits under guaranties of somewhat better conditions than those accorded wetbacks.

Once across the line, the wetback passes himself off as one of the 3,000,000 citizen Mexican-Americans. The main centers of wetback labor are the large-scale cotton, citrus, and vegetable ranching areas of Arizona, and the Imperial and San Joaquin Valleys of California.

In lesser numbers wetbacks can be found seasonally on farms in Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and other parts of the West, and over in Arkansas, Mississippi, and Missouri. Every week or two a planeload is shipped from Chicago back to the border.

Employment of wetbacks, although from a realistic standpoint tantamount to harboring a fugitive, has been held by the Federal courts to be not a punishable offense because of the omission in the 1917 version of the immigration laws of any specific penalty.

PEONS NET FARMER A FABULOUS PROFIT—ILLEGAL MIGRANTS FROM MEXICO WORKING RICH SOIL OF WEST, A BONANZA TO EXPLOITERS—PAY 15 TO 25 CENTS A DAY, AND MANY RECEIVE FOOD ALONE, WHILE SHELTER IS A HUT, A THATCH, OR THE STARS

(By Gladwin Hill)

BROWNSVILLE, TEX., March 25.—The lower Rio Grande Valley is the heart of the 1,600-mile wide border belt stretching from Texas to California into which more than 1,000,000 Mexicans annually infiltrate illegally in quest of work.

Here, amid such towns as Waslaco, Donna, Harlingen, and McAllen are some of the most fertile and productive cotton, citrus, and vegetable lands in the country.

The lower Rio Grande Valley comprises principally three counties, Cameron, Hidalgo, and Willacy, with 300,000 population. Their only fractionally cultivated gross area of 3,000 square miles, although constituting only 2 percent of the total area of the State, yields some 15 percent of its farm income.

In this relatively small area on an average day during last year's harvest peak, according to a careful study by two leading southwestern sociologists, about 100,000 wetbacks were working. A check of 14 farms taken at random by Dr. Lyle Saunders of the University of New Mexico and Dr. Olen Leonard of Vanderbilt University, disclosed that 93 out of every 100 workers were illegal Mexican aliens.

THROUGHOUT WHOLE AREA

In lesser concentrations as the distance from the border increases, but still in swarms of thousands, other wetbacks can be found in the harvesting and thinning seasons in the Salt River Valley of Arizona, the Imperial and San Joaquin Valleys of California, and many other sections of the West and South—legally fugitives from justice, but beneficiaries—or victims—of skimpy border protection, grasping farmers and an apathetic public.

Over the whole area there are many farmers and farm associations that, because of special circumstances or plain scruples, do not use "wetbacks"; but for the average farmer such a course means bucking an entrenched cheap-labor system.

In contrast to visions of affluence conjured up by the wide disparity in United States and Mexican living standards, the "wetback" finds himself under a system of wages governed entirely by what the traffic will bear.

Farmers acknowledged to the President's Commission on Migratory Labor last summer that they paid field hands as low as 15 cents an hour. According to the Saunders-Leonard study, the prevailing hourly wage for "wetbacks" in this valley last year was 25 cents an hour.

TWENTY-SIX-DOLLAR COTTON PICKERS

Although cotton was selling at exceptionally high prices, the cotton picking rate in the valley was at its lowest in some time, $1.25 a hundred pounds—at which, it was calculated, the average picker might earn a maximum of about $26 for a 7-day week.

Hourly rates like 25 cents do not necessarily indicate the real wage level in a particular situation, because they may be replaced by piecework rates that are less, or by day rates based on a theoretical 8 hours that in practice may stretch out to 10 or 11 hours.

Gross wages, moreover, are often subject to deductions for meals, commissary purchases, and special assessments, such as the common practice of charging workers for binding wire for vegetables, a practice obviously implying either a paring of the nominal wage or profiteering on the wire.

Two cases reported last summer at McAllen were a father, mother, and two children who had worked 4 days for a net of $6.50 and an inexperienced cotton picker who after 3 days' work was told he had just earned the food he had eaten.

SOME GET NO CASH

It is not extraordinary for "wetbacks" to report having worked for weeks only to be told that there was no cash due them. In such a circumstance the "wetback" has little scope for argument; the farmer can just turn him into the immigration authorities for deportation.

A few days ago I talked with a "wetback" named Felix Moreno who had come into El Centro, Calif., to get help in collecting $47 he said a nearby farmer owed him for 10 days of carrot-bundling. He was 1 of 50 "wetbacks" in a crew of 65. A typical "wetback" in many respects, Moreno was 24 years old and had a wife and year-old child back in Mexico.

Last fall he had taken more than a month's Mexican wages to buy a train ticket from Santiago, Guanajuato, 800 miles south of the border. He had walked across the line in the desert and worked intermittently in cotton and vegetables in the 6 months since. In his pocket he had 20 cents.

Aside from wages, the "wetback" gets nothing. His lodging is seldom better than an irrigation ditch-bank or hut improvised from junk or thatch. The worker housing situation in Lower Rio Grande Valley ranches was tersely summarized in a report published by the University of Texas last December:

"No housing facilities exist."

Southwestern farmers have two principal explanations for the wholesale resort to labor that is contraband but the employment of which, because of legal technicalities, is not subject to prosecution.

One is that "local labor is not available."

It is true that, under present arrangements, peak harvest labor requirements often exceed the immediate local supply. The University of Texas survey, made by Prof. Eastin Nelson and Prof. Frederic Meyers, found, for instance, that in the Lower Rio Grande Valley seasonal cotton labor needs fluctuated from 5,000 to 125,000 against a permanent total labor force of only 38,000.

However, the same study found that an adequate supply might well be drawn from within the State of Texas if adequate monetary and other considerations were offered.

Observing that "much of the agricultural labor in the valley is performed by illegal entrants from Mexico," and tactfully skirting the question of wages with the notation that they were "low" even in comparison with other parts of Texas, the Nelson-Meyers report continued:

"The valley has an opportunity almost unique in a largely agricultural area of providing steady year-around jobs for a permanent resident labor force * * * (but) no such stable and desirable conditions exist, and the reasons for their lack lie plainly in the instability created by the continuous traffic back and forth across the Rio Grande.

FACILITIES UNNECESSARY

"The living standards which Mexican nationals are willing to tolerate, and the fact that so many of them are only temporary residents, have made it unnecessary for valley farmers to provide housing, sanitary facilities and other nonwage perquisites adequate to retain a permanent resident farm population."

During the last few years while the "wetback" traffic has been increasing at a rate of 50 percent or more a year, there has been more or less constant farm unemployment in the Southwest.

In the face of purported shortages of labor in Texas, every year around 100,000 residents of the State take to the road, joining the migrant farm-labor stream to the States north, west and east, where lessened "wetback" competition brings more adequate compensation.

Granting the possible occasional need for foreign labor, there is machinery under the United States-Mexico agreement of 1949 for the legal importation of workers under contract. But the farmers do not like this, because contracting involves minimum wages—ranging currently from 40 cents an hour for Texas to 60 cents for California—and guaranties of housing, insurance, and other conditions that make it far more expensive than "wetbacks." Consequently, legal contracting has remained minute in comparison with "wetback" employment.

Although wetback employment is such an established institution that Rio Grande Valley newspapers refer to it baldly as "cheap labor," farmers often argue that any greater labor costs would put them out of business.

CAN BE DONE

There is telling evidence in contradiction of this contention. For virtually every case where a crop is being produced with wetback labor, instances can be found of the same crop's being produced competitively—often in less favorable areas—with legal Mexican contract labor or domestic labor.

At the time farmers in the lower Rio Grande Valley were paying $1.25 for cotton picking, farmers in California's San Joaquin Valley—300 miles north of the border—were paying $3—and making impressive profits. Similar differentials customarily exist in citrus and vegetable production, despite California's more costly distance from eastern markets.

Even within Texas, at a time when daily wages for cotton chopping (thinning) in the valley were about $2.25 the Nelson-Meyers report said, "in the northeast Sandy Lands of Texas they were $3, in Corpus Christi and the coast prairie areas they were $4, in the rolling plains $5, and in the high plains $5.25."

The Saunders-Leonard study indicated that valley farmers were able to realize upwards of $5,000,000 extra profit on their cotton crop last summer by their illegal-labor wage rates. This comfortable differential possibly throws light on the fact that during 1949, when the farm income of the State as a whole was declining 8 percent, according to statistics of the State Department of Agriculture, valley farmers were able to increase their income by 7 percent.

PEONS IN THE WEST LOWERING CULTURE—ILLEGAL MIGRANTS FROM MEXICO FORM VAST UNASSIMILABLE BLOC OF POPULATION—ALL STANDARDS DECLINE—HEALTH, EDUCATION, DEMOCRACY IN AREAS WHERE WETBACKS WORK ARE DEPLORABLE

(By Gladwin Hill)

EL PASO, TEX., March 26.—The annual invasion of the United States by more than 1,000,000 illegal Mexican border-jumpers, long regarded by some as merely a quaint regional phenomenon of the Southwest, is emerging as a prime factor in some of the worst economic and social conditions in the Nation.

It is a matter of extensive public record that the 3,000,000 Mexican-American citizens of the Southwest are one of the most underprivileged segments of the population, in earnings, health, education, and equality of treatment.

The wetbacks, whose influx in its present proportions is a development of recent years, did not originate these conditions. In the opinion of a large number of expert observers, however, their presence has done much to perpetuate and aggravate them.

"From a cultural standpoint," states Dr. George Sanchez, head of the department of history and philosophy of education at the University of Texas, and probably the foremost student of regional interracial affairs, "the influx of a million or more wetbacks a year transforms the Spanish-speaking people of the Southwest from an ethnic group which might be assimilated with reasonable facility into what I call a 'culturally indigestible' peninsula of Mexico.

NULLIFIES INTEGRATION

"The wetback migration tends to nullify processes of social integration going back 300 or 350 years, and I would say at the present time has set the whole assimilation process back at least 20 or 30 years."

It is the Mexican-American citizens whom, primarily, the wetback cheap-labor invasion deprives of jobs and, through broad economic pressures, pulls down to its own primitive living standards.

It is the wetbacks, as parties to an informal system of peonage, who inexorably tend to set the level of the far from frictionless relations between the Mexican-Americans and the Anglos.

"No citizen who wants to live in even a minimum of comfort and decency can compete with the wetback wage scale," Dr. Sanchez and Dr. Lyle Saunders, of the University of New Mexico, said in a recent report of the University of Texas' continuing study of the Spanish-speaking peoples, a project of the Rockefeller Foundation's general education board.

"With an oversupply of cheap, unprotected labor always present, organization of workers is impossible, individual bargaining is futile.

"There are only two choices: work for what the wetback works for and live as he lives, or leave the area. Many accept the former alternative. Those who can, choose the second and become displaced persons. Either choice results in undesirable conditions for the individual and social problems for the community."

IN THE WAKE OF POVERTY

"For those who stay and attempt to compete, there is poverty and all the evils associated with it: disease, ignorance, child labor, crime and delinquency, lack of concern with civic affairs, slum conditions, and always the weight of a deadened, passive, apathetic population to be carried on the shoulders of other elements of the community.

"For those who leave, there are similar problems of health, education, welfare, and housing—problems that affect those migrating and those in the communities to which they go."

The second alternative is exemplified in the annual migration of around 100,000 Texans, along with thousands of farm workers resident in other wetback States, to other harvest areas of the Nation in quest of remunerative work.

It is possibly more than coincidence that the number of migrant farm workers who course the Nation annually has been independently estimated at 1,000,000—on the order of a conservative estimate of the number of wetbacks who annually breach the border.

The sources of this migration vary in many cases in direct proportion to the presence of wetbacks. In the lower Rio Grande Valley of Texas, the heart of wetbackland, where as many as 100,000 wetbacks may be working at one time during the harvest peak, a recent survey showed that of 15,000 families, 8,000 had hit the migrant trail during a 2-year period.

NOT MERELY AGRICULTURE

The dislocations are not confined to the agricultural field. Wetbacks filter into every occupation from culinary work to the building trades. Practically any labor union in the 1,600-mile border zone from Texas to California can cite local instances of wetback competition in its field.

An analysis of a group of 160 supposedly agrarian wetbacks picked at random from among a summer's deportations by Dr. Saunders disclosed nine bricklayers, seven truck drivers, three miners, two factory workers, two welders, two weavers, a painter, a barber, a blacksmith, a butcher, a shoemaker, and a policeman.

A check of a single residential block in El Paso, Tex., one day last summer turned up three wetbacks doing craft work—a painter, a carpenter, and a carpenter's helper—working at rates from 57 cents an hour down to 37 cents.

In southwest Texas, wetback competition is so strong that even such nationally powerful unions as the teamsters' and the building trades' are only sketchily organized. An organizer for the American Federation of Labor in the area acknowledged sadly that even loyal union members had got in the habit of working on jobs beside wetbacks without protest.

The approximately 1,250,000 Mexican-Americans in Texas comprise one-sixth of the State's population. In many parts of southwest Texas they are predominant in the population.

COMPARATIVE DEATH RATES

Among the Anglo-American population, the 1946 death rate from diphtheria was 1.81 per 100,000 population; for the Spanish-speaking people, a synonym for Mexican-Americans, it was 6.47; the Anglo-American whooping cough rate was .64, the Mexican-American 5.73; the tuberculosis death rate was 25.4 for Anglo-Americans, 159 for Mexican-Americans.

In San Antonio, the largest city of southern Texas, the tuberculosis death rate among Anglo-Americans is 40, among Negroes 50, and among Mexican-Americans 150.

General conditions worsen as you progress into the wetback country. In Hidalgo County, one of three that make up the lower Rio Grande Valley, a United States Public Health Service survey of 3,103 resident Spanish-speaking families comprising 16,782 persons, disclosed that in 1947–48, 9.8 percent had annual incomes below $500, 41.6 percent below $1,000, 68.3 percent below $1,500, and 82.9 percent below $2,000.

In Hidalgo County in 1949, the infant death rate among Spanish-speaking people was nearly five times that among the non-Spanish speaking. In 1949, Hidalgo and adjacent Cameron County, although containing only one-thirtieth of the State's population, accounted for one-fifteenth of all the State's meningitis, one-twelfth of its typhoid and diphtheria, one-seventh of its dysentery, and one-fifth of its malaria.

EDUCATIONAL DEFICIENCIES

Comparable educational deficiencies characterize the region. The farm-worker migration from Texas customarily starts in the early spring, months before the school year ends, and the workers do not return until fall, after the school year has started.

Among families who do not migrate, and who are faced with making livings under the competition of wetback wages, child labor is so common that in some parts of west Texas the public schools remain closed for an extra month while the fall harvest is on. They remain open an extra month at the end of the year, but this evidently is a minor compensatory factor. In the three valley counties, a recent University of Texas study disclosed, in the age bracket 6 to 17, more than 40 percent of the children were absent from school on a given day.

"It seems perfectly plain from the figures that a fairly large percentage of the scholastics belong to the labor force in some degree * * * and that a fairly large percentage of (children above 14) belong regularly to the labor force."

The United States Public Health Service survey of 3,103 Hidalgo County Spanish-speaking families disclosed that 53 percent of their members had no formal schooling, 75 percent had less than 3 years, only 15 percent had from 3 to 6 years, only 1 percent had completed high school, and only 1 out of 1,000 had attended college.

Of those persons over 21, 45 percent had no schooling, only 2 percent had completed high school, and only 2 out of 1,000 had attended college. Sixty-seven percent could not speak English, and 39 percent were illiterate even in Spanish. For comparison, the latest available State statistics on education among the over-all population of the same county show that 54.6 percent had completed five grades or more, and that 20.6 percent had completed high school.

The retarded assimilation of the Spanish-speaking people, the University of Texas report stated, is revealed in second and third generation citizens who do not speak or who are not fluent in the language of their country, in poor school attendance records and low educational attainments, in abnormally high concentrations in unskilled occupations, in the persistence of separate, segregated institutions, and in subjective outgroup feelings toward non-Spanish-speaking citizens.

Despite all the problems of assimilation, Dr. Saunders concluded from a recent study of the valley, it is conceivable that a mutually satisfactory adjustment involving a considerable cultural and perhaps even biological blending of both groups might have been reached had it not been for the continual inflow of large numbers of wetbacks.

"For the wetback embodies most of the elements necessary to reinforce the stereotyped notions of the Anglo through which he sees or fancies he sees undesirable characteristics in the Spanish-speaking group, and tends to assign to all Spanish-speaking people the characteristics he thinks he sees in the wetbacks. * * * poor, uneducated, unskilled, underfed and frequently unclean.

DISCRIMINATION RAMPANT

Although the Texas courts have held that Mexican-Americans are white and therefore not subject to the same level of segregation as Negroes, they are still subject to extensive discrimination—both organized as in certain public housing projects, and informally. A typical example reported by Dr. Saunders is that where Anglo-American stenographers get between $150 and $250 a month, and average about $167, the standard scale for Mexican-Americans, despite their convenient bilinguality, is $100 to $150.

Although constituting some 16 percent of the population of Texas, Mexican-Americans account for only 2 percent of the enrollment in the State's 4-year colleges and universities.

Consonant conditions obtain, in varying degrees, throughout the Southwest.

Possible illumination of the correlation between the status of the wetbacks and that of the Mexican-Americans is provided by a comparison of their role in public affairs, in the States of Texas, New Mexico, and California. In all three States, Spanish-speaking populations have been established for more than a century. In New Mexico, the Spanish-speaking people constitute a larger proportion of the over-all population than in the other States—about half—but from a governmental standpoint their concentration is no greater in various areas than in important sections of Texas and California.

In the latter two States, prime termini of the wetback influx, you can search the rosters of State, county and local legislative and administrative personnel through hundreds of names without encountering one that is Spanish.

In New Mexico, which has only 100 miles of border contiguous to Mexico and where there is relatively little farming to draw wetbacks for practically every Anglo-American in public office—including the State's representation in Congress—you can find a person of Latin extraction.

SOUTHWEST WINKS AT WETBACK JOBS—ETHICS CAST ASIDE AS GROWERS ACCEPT PEONAGE IDEA AND BRIDLE AT INTERFERENCE—FEDERAL SANCTION NOTED—BORDER PATROL OFFICERS REPORT PRESSURES FROM WASHINGTON TO "GO EASY" IN RAIDS

(By Gladwin Hill)

EL PASO, TEX., March 27.—The rise in illegal border-crossing by Mexican wetbacks to a current rate of more than 1,000,000 cases a year has been accompanied by a curious relaxation in ethical standards extending all the way from the farmer-exploiters of this contraband labor to the highest levels of the Federal Government.

Although wetbacks are fugitives from justice, southwestern cotton, citrus, and vegetable growers have come to the fixed view that there is nothing wrong in employing them, harboring them or even in actively recruiting them across the international boundary.

Further, they have come to feel they have a vested right in the traffic. Any more than the normal token interference with it by the Immigration Service's skimpy border patrol—with less than 900 officers for the 1,600-mile expanse from Texas to the Pacific Ocean—brings an outraged hue and cry from communities thoroughly indoctrinated with the farmers' attitude.

A year ago, in a special drive, border-patrol officers were concentrated temporarily along the Rio Grande and in 1 month increased their apprehensions from 16,490 to 24,415.

GESTAPO TACTICS CHARGED

Newspapers of the lower Rio Grande Valley immediately accused the Immigration Service editorially of "siding with Mexico" and described valley farmers as "justifiably resentful" at having their scheme of things thus disrupted.

A barrage of feature articles followed, describing in emotional verbiage the purported separation of families by the deportation of border jumpers (an exigency specifically exempted in the immigration laws); and dire conditions allegedly created on the Mexican side of the border by the congestion of deportees (which Mexican officials promptly denied).

The border patrol, long known for its anomalously amicable relations with both the farmers whose fields it periodically raids and the Mexicans it deports, was accused of almost as heinous a roster of outrages as was laid to the Nazi Government, in headlines such as: "Says border patrol uses Gestapo methods." * * * "Illegal search and seizure is issue" * * * "Valley Legion scores acts of border patrol." * * * "Crime against humanity."

Representative LLOYD M. BENTSEN, JR., Democrat, of Texas, member of a prominent valley farming family, took the floor of Congress to demand a full-dress investigation of a report that border patrolmen called at a house in Mission and questioned the occupants "without a search warrant."

SOCIAL SECURITY CARDS ISSUED

Communities have become so accustomed to "wetbackism" that in the leading "wetback" areas of Texas, Dr. Lyle Saunders, University of New Mexico sociologist, recently reported after extensive first-hand study of conditions, "almost anyone who needs help of any kind will hire a wetback—farmers, contractors, businessmen, housewives, city governments, county governments, and even the International Boundary Commission." In this, Texas does not differ substantially from the wetback areas of Arizona, California, and other Western States.

On the hallowed bureaucratic principle of the left hand's not knowing what the right hand is doing, while the Immigration Service struggles with the wetback influx, the Social Security Administration freely issues cards to wetbacks on which they have little chance of collecting benefits, but which are handy for pseudo-identification. Wetbacks get draft board cards for the same purpose, giving worthless addresses. State employment offices in many places—quasi-Federal agencies—refer wetbacks to employment opportunities right along with citizens.

A leading California labor contractor, asked by the President's Commission on Migratory Labor where he located the wetbacks in which he admittedly trafficked, replied blandly: "From the State employment service."

The notion that wetback labor is both proper and indispensable has become so firmly implanted in southwestern communities that its accompanying evils are taken as a matter of course.

WETBACKS LINKED TO CRIME

The (Lower Rio Grande) Valley Express last March quoted District Attorney Jack Ross, of Edinburg, Tex., as saying that in the previous year as much as 75 percent of the convictions in certain major crime categories had been against wetbacks and that since the stepped-up drive against them crime generally had dropped off 50 percent. The newspaper added, without comment, that local police in several valley cities reported such petty crime as pilfering and drunkenness had dropped sharply.

About the same time the San Benito (Tex.) News reported blandly: "It was quite a weekend in San Benito. Only a few habitual drunks got into jail. The round-up of wetbacks may worry San Benito district farmers and cut down receipts of beer joints, but it is a blessing to local police. 'No petty thefts, few fights, no burglaries, and everything peaceful with most of the wetbacks gone, at least for a time, is the police view."

Sheriff Robert Ware, of Imperial County, California's leading wetback area, asked by this correspondent if wetbacks constituted any particular law-enforcement problem, said, "No, they don't give us much trouble. They're mostly quiet, law-abiding people who just want work." A few minutes later he acknowledged that of 185 inmates in the county jail, he estimated 25 percent were wetbacks.

The public record offers extensive evidence of tacit or active Federal sanction of the wetback traffic all the way from the border patrol to the White House level.

ARREST TRENDS ANALYZED

Some responsible regional observers have noted a curious inverse correlation between the rate of the border patrol's apprehensions, which vary widely seasonally, and local demands for wetback labor. One way or another, these sources suggest, the border patrol functions less as a law-enforcement agency than a checkvalve, restricting illegal immigration to the level of active public alarm. No corruption of border-patrol officers is implied. It is just, these observers explain, that after apprehension activities have gone so far, as in last year's special Rio Grande campaign, pressures, public and private, build up to damped the border patrol's ardor.

Some immigration officers deny this, contending that they consistently and conscientiously do as well as they can with their skimpy resources to stem the wetback tide, and that fluctuating apprehensions simply reflect fluctuations in the over-all wetback migration rate.

Other officers differ. One after another testified before the President's Commission on Migratory Labor that the border patrol was subject constantly to invisible but emphatic pressure exerted from farm quarters through Washington and relayed through Immigration Service channels, to go easy on the wetback round-up.

This was epitomized in the testimony of the late Grover C. Wilmoth, veteran director of the El Paso Immigration District. He said:

"All we need is a go-ahead signal and we can enforce the law 90 to 95 percent. With a little additional men and equipment we could do an efficient enforcement job. It's a disgrace to this country that her laws are openly flouted and evaded. The farmers once were ashamed of using wetbacks. Now they have come to the point where they believe they have a vested right in these illegal workers. They go to their Senators, their Congressmen, the Attorney General, or the President to complain."

It was in Mr. Wilmoth's district, during the 1948 Presidential campaign, that there occurred the notorious "El Paso tea party." The supply of Mexican labor had not been sufficient to satisfy farmers of the area.

As reported by Art Leibson of the El Paso Times, "When President Truman came to El Paso for a campaign address, the problem was laid before him by cotton men and by Texas and New Mexico Congressmen. Soon after his train moved east through Texas, there was a meeting of top immigration officials at El Paso." What went on behind the scenes is still a matter of equivocal explanation by immigration officials. What happened openly was that—in outright violation of United States commitments, according to the subsequent protest of the Mexican Government—border-patrol officers turned their backs for 48 hours while some 7,500 wetbacks streamed across the river unhindered to fill the farmers' wants.

A similarly questionable incident occurred only a month ago in California. Some ranchers rounded up one hundred-odd wetbacks some 30 miles north of the border and took them in chartered buses to the immigration station at Calexico. The ranchers and the border patrol were in the midst of a still mysterious proceeding evidently aimed at legitimizing these workers for transportation to ranches in the north, when representatives of the National Farm Labor Union, AFL, intervened and protested to the local Mexican consul that the law was being violated. Although the district headquarters of the Immigration Service still contends that the proceeding was in full compliance with regulations, the union's protest had sufficient validity so that the operation was halted and the wetbacks returned to Mexico.

AGREEMENT CALLED A TRAVESTY

The most conspicuous official hypocrisy regarding wetbacks has been that surrounding the United States-Mexico farm labor agreement of 1949, one of the periodical extensions of which is now before Congress. The professed aim of this agreement was to eliminate the wetback traffic by providing for the recruitment of Mexican farm labor below the border and its orderly importation into the United States for maximum work periods of 1 year where real shortages of domestic labor were duly certified by the United States Employment Service.

After 18 months of its operation, however, many close observers feel that the agreement manifestly has worked out as a travesty on this intent.

The agreement opened with a solemn declaration of representatives of the United States State Department and the Mexican Foreign Ministry deploring the wetback traffic of Mexican workers, which has mounted steadily and no appreciable steps have been taken to reinforce the border patrol.

The agreement then offered an incentive to border jumping by providing that wetbacks should have preference in hiring under the contract system. Such priority was limited to wetbacks in the United States at that time, but this deadline for absolution from law violation has been extended over and over. Last summer the legalization of wetbacks in the United States before July 26 was authorized. When this did not produce enough cheap Mexican labor, the preference was extended to all wetbacks in the country before October 20.

CROSS BORDER IN RITUAL

Of the first 98,000 laborers contracted under the agreement in the fall of 1949, 78,000, by acknowledgment of the Department of Labor's Bureau of Employment Security, were wetbacks who were legalized.

Nominally this legalization process consists of the wetbacks voluntarily surrendering and returning to Mexico for subsequent recruiting.

As it works out in practice, the wetbacks are rounded up in the United States and taken to legalization centers on the border, where as part of their processing they go through the formality of momentarily crossing the Mexican line—a ritual that has become known as "walking around the statue."

Of 28,000 Mexican contract laborers now in the United States, virtually all were wetbacks legitimized in this way.

Article 6 of the agreement affirmed that Mexican nationals should not be contracted to work "in localities where Mexicans are discriminated against because of their nationality or race." They have been put to work in such localities.

Subsequent articles said Mexican contract labor should be paid the prevailing wage rates for a given area, that this should not be promised on wetback-wage scales, and that the contract labor should not displace domestic citizen labor.

These stipulations, if complied with, observers agree, would virtually have precluded contracting, since farm wages in key areas of the Southwest are geared to the wetbacks' minimal compensation to such a degree that domestic citizen workers by the hundred thousand are frozen out of the market. This was circumstantially corroborated when contract minimums of 40 cents and 60 cents an hour were adopted under the agreement, respectively, for Texas and California, for identical work—reflecting accurately the differing concentrations of wetbacks in the two areas.

The final irony of the agreement was a stipulation that contract workers should not be provided to employers of wetbacks, and that any employer found to have wetbacks should have his contracting privileges withdrawn.

This again, if complied with, virtually would have eliminated key areas of the region, wetback employment is so prevalent.

In one day recently the farm-labor union supplied United States and Mexican officials a list of eight large vegetable ranches in the immediate area of El Centro, Calif., employing wetbacks, the most prominent being the firm of O'Dwyer & Mets, headed by Frank O'Dwyer, brother of William O'Dwyer, United States Ambassador to Mexico. Immigration officers seized 300 wetbacks on that ranch. The union demanded that its contracting right be withdrawn.

Six weeks have elapsed, and as this was written the regional office of the United States Bureau of Employment Security in San Francisco acknowledged that no action had been taken. It said an inquiry was under way. The first step in the inquiry was a so-called hearing at El Centro of parties in the case.

The hearing was an unannounced private conference on a Sunday night between a lawyer from the Employment Security Bureau and representatives of O'Dwyer & Mets.

When this correspondent sought to interview Mr. O'Dwyer, the latter referred him to Mr. Mets. Asked where Mr. Mets could be seen, Mr. O'Dwyer said, "He's in Washington."

INTERESTS CONFLICT ON WETBACK CURE—EVEN BORDER POLICE DISAGREE ON MEASURES TO STEM FLOOD OF MEXICAN LABORERS—NATIONS' PACT IN DISPUTE—UNIONS SEE A MOVE TO CUT PAY BY FARMERS WHO OPPOSE UNITED STATES RULE ON CONTRACTS

(By Gladwin Hill)

LOS ANGELES, March 2.—Almost every segment of the Nation's population interested in the wetback problem has a simple straightaway solution for it.

The trouble is that because of conflicting interests, no group's solution is very satisfactory to anyone else.

Even experienced officers of the United States Immigration and Naturalization Services, targets of a mounting barrage of criticism as illegal crossings of the Mexican border have mounted, are in wide disagreement about the most effective measures.

Some contend that simply augmenting the border patrol's present skimpy facilities—with a nucleus of less than 900 men to guard the 1,600 miles from Texas to the Pacific coast—might largely stem the tide of upward of 1,000,000 Mexicans who annually cross the line to work for minimal wages and who depress both economic and social standards in the Southwest.

Others contend that it would take a large standing army to make the border impregnable, and that the problem should be tackled from another angle.

Most concur that stiffening the present penalties for illegal entry—up to a year's imprisonment for the first offense and 2 years for a repetition—would be useless against the horde of amiable wetbacks who, by their numbers, overwhelm the facilities for apprehension and prosecution.

THE POLITICAL FACTOR IS CITED

Some think that if the immigration laws could be fixed up logically to make it an offense to employ wetbacks, who are technically fugitives from justice, it would eliminate their chances of getting jobs, and along with that the incentive for sneaking into the country.

Here again immigration officers disagree about the political practicality of such proposals. Some think that Southwestern farmers, with their vested interest in cheap wetback labor and their influential lobbies, would surely try to scuttle such steps. One immigration officer of exceptionally long experience, however, said: "They wouldn't dare to oppose it, because that would focus public attention on their system."

Members of Congress, whipsawed between the constant farm pressure for alien labor and the obvious need to do something about the wetback traffic, ratified the 1949 agreement between this Nation and Mexico for the importation of Mexicans under contract. A periodical extension of this agreement is now before Congress.

This agreement has not pleased anybody particularly. By providing for preference in job recruiting to wetbacks already in the United States, it has probably acted as an incentive to border-jumping, which has increased at a rapid rate ever since the agreement became effective.

FARMERS DISLIKE THE PACT

Farmers dislike it for many reasons. Requests for labor to be imported have to be filed 60 days in advance. With the principal Southwestern crops of cotton, citrus, and vegetables, it is often difficult to predict precisely so far ahead just how many hands are going to be needed, when and for how long.

Also, minimum wages—ranging from 40 cents an hour in Texas to 60 cents in California—and housing, insurance, transportation, bonds, and other requirements under the contract system, raise the cost of this labor. In some cases, farmers have averred, actually above the cost of domestic citizen labor.

Farmer objections to transportation costs and complications have brought about the virtual scrapping of the original concept of recruiting labor in the interior of Mexico, where there was a dearth of local employment opportunities, in favor of recruitment right at the border through the legalization of wetbacks.

A return to recruiting south of the border is one of the principal proposals in connection with extending the international agreement, now under debate. Another is for resumption of active participation by the United States Government—as during World War II—in the transportation and allocation of the imported labor and in the handling of certain of the moneys involved.

This is objected to as quasi socialism. There is also palpable concern in farm circles that Government management of alien labor would soon extend to allocation of domestic labor. Such a step, it may be noted, might nullify the traditional contention that domestic labor is not available, a contention that farmers use to justify the employment of alien labor, legal and illegal.

In contrast to such proposals, influential farm quarters long have been advocating what they habitually refer to as a simple crossing-card system, but which critics call simply legalized wetbackism.

Under this system, Mexicans would receive border passes to circulate in the United States, confined in theory to areas of farm labor shortages, and to work without any of the burdensome guaranties of minimum wages, housing, insurance, and transportation required under the present contracting system.

Organized labor in the United States, as expressed in repeated declarations particularly of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliates, would approach the problem from the other end.

It contends that the agitation in the United States since World War II about obtaining alien labor generally has been an oblique effort to undercut American workers, predicated on illusory shortages of domestic labor. These shortages are said to result from a refusal to offer adequate wages.

This contention is at least partially corroborated by a recent study at the University of Texas, previously cited in these articles, which concluded that the labor needs of certain key farm areas could, with adequate inducements, be filled entirely from within the State. This is contrasted to the present situation in which wetbacks pour in by the hundred thousands, while domestic workers leave the State regularly in similar numbers to seek more adequate wages elsewhere.

The National Farm Labor Union, the A. F. of L.'s principal affiliate in the field, contends that domestic labor shortages should be established by public hearings in the areas in question instead of by the present unilateral certification by Federal-State employment offices, whose personnel may be subject to local pressure from farmers.

Secondly, the union advocates on the question of what is the prevailing wage for given work in a given area—a critical factor in considerations both of the availability of domestic labor and of the terms that should be accorded alien labor—that this wage be similarly arrived at in open hearing rather than as now, in the uncertain realm of administrative decisions.

If these two conditions were met, labor maintains, many of the current problems would be dispelled because underlying them is a simple reluctance to pay adequate wages.

With these conditions met, it is contended, domestic citizen labor would be forthcoming; and even on the condition, quite foreseeable in the current war emergency, that alien labor were needed, a frank approach to wage and cost economics would eliminate the present haggling and complications that attend the contract system.

From labor and independent observers of the wetback problem, including educators, economists, sociologists, and welfare and church agencies, the suggestion also has come that the wage chiseling that underlies the wetback influx might be obliterated by applying Federal minimum wages to agriculture, at least in cotton, which is a Government-subsidized crop around which much of the wetback traffic revolves.

Farmers have long contended that minimum wages in agriculture are unworkable. But a minimum wage has long been in effect under an exceptional Federal law for the sugar-beet crop.

Radio Spot Announcements on Law and Order

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, one of the truly great organizations in this Nation is the American Heritage Foundation located at 25 West Forty-fifth Street, New York 19, N. Y. The purpose of this organization is clearly indicated in its title itself. It is designed to encourage our citizens to respect and maintain the great values that comprise our magnificent heritage.

One of the important elements of its work is the forwarding to some 1,700 cooperating radio stations each month of a series of spot announcements which can be broadcast in between programs and at other convenient times and which contribute tremendously to an awareness of the American heritage. I can think of few more constructive uses of America's great media of communications.

Some of the forthcoming radio spots are devoted to focusing attention on supplementing the job which has been performed by the Senate Commission Investigating Interstate Crime.

I have been delighted to read these spot announcements because it has been my deep conviction that only when John Q. Public at the grass roots of the 48 States really gets hold of this issue and starts to clean up his own town, his own county, and his own State, can we say that the forces of lawlessness will really be on the run.

Each of these announcements is simple, clear-cut, wisely directed to the average citizen. By the repetition of the important theme of cooperating with law-enforcement officials, the announcements drive home a message which cannot be overemphasized nor repeated too often. By reference to past incidents in history, the announcements draw attention to the relevance of past experiences to our present and future.

I ask unanimous consent therefore that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the following items:

(a) A list of the distinguished officers of the Foundation—a list which is a hallmark of some of the finest leaders in all phase of American life who devote their valuable time selflessly in the public interest.

(b) A list of the members of the great board of trustees of the Foundation.

(c) The text of several of these spot announcements on the crime problem.

I conclude with the keynote of the Foundation: "Freedom is everybody's job."

There being no objection, the lists of names and the text of the spot announcements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN HERITAGE FOUNDATION

OFFICERS

Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board; William Green, vice chairman; Philip Murray, vice chairman; Robert G. Sproul, vice chairman; Thomas D'A. Brophy, president; Louis A. Novins, executive vice president; Edwin L. Weisl, secretary; James G. Blaine, treasurer.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES

Winthrop W. Aldrich, William D. Askren, Barney Balaban, Chester I. Barnard, Don Belding, James G. Blaine, Thomas D'A. Brophy, Mrs. J. L. Blair Buck, Norman Chandler, Henry Corbett, William W. A TIME FOR RALLYING TO THE LAW

These are days of a double danger.

War threatens our heritage of freedom from abroad, and widespread lawlessness threatens it here at home.

Can we, you and I, as citizens, help against lawlessness?

Well, millions of Americans, who are "good citizens"—active and positive in their citizenship—are helping in the fight against lawlessness right now.

These millions resent being pushed around by contemptible crooks such as those exposed by the Kefauver investigation.

These millions are righteously angry against the arrogant criminals who look on them, mistakenly, as slaves. So these millions now help wage the war against crime by cooperating, however, wherever, and whenever they can, with public officials and with the courts.

This fighting spirit, this righteous anger, on the part of millions of awakened American citizens—including yourself no doubt—will be a triumphant weapon against the tyranny of crime, and for the preservation of freedom—that priceless freedom which is everybody's job.

In these days when our heritage of freedom is threatened by criminals both abroad and at home, these words of Woodrow Wilson are reassuring:

"If I did not believe that the moral judgment would be the last judgment, the final judgment, in the minds of men as well as the tribunal of God," Mr. Wilson said, "I could not believe in popular government. But I do believe these things."

It is the moral judgment of millions of our people that inspires our defiance of communism. And it is the moral judgment of these same millions of Americans that inspires the present Nation-wide drive against immorality, against criminals and their crimes.

Many, many millions who believe in morals are in the fight, and in it to win. A "good citizen" obeys all laws himself, of course, but he goes much further: He helps public officials and the courts to bring criminals to justice and to prevent further lawlessness.

Yes, it is the moral judgment of these millions—you among them, of course—that freedom is everybody's job.

The University of Illinois has a professor of law by the name of Dr. George Washington Goble. And this famous authority wrote in his book The Design for Democracy, these challenging lines:

"If there is to be liberty there must be order, and if there is to be order there must be law."

So wrote Dr. Goble. And if we may rearrange that challenge, putting it loosely yet truthfully in reverse, we would say it this way: When laws are violated on a wide scale, how can there be order? And where there is no order, what happens to our most priceless possession—our heritage of freedom?

You know from a mass of shocking evidence that laws have been and are being violated on a large scale. But fortunately an aroused America, with its millions of good citizens, is doing something about that.

They are—and this "they" includes you, of course—they are not merely obeying every single law themselves, but they are assisting public officials in preventing crime. They are saying—and again that "they" includes you—they are saying that the law shall prevail, and that there shall be order, so that there shall continue to be freedom. They are emphasizing this familiar challenge: That freedom is everybody's job.

In 1830, one of our leading public enemies was the pirate, Charles Gibbs.

This buccaneer had compelled scores of innocent men and women to walk the plank before he was taken captive on Long Island, and presently hanged.

Now the person who discovered the clues that led to his capture was a plain every day citizen, known simply as Leonard. But he was surely a good citizen, this Leonard. For in addition to respecting the law himself, he helped public officials to arrest a law breaker, and so helped prevent lawlessness.

And just good citizenship is the obligation of us all today. Now as never before it is our responsibility to be vigilant, and help our public officials to prevent lawlessness whenever, wherever, and however we can.

For as lawlessness is a dangerous threat to freedom in peacetime, it is a more dangerous threat to freedom in wartime, and as every good citizen agrees, freedom is everybody's job.

You keep up with the news. So you know about the lawlessness that is horrifying the country.

Well, how do you like it? How do you like to be annoyed or even pushed around by cheap crooks in these tense busy days of mobilization?

How do you like it when these luxury-loving gangsters mock and sneer at plain everyday citizens and eminent officials just as Russian commissars sneer at their slaves?

And now for the big question:

As a "good citizen," what are you doing about these small contemptible men who steal and lie and cheat and even murder? Who may have taken property from you somehow, and would as readily take your life?

Well, you obey and respect the law, of course. But "good citizenship" demands more. It demands that we all cooperate, however we can, with public officials in the enforcement of the laws, and so help stop criminals, help prevent lawlessness.

When we do this—keeping constantly vigilant with a righteous anger in us—we illustrate once more the hard blunt fact that freedom is everybody's job.

Do you know what General Lafayette said about liberty? About freedom?

David Loth quotes Lafayette in Mr. Loth's new book about him entitled "The People's General."

"Anyone who ostensibly struck a blow for freedom could count upon the backing of his speeches in parliament," writes the Mr. Loth. "One day early in 1834 the chamber heard him at his favorite oratorical task of defining the aims for which he strove: 'Liberty must always be a living thing, never laid away in the archives."

This conviction of Lafayette's about liberty, about freedom, takes on special meaning today when our freedom is threatened by war abroad and by lawlessness at home. And surely Lafayette would say that in order to keep freedom a "living thing," every good citizen must respect the law, and also must vigilantly cooperate with public officials and courts for the prevention of lawlessness.

Or in other words, freedom is everybody's job.

A voice of long ago spoke words of special significance for today when our freedom is threatened by two dangers: War abroad, and lawlessness at home.

The voice was that of James Bryce, who said with blunt emphasis: "Patriotism consists not in waving the flag, but in striving that our country shall be righteous, as well as strong."

Mr. Bryce probably would be well pleased could he look in on America now.

For while we are gradually but surely mobilizing to meet whatever enemy may attack from abroad, we are also mobilizing by country, States, communities, and individuals against lawlessness at home.

Our people who love freedom, millions of good citizens, have come awake with righteous anger against this lawlessness. They are determined that America shall be righteous as well as strong and free. So they obey and respect the laws, and also cooperate with law officers vigilantly and fearlessly, however they can, in the fight against lawlessness.

That's what you're doing, and your neighbors as well, of course. For you know—as everybody knows now—that freedom is everybody's job.

Do you know who captured Maj. John André, the famous enemy spy, in the War of the American Revolution?

Well, our histories say he was stopped by "three militiamen." They quizzed him, examined his papers, and took him prisoner. Three militiamen. Not professional soldiers, not trained intelligence officers, but three plain everyday American citizens in uniform. And they were surely good citizens, those three. For by stopping this dangerous spy, they helped prevent dangerous espionage.

And just such good citizenship is the obligation of us all today. Not that we'll have an opportunity to catch spies. But now as never before it is our responsibility to be on the lookout for enemies of our freedom, and help our public officials to prevent lawlessness whenever, wherever, and however we can.

For as lawlessness is a dangerous threat to freedom in peacetime, it is a more dangerous threat to freedom in wartime. And as every good citizen agrees, freedom is everybody's job.

In his book entitled "Modern Arms and Free Men," Dr. Vannevar Bush declares that "the strength of democracy lies in the manifold blessings of freedom."

Well, if ever it was important that democracy be strong, the time is now.

The time is now, when the blessings of freedom are threatened not alone by war abroad, but by widespread and perhaps increasing lawlessness at home.

While we make ready to meet any danger from enemies abroad, we must at the same time triumph successfully over high crime and low criminals here among us.

We can do all that and more.

We can do all that by seizing our opportunities as "good citizens," especially the opportunity not only to obey and respect the law, but also to cooperate with officials in enforcing laws, in preventing crimes.

Millions of Americans, now righteously aroused, are vigilant to help however they can. For the strength of democracy does lie in freedom. And what we are saying by our cooperation against crime is just this: "Freedom is everybody's job."

During the last quarter of the nineteenth century, public enemy No. 1 was Billy the Kid.

This smart-aleck gangster-on-horseback reviled his victims before he murdered them. But Sheriff Pat Garrett killed Billy quite dead in Billy's final gunfight.

Now a plain everyday citizen, known to us as a Mr. Brazil, wrote the letter that tipped off Sheriff Garrett as to where Billy could be found. And he was surely a "good citizen," this Mr. Brazil. For he not only respected the law, but by helping a law officer to catch a lawbreaker, he helped prevent lawlessness.

And just such "good citizenship" is the obligation of us all today. Now as never before it is our responsibility to be vigilant, and help our public officials to prevent lawlessness whenever, wherever, and however we can.

For as lawlessness is a dangerous threat to freedom in peacetime, it is a more dangerous threat to freedom in wartime. And as every good citizen agrees, freedom is everybody's job.

In his farewell address as President of the United States, Andrew Jackson made a blunt statement to his listeners.

"Providence has showered on this blessed land, blessings without number," he said. Then came the blunt statement: "Providence has chosen you," he said, "as the guardians of freedom."

Well, wouldn't Old Hickory say the same thing to our listeners today? To you?

Of course. And he probably would be quite solemn, too, observing that our freedom is now threatened by criminals both abroad and at home.

But we could reassure him. For as we become better prepared day by day to guard freedom from criminals abroad, millions upon millions of Americans—righteously angered—commit themselves also to the fight against lawlessness in America. This includes you, probably. For surely you who respect the laws yourself, help public officials, however you can, to prevent crime.

Old Hickory would like that. Fearless and honorable himself, he would be proud of you, proud of everybody who says by positive citizenship, that freedom is everybody's job.

The late Wendell Willkie stated in his book, One World, that the best answer to communism is a living, vibrant, fearless democracy.

But as Mr. Willkie would surely agree, a living, vibrant, fearless democracy cannot endure, freedom can't endure, in the face of widespread increasing crime.

It seems that crime is widespread and perhaps increasing in our own democratic Republic. And if we are successfully to meet the threat of communism, every citizen must be faithful to our laws.

Being faithful means to obey the law and to respect the law, of course, but that's not all by a long shot. Truly good citizenship, active citizenship, demands also that we assist public officials in preventing crime and the courts in giving evidence.

Now, of course, you are doing what you can to help prevent crime. Surely you are one of the millions of aroused citizens who will keep this democracy living, vibrant, and fearless. For you, like other millions, are dedicated to the proposition that freedom is everybody's job.

In these days good citizens are urged to be specially careful to support the law.

That's because there is much evidence today that lawlessness is active in some quarters—shamefully active at the critical moment when we are mobilizing to be able to meet any dangers from abroad.

Well, since the days of the Mayflower compact, days of the Virginia bill of rights, days of the Orangetown resolutions, and other early documents in the behalf of freedom, many eloquent Americans have paid high tributes to the law—such tributes as to make us more proud than ever to support it.

Dr. John W. Burgess paid it such a tribute when he said that the source of law is the national consciousness of truth and right.

Truth and right, they are the worthy qualities that we support when we obey the law, respect the law, and help our officials and courts however we can to enforce it.

And remember, only because we have law, do we have freedom. So surely freedom is everybody's job.

As we have been told all our lives, our Government is a government not of men but of laws.

Today when it's more than ever important that we all rally to the support of the law, lest lawlessness destroy our freedom, it is refreshing to read these lines that the late Mr. Justice Cardozo quoted from the Harvard Law Review:

"Code is followed by commentary, and commentary by revision, and so the task is never done."

So it is a living thing, the law that we must diligently and faithfully uphold.

In these tense days war threatens from abroad, and lawlessness threatens in America. So it is our obligation not only to respect and obey the law ourselves, but also to be energetically cooperative with officials and courts in enforcing the law.

It is our law. It came from us. It is alive. It is the one thing that keeps freedom alive. Naturally we are loyal to it. Everybody must be loyal to it. For freedom is everybody's job.

It's written down with finality, though with brevity, in the dictionary.

Citizenship is the status of being a citizen, we read. And a citizen is a person who owes allegiance to a government and is entitled to reciprocal protection from it.

Surely everybody agrees with that definition. Surely everybody agrees that he, as a citizen, owes allegiance to his government.

Well, as we've been told from childhood, ours is a Government not of men, but of laws.

So we owe our allegiance to our laws. And while there is evidence of widespread lawlessness in these days of international tensions, all but a few of us, comparatively, are faithful to our laws. All but a few of us obey and respect them, and cooperate with officials and courts in upholding them.

Yes, there has been evidence recently of lawlessness in the country. It makes a man righteously angry, of course, because he knows that lawlessness has been known to destroy freedom. It won't destroy ours as long as all of us, but a disloyal handful, agree on this point: That freedom is everybody's job.

A devoted servant of the people and President of our country, Grover Cleveland, had this to say of fellow citizens who became careless about their obligations as good citizens.

"The abandonment of our country's watchtower by those who should be on guard," President Cleveland said, "and the slumber of the sentinels who should never sleep, directly invite the stealthy approach and the pillage and loot, by forces of selfishness and greed."

Well, Mr. Cleveland would probably be proud of his country today.

For today all but a shameful handful of the 150,000,000 Americans are vigilantly within the country's "watchtower"—wide awake instead of sleeping—readying themselves to protect our freedom from the forces of selfishness and greed, whether these forces be enemies abroad or lawbreakers in America.

Yes, while our good citizens mobilize to meet any danger from abroad, they obey and respect the law, and also, they help officials in preventing lawlessness, and the courts in giving true evidence.

And in these ways they help preserve our freedoms. Surely you are among them? For freedom is everybody's job.

Assignment of Ground Forces to Duty in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials having to do with the proposal to send troops to Europe. The first is entitled "Troops for Europe," and appeared in the New York Times of April 5, 1951. The second is entitled "The Bridges Are Burned," and appeared in the Evening Star of the same day.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of April 5, 1951]

TROOPS FOR EUROPE

On the second anniversary of the signing of the North Atlantic Pact, the Senate has approved by a large majority a resolution which constitutes another historic landmark in the development of American foreign policy. With this resolution the Senate reasserts the vital principle, long evidenced by the events, that the security of the United States and its citizens is directly dependent upon the security of its partners under the North Atlantic Treaty, and that the commitments of that treaty are therefore an essential part of our foreign policy.

In keeping with this principle, it specifically approves the appointment of General Eisenhower as Supreme Allied Commander of the unified defense forces now being created under that treaty. Furthermore, it declares that American security requires us to station abroad such units of our Armed Forces as may be necessary and appropriate to contribute our fair share to the forces needed for the joint defense of the North Atlantic area, and for that purpose formally approves the earliest possible dispatch of four additional divisions to bring our total ground force strength in Europe to six divisions.

The impact of this resolution should be all the greater because it was adopted by a final vote of 69 to 21—a better than two-thirds majority—which should help erase the more dubious aspects of the long debate. This is a solid achievement and a long swing of the pendulum from the Neutrality Act of the mid-thirties. In a decade and a half American opinion has swung from an almost unquestioning faith in isolation to a judgment completely contrary. Not only have we thrown off all pretense of neutrality, not only have we come out of isolation to associate ourselves with a world organization for the maintenance of peace, and not only have we broken the traditions of a century and a half by entering into a binding defensive alliance with certain European powers, we now also recognize that the security of these powers so directly involves our own security that we are prepared to draw the first line of our defense across Europe and to station along that line six divisions, or all that can be provided at the present time.

This achievement must not be obscured, either here or abroad, by the commotion caused by the McClellan amendment advising the President to obtain further congressional approval before sending additional ground troops to Europe beyond the four divisions specified. That amendment, a product primarily of domestic politics, like the concurrent resolution inviting the House to repeat the debate, is regrettable because it might raise new doubts about the earnestness of our intentions and might even be exploited to precipitate new quarrels over the dispatch of troops needed to complete the task.

In that respect it is not exactly a testimonial to the Senate's statesmanship or certainty of its own mind. But it need not be the disaster it is represented to be. In fact, together with the McCarthy amendment regarding Germany and Spain, it might even do some good if it prods European nations into even greater efforts, both in respect to their own rearmament and the inclusion of a German and possibly Spanish contribution to western defense.

What must not be overlooked is that, in the final analysis, the McClellan amendment merely makes more imperative what is already demanded by the gravity of the measures we have taken, and what to some extent was also provided in the original resolution text—namely, that there must be consultation and agreement between the President and Congress on the policy involved. Furthermore, the language of the resolution clearly implies that, though specific approval is given only for four divisions, it is also the sense of the Senate that we must subsequently supply such additional divisions as may be necessary and appropriate both to contribute our fair share and to guarantee the validity of the North Atlantic Treaty. The Senate cannot very well go back on this pledge without repudiating the policy it has just approved, or proclaiming the six divisions in Europe to be just expendables.

Even with its amendments, therefore, the adoption of the resolution should provide Western Europe with new confidence to go full steam ahead with the defense programs agreed upon. For this resolution notifies Soviet Russia that we intend to fight in Western Europe if Western Europe is threatened with aggression. Twice, on the eve of the two most calamitous wars in history, we notified the potential aggressor that we intended to follow a hands-off policy in the event of aggression. We seek now to prevent a third world war by telling the aggressor that if he goes to war he will find us in the center of the fighting.

[From the Evening Star of April 5, 1951]

THE BRIDGES ARE BURNED

Now that the "great debate" has ended, one tremendously significant fact has been put upon the record for all the world, and the Kremlin in particular, to see.

The United States is finally and irrevocably committed to fight on land, on the sea, and in the air if Western Europe should be attacked.

Nothing in the debate or in the resolutions finally adopted by the Senate can destroy or seriously impair the overriding importance of this plain declaration of our intentions. It is regrettable that the Senate adopted the amendment calling upon the President to obtain congressional approval before sending any troops to Europe in addition to the four divisions now scheduled for overseas duty. The practical effect of this may not be great. It is unfortunate, however, in that it implies, or may be interpreted as implying, a certain unwillingness on our part to do all of the things that may have to be done if the Communist threat is to be successfully met.

Actually, such an inference would not be warranted. Of the 21 votes finally cast against the troops-for-Europe resolution, only 19 came from Senators who oppose such a commitment. They constitute the hard core of what is left of isolationism in the Senate, and there is very little prospect that their thinking will ever prevail. Most of the support for the limiting amendment came from Senators whose grievance grew out of a constitutional difference with the President. Mr. Truman has a large responsibility for this conflict. Had he shown more wisdom and better judgment, the issue might have been avoided entirely. In any event, he could have done much more than he did to compose the difference amicably, once it had developed.

This water, however, has passed over the dam. Nothing is to be gained now by stirring the ashes of that conflict.

The thing that really counts, the thing that history will record as one of the most significant developments of our generation, is that the Senate has given its approval to the stationing in Europe, in peacetime, of a total of six divisions of American troops as a garrison force. The Senate has done this in explicit recognition of the fact that "the threat to the security of the United States and to our North Atlantic Treaty partners" makes it necessary to station United States armed units abroad so as to "contribute our fair share of the forces needed for the joint defense of the North Atlantic area."

If the full meaning of this is obscure to any of our own people, it will not be obscure to the Russians. They will understand that we have put them on notice that an attack on any member of the North Atlantic Pact means war—instant and total war—with the United States. We may well hope that this, of itself, will prevent war—that the Russian masters will not be insane enough to unloose on themselves the terrible destruction that will follow an attack by them. We may also have hope that this evidence of our good faith and firm intention will expedite the organization, under General Eisenhower's command, of the projected international army in the west, so that if war should come the free nations will not be devoid of means to fight and win it.

Colonialism: United States Style

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have an article from the February 1951 issue of the Progressive, published at Madison, Wis., entitled "Colonialism: United States Style," and written by Mr. Felix S. Cohen, printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. Mr. Cohen served as an associate solicitor in the Interior Department, and is the author of the Handbook of Federal Indian Law. He teaches jurisprudence at Yale Law School, and philosophy at the City College of New York.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLONIALISM: UNITED STATES STYLE

(By Felix S. Cohen)

It was on a late spring afternoon in 1950 that the seven councilors of the Omaha Tribe gathered with their "nephews and nieces" on a little fragment of what was once their great cornland empire to plan defenses against white aggression. There is not much left of the 6,000,000 acres or more that was once their own, along the Nebraska bank of the Missouri River, but what is left, with its deep black soil and its bursting corncribs, its heavy mud and its fat horses, these Indians love, as they love the little fragments of self-government they still enjoy.

They were deeply disturbed over schemes hatched in high places to dispose of the remaining fragments of their age-old homeland. From long experience these Indians knew that the process of turning their land over to white men always began with an attack on the honesty, intelligence, or competence of Omaha Indians. Such attacks, inside and outside the Indian Bureau, had reached a new high intensity in recent months. Obviously there was danger in the air.

Suddenly, down the center aisle of the meetinghouse, walked the young wife of the council chairman, carrying an airmail special-delivery letter from Washington. The letter was opened and read circumspectly, as men of other races might read a letter from an archangel or a commissar. Dark eyes widened as the reader intoned the words of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs himself. He had carefully considered the plea of the Omaha Indians "that the Government give the tribe entire control of its own affairs, without the interference or expense of an agent or of agency employees."

II

He thought this request reasonable and in line with his own policy of encouraging Indians "to take care of themselves." Instructions had therefore been issued, according to the Commissioner's statement, "to turn over to the Omaha councilmen, in trust for the tribe, the mills, shops, dwellings, school houses, livestock, and all public property on the Omaha Reservation." All of the agency employees except those engaged in medical and educational work were being relieved of their posts.

The mounting delight that showed in Indian eyes suddenly blurred and the anxious brows of the two Government observers relaxed. The date of the Commissioner's statement was read. The date of the statement was 1884. It had been dug out of musty archives and mailed to the tribe by a friend in Washington. The next Omaha play would have to start 66 years behind the line of scrimmage.

The policy of cutting down Bureau controls and encouraging our Indian citizens to assume full responsibility for their own affairs has been vigorously proclaimed by every Commissioner since 1884. And yet these Omaha Indians, like many other tribes, have far less control over their own affairs than they had in 1884, and less in 1950 than in 1949. How come?

Back in 1854 the Omaha chiefs were invited to the White House. The tide of western migration had reached the wide Missouri, and the Great White Father wanted to buy 5,000,000 acres of the fat Omaha land, at about 15 cents an acre, to sell to white settlers at $1.25 an acre. Reluctantly the Indians agreed, but only on one condition. They insisted that the 15 cents be paid to them and not to Indian agents.

At the end of the conference President Pierce agreed that no Indian agent would handle the Indians' money. The great Omaha orator, Chief Joseph La Flesche, had used a silver dime to illustrate the plea of his people for the right to handle their own finances. The silver dime was brought to the Omaha reservation and was cherished as a symbol of a great victory in the Indians' struggle for freedom.

Ninety-six years have passed, all Indians are now citizens, and yet today no Indian on the Omaha Reservation is allowed to lease his own land and handle his rental income without the interposing of Bureau fingers. And during this entire 96-year period the Indian Bureau has been reporting to Congress on the steady progress that it is making in turning over to Indians an increasing responsibility for the managing of their own affairs and in cutting down controls which the Bureau still exercises over Indian life.

In 1885, the Commissioner reported:

"More than a year ago the Omahas felt themselves competent to do their own work and attend to their own affairs. At their request all their employees were discharged and they were left to themselves. The result, which then seemed doubtful, has shown the wisdom of their choice. They have attended to their own business and paid for their own work and are more independent and manly than before because of the consciousness that they are becoming men."

Similar reports were made by the Commissioner in 1886 and 1887. When and how and why the Indian Bureau crept back and took over control of Indian fields, buildings, and funds does not appear in any Commissioner's reports to the President or to Congress. Nor is much reporting done today on current Bureau activities which are depriving Indian tribes of the right to hold local elections without Bureau interference, the right to employ their own lawyers and technicians, and other rights that were guaranteed to them under the Roosevelt-Ickes-Collier administration.

The Omaha case is not unique. Most Indian tribes in the United States can report similar experiences. Federal promises that the Indians would be allowed to assume control of their own affairs go back at least to the 1830's. Usually but not always, there is a time qualification to the promise. Before the Indians can be trusted to take over complete responsibility for their own affairs, we are told, there must be a period of preparation during which the Indian Bureau will help to civilize—the current term is rehabilitate—the Indians.

Back in the 1830's the transition period was generally fixed at 10, 15, or 25 years.

In the latest Indian Bureau drafts of tribal "rehabilitation bills" the date 1994 is generally fixed as the point at which Bureau supervision over Indian finances can safely be terminated for the more progressive tribes.

There is no tribe that has more control over its own affairs today than it had a year ago or a hundred years ago. There are few tribes that have as much control over their own affairs as they had in 1884. And yet during this period Commissioners of Indian Affairs have inaugurated more than 500 programs for liquidating Bureau activities. Most of these programs were directed to particular reservations or States, but several were of national scope.

During this period of intensive "liquidation" the annual Indian Bureau budget has increased from less than $6,000,000 to approximately $80,000,000. Some of the "rehabilitation" bills recently put forward by the Indian Bureau, often over the protest of the alleged Indian beneficiaries, would triple or quadruple Bureau expenditures for the more progressive tribes, in the expectation that by 1994 these Indians might safely be allowed to take care of themselves.

How a Bureau's efforts to "work itself out of a job" can produce these results presents a fascinating puzzle for white men as well as Indians, and for students of law and government of all colors and political faiths. The puzzle is particularly baffling because we Americans have had so little direct experience with colonialism.

Having started our existence as a Nation by repudiating colonial status, and having repudiated the role of empire with equal vigor, at least during the first 122 years of our national existence, we are not accustomed to the high moral talk by which great empires "aid" and "protect" backward peoples out of their independence, and impose a dependent status and a dependent psychology upon people who once managed their own affairs in a self-reliant way. Only in obscure places in the Indian country, in Alaska, and in a few small Pacific islands can we see what happens to our own Government experts when they are not responsible to the people they are governing or aiding.

The simplest explanation of the gap between Commissioners' programs and Bureau performance is the "devil theory," according to which the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is a satanic hypocrite, who makes fine promises merely to fool Indians and Congressmen. According to the adherents of this popular view, the only good Indian Commissioner is a dead Indian Commissioner.

Unfortunately, life is not so simple. The harm that good commissioners do is often greater than the harm bad commissioners do. All but 3 or 4 of the 36 Commissioners of Indian Affairs who have served during the past 118 years have been honest, sincere, hard-working men who wanted to help the Indian and wanted also to work themselves out of the world's worst job.

Something more than a "devil theory" is needed to locate the source of the Indian Bureau's drive for expansion and aggrandizement and to understand the mental makeup of the men who carry on this drive while they think and talk (quite sincerely) of "liquidating" their Bureau. Perhaps if we understood the psychology of such officials more clearly we could see more plainly what is happening in other parts of the world where "liquidation" and the "withering away of the state" go hand in hand with a tremendous increase in bureau controls over individual freedom.

The Indian Bureau itself has a ready explanation for the discrepancies between proclaimed Federal policy and actual practice. Those Bureau officials who are most active in breaking down Indian self-government have their own "devil theory" to explain their failure to carry out the Bureau's public promises and policies. According to this theory, Indians are inefficient, dishonest, wasteful, ignorant, selfish, impatient, and generally drunk, or, at least, not so efficient, honest, economical, wise, public-spirited, patient, and sober as their Indian Bureau tutors.

Moreover, any white man outside the Bureau who seeks to help Indians is either a crank or a grafter or a paid agitator—a grafter if the Indians pay him for his help, a paid agitator if white sympathizers pay him, and a crank if nobody pays him. It is, of course, the duty of loyal Bureau employees to protect Indians from all cranks, grafters, and paid agitators. Accordingly, it is the unshirkable duty of the Indian Bureau to carry on its shoulders the "white man's burden" of telling the Indians what to do.

Essentially this is the philosophy of colonial administration in all parts of the world. It is instructive to see how this philosophy works out in day-by-day Indian administration.

V

The most plausible argument against local self-government, Indian or white, is the argument of inefficiency. Obviously, it is more efficient to have one official make decisions than to have 450,000 individual Indians scattered all around the United States and Alaska making different decisions for themselves as to how they will earn their livings, spend their money, use their land, litigate their grievances, or educate their children.

We see the most recent example of this efficiency drive in the latest Indian Bureau orders transferring authority over 200 reservations from the reservations to half a dozen so-called area offices. (These were originally called regional offices, but when Congress, in response to Indian appeals, refused money for such offices, they were rechristened "district" offices, and when district offices were forthwith abolished by Congress they were renamed "area" offices.)

Decisions that are made on the reservation cannot be very efficient because they are made in the presence of Indians, who like to participate in such decisions and require time for thinking, which is not as necessary for loyal Bureau employees. Decisions in Washington are made under congressional scrutiny, and, since many Indians are voters, this scrutiny interferes with speed and efficiency. But when decisions are made in Billings or Portland, most of the Indians affected are hundreds of miles away and their Congressmen are thousands of miles away. It is thus possible for such decisions to be highly efficient, that is, to disregard all the human desires and intangibles that do not show up in efficiency reports. The cult of efficiency thus makes it possible to recite all the proper phrases about liquidating the Indian Bureau while, at the same time, upholding every extension of Indian Bureau power over Indian lives on the ground that a poor (or rich) Indian cannot possibly be as efficient as an $80,000,000-a-year Indian Bureau.

VI

The argument of Indian inefficiency has one serious inconvenience. Any Bureau employee who uses it invites attention to his own inefficiencies. If they are notorious, he will find it safer to pitch his arguments on a plane of high morality. When the Federal courts held that the New Mexico Pueblos were not under Indian Bureau control, the Indian Bureau produced reams of gossip as to the immorality of various Pueblo Indian customs and ceremonials, and the Federal courts then backed down and admitted the necessity of Indian Bureau supervision.

Inexperienced freshman Congressmen sometimes think that Indian bureaucracy can be cut down by trimming appropriations. This is a naive view. To the experienced bureaucrat a cut in funds is always the best possible reason for centralizing power, which means transferring authority from people to agencies, or from local agencies to area offices or Washington officials. In fact, every expansion of a Bureau function is customarily justified on the ground that it will bring economy in the long run. Unfortunately, as Keynes has noted, in the long run we are all dead.

Once grant that expert government is better than self-government and there is no stopping the expansion of the Indian Bureau, or any other bureau, until it fills the whole space of the individual's life.

Back in 1834 the Congress decided that the time had come to wind up the fast-growing Bureau of Indian Affairs and that one of the best ways to do this was to allocate Indian Bureau positions to the Indians themselves. Every 30 or 40 years since then Congress has passed a new law to the same effect and several such bills have recently been introduced with much fanfare. These laws have great popular appeal because they conform with the American creed that self-government is better than expert government and that men and children learn by doing. None of us would ever learn to walk in childhood if the job of walking were assigned in each family to the expert walkers, as the theories of colonialism and Indian bureaucracy would require.

The Bureau never has carried out these acts of Congress, which have remained largely dead letters. The Indian Bureau never has given a general employment preference to Indians outside of ditch-digging and similar inferior or temporary jobs that whites were reluctant to tackle.

In the special vocabulary of Indian Bureau gobbledegook, policy decisions made by Indians for themselves are "politics" while decisions made for Indians by the Bureau are "sound administration." If elected Indian councilmen select friends and supporters for tribal jobs, this is described as "nepotism" and proves that Indians cannot be trusted with self-government. But if a Democratic President picks a Democratic Indian commissioner, if such a commissioner appoints old friends to high posts, and if an Indian superintendent has his wife appointed to a job in an institution financed by his Indians, this is accepted as a part of the democratic process.

Every now and then a Commissioner reveals the large number of dishonest officials that held jobs under a prior administration. But the real corruption of the Indian Bureau is institutional, not personal. It is like the corruption of prisons, insane asylums, concentration camps, Fascist and Communist states, and other societies in which men cannot talk back to officials. It is what Lord Acton had clearly in mind when he pointed out that power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

VII

Thousands of solutions have been proposed in the last 450 years for the Indian problem. And this is as it should be, for thousands of Indians have thousands of problems, just as white men do.

The great thing about American democracy is that most of us have an unprecedented power to shape our own lives, make our own mistakes, and attain new understanding and strength from the mistakes we make. To extend such democracy to Indians—to let Indians spend their own money, run their own schools, use or lease their own lands, and hire their own lawyers to defend their rights, just as neighboring white communities do, would not establish utopias on our 200 Indian reservations, but at least it would remove from our democratic professions, in our dealings with nonwhite peoples, the taint of hypocrisy.

If to this simple measure of justice were added a full and prompt settlement of all Federal debts to our Indian fellow citizens, we would have no need to worry about how they would fare under the self-determination we have so long promised and so long withheld.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of a powerful article by Norman Cousins, editor of the Saturday Review of Literature, as reprinted in a full-page paid advertisement in the New York Times dated April 6, 1951.

This House must take action. I cannot understand the delay on the measure to authorize emergency food-grain shipments to India in the face of this terrible urgency.

I am receiving scores of letters from the people of my congressional district. For the most part, the people who live in the Nineteenth Congressional District never achieve any economic security; most of them have known hunger—actual gnawing physical hunger—in their own lives, and will know it in the future.

Yet I have not received a single letter opposing the India relief bill. This article by Mr. Cousins was sent to me by Mrs. John E. Scanlan, of 223 East Fifth Street, accompanied by an urgent letter to act at once.

Mr. Speaker, we must have action.

WHILE YOU READ THIS, A CHILD MAY DIE—AMERICA CAN HELP AVERT A FAMINE IN INDIA THAT MAY CLAIM 14,000,000 LIVES THIS YEAR

NEW DELHI.—Once you have seen the look of hunger on the face of a man it is difficult to put it out of your mind. I have seen the look of hunger on the faces of thousands of men, and I know I shall never forget it.

I first saw the hungry in a jail on the island of Ceylon. They were illegal immigrants fleeing the famine in the south of India, and the Government of Ceylon was detaining them in a prison in Jaffna until arrangements could be worked out for their return to India. They had come by small boat, landing during the night on the north coast of Ceylon, where some of them had been picked up by the police. No one knew how many Indians had fled to Ceylon in this summer.

In the jail at Jaffna I spoke to a woman of 55 who looked closer to 90. I doubt that she weighed 80 pounds. Her face was little more than a bare skull out of which small eyes glowed feverishly. She had come to Ceylon to join her married daughter, who had escaped successfully 2 months earlier. This much she was willing to tell, but she would not tell the police where her daughter might be found, even though it meant she herself would be returned to India alone.

I next saw the hungry in the south of India, where the suffering is most acute. I saw them against a background of parched and browned fields, with pale stubbles where rich rice paddies should have been. The reason for it was that the rains never came this year. They didn't come last year either or the year before that or the year before that.

"Four years, no monsoon," one of the elders in a village 40 miles from Madras told me. "The older people have thought hard but they do not remember when before the fields have been so dry. The wells are very low."

He looked up at the scudding clouds. "Clouds like this used to bring rain. Now they go out to sea and drop their rain where there is no need of it. The old people can eat little. If they are thin it is no great harm. Gandhi was thin. But the children are thin and they become sick quickly. Smallpox has killed many of them. Thirty had smallpox in this village. Sixteen died.

"We send men into the cities to work so they can buy rice to bring back to the village. But there is so little rice and the rations have been cut again, and what they bring back cannot fill the bowls of many persons. We eat what we can—bananas and some coconuts—but very many people here are starving."

I next saw the faces of the hungry on the streets of Calcutta. Many of them were homeless. They had lost their homes during the partition of India when Pakistan was created. They were Hindus who feared the Moslems, and they had abandoned their homes in Pakistan and crossed over into India. In India there are perhaps eight or ten million such refugees—it might be millions more; no one knows exactly how many. Thousands of them came into Calcutta, the world's largest city, looking for food and homes. They slept in the streets. Wherever you went at night, on the main thoroughfares or in the alleys or in the hallways, you could see the human forms huddled together against the cool night. During the day they waited in lines for Government food or they begged.

Near the luxurious Grand Hotel in Calcutta was a child of 8 or 9, with not enough clothes to conceal the bloated, empty belly of hunger. He was looking in the streets for scraps of food. Nearby was a young woman of about 20, her body covered by the rags of what once must have been a handsome sari. A child of two was on her hip. The child was badly undernourished, and his head rested on his mother's shoulder. His face was empty and expressionless. I also saw the hungry of Bangalore. They sat against the walls of buildings and waited.

Then I saw them in Delhi. There are more of the hungry and homeless in Delhi than in any other city in the world. As in Calcutta, many of them are refugees—maybe 500,000 or 600,000—and they have crowded into the city, setting up crude wood-and-straw shelters, most of them closet size. And every day the dead are carried out by men who are little more than half alive themselves. I stood on the corner of a busy street in Delhi and watched the refugees as they passed. Out of the thousands who passed by only two would be considered plump by American standards.

The Indians are reluctant to talk about themselves or about their hardships. I was able, however, to win the confidence of the attendant assigned to my room. He told me about his 6-year-old son, the one with tuberculosis. He said his son had been praying a great deal recently, much more than usual, and he had asked his son what he had been praying for. "My son was praying that he might die. He wanted to die and he wanted God to make him into a crow. I had told him about the crows that fly into the open windows of the hotel rooms and pick up food on the tables and then carry the food off. My son said he wanted to be a crow so he could fly wherever there was food and bring it back to our family."

Then the attendant, whose name was Arun, turned away from me and knelt down to fix the fire. "India has been hungry for many months," he said. "They are saying that America has known about this need and that America has not wished to send us food."

I replied that what he had been told was not true. What had happened was that we had been too slow in responding to India's need, and that was bad enough. Americans had to operate through their Government, and often democratic government is slow in doing what has to be done promptly. I asked him to believe that millions of Americans were deeply concerned and were prodding our Government to action.

Then he mentioned the report he had read in the newspapers about the American Senators who wanted to punish India, because India did not agree with the United States in the United Nations.

"It is true, is it not, sir, that we may not get the food because we do not say what you wish us to say?"

I had to think a little while before replying, because I wasn't too sure that what he had feared might not turn out to be true. Should I have told him that it might take many days before the wheat bill might pass during which time he would have to watch his youngsters continue to eat out of partially filled bowls?

Finally, I told him that there was no real answer to his question, except to say that we would do our best, our very best, and that the American people would be angry if any attempt were made to deprive other people of food because we might disagree with their leaders.

Arun finished making the fire and left. It occurred to me that what ought to be done was to take Arun to the United States on the very next plane and bring him before the Senate of the United States.

If the Congressmen don't want to give wheat to Arun and countless millions of his countrymen, then they ought to tell it to Arun directly. Let them answer Arun's questions—if they can. Let them hear about Arun's children and then tell him exactly why a nation which has a surplus of wheat does not feel that it wants to put politics to one side when peoples are starving.

Then, after telling Arun why he will get no wheat, let us finish the job. Let us recall the appropriation for the Voice of America and for all our information services abroad. Let us shut down all our efforts to combat Communist propaganda against us. There is no point telling our story to the world if there is nothing for us to say. All the Voice of America can do is to try to provide a real, true account of what is happening in America. What we say can and should be a reflection of what we do.

We have heard a great deal in recent years about the need to speak to peoples and not only to governments. The most powerful language in the world today is food. It is clearly understood. It builds bridges mightier by far than radio broadcasts or published material, especially when people have no radios or cannot read.

My purpose in coming to India was to try to tell the Indian people about America and to try to answer the many lies being told about us. Those lies are aimed at splitting America off from the rest of the world. Yet there is nothing Soviet propaganda can say about us that can do nearly the harm that we can do to ourselves if we should turn our back today not only on India but on the meaning of America itself.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, if we are to continue to avoid entanglement in a global war we must take full advantage of the manpower available to us. Universal military training should have been passed in 1945. If it had been enacted at that time the manpower situation now would not be so precarious. It would not have been necessary to call 800,000 reservists to serve at this time.

If universal military training is passed, most of these reservists will be free to come home to their wives and children.

In answer to critics who charge that universal military training in France and other European countries tended to weaken those nations, the same does not apply to the United States because of its geographic position.

Universal military training would be an indispensable contribution to the avoidance of a global war and would be an indispensable need if such a war were forced upon us.

John W. Gibson, Chairman of the DP Commission

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, one of our younger and most able executives in the Federal Government is the present Chairman of the Displaced Persons Commission, Mr. John W. Gibson, a very dear friend of mine. Both by character and experience he is admirably fitted to serve our Nation in unusual and difficult posts.

The son of a coal miner who came to this country from Durham County, England, John Gibson himself entered the pits as a boy of 16. For several years he alternated working in the coal mines and in mastering arc welding in the automobile shops of Detroit. It was at this time that he became interested in workers' welfare and took special university courses in labor relations. For a time he was a union official for the United Dairy Workers Union, and later became secretary-treasurer of the Michigan CIO.

Between 1941 and 1943, Gibson was chairman of the Michigan State Department of Labor and Industry, appointed first by a Democratic Governor and reappointed later by a Republican Governor. After dealing with labor problems in various capacities during the war, he entered service with the Department of Labor in 1945, and became an Assistant Secretary of Labor in the following year.

John Gibson has had considerable success in conciliation work and often likes to refer to himself as a labor trouble-shooter.

He has shown much interest in the displaced persons problem since the end of the war and has often spoken publicly on the issues involved. He brings to his present task a rich store of knowledge and experience on the subject, which should enable him to make a worth-while contribution in the months ahead toward the solution of the DP problem.

I am placing in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of March 11, which already stresses a notable contribution by Mr. Gibson. It reads as follows:

TRAGIC PARADOX

This country is indebted to John W. Gibson, Chairman of the Government's Displaced Persons Commission, for removing the obscurity from the question of the impact of the Internal Security Act of 1950 upon the flow of displaced persons to this country. According to Mr. Gibson, there are approximately 100,000 persons now in Europe who wish to come here and who are otherwise eligible to do so but who are barred by the McCarran Act. They are barred because they belonged to civic, fraternal, labor union, military, or other organizations dominated by Nazi, Fascist, Falangist, or Communist movements, though their membership was only nominal or was forced.

Somewhat less than half of these 100,000 persons belonged to Nazi, Fascist, or Falangist dominated groups. Their problem would be solved and the barriers before them removed if the present Walter bill, passed by the House and pending before the Senate, were to be passed. Roughly 55,000 persons, however, Mr. Gibson estimated, are refugees from the Soviet Union and other Communist-dominated countries who have fled their homelands, often at great personal risk, because of their opposition to communism. These persons are specifically excluded from relief by the Walter bill and there is no present prospect for lifting the barriers that keep them out.

Here is surely a tragic paradox. Many of those whom the Walter bill would admit fought against us in the Italian or the German Army during World War II or otherwise aided the enemy war effort. Yet in this period when we are contending with communism, seeking to fan dissension in Communist-dominated countries, and hoping for defections from those countries, the Walter bill proposes to institute a discriminatory barrier which will assure that the great majority of those who have defected from the Soviet Union, for example, can never come here. It is difficult to think of how we could do more to discourage defection if we were to set about doing so deliberately.

Security and proper screening of would-be immigrants to this country are, of course, essential, but the discriminatory type of situation that will exist if the Walter bill becomes law can only hurt our friends and give comfort to our enemies. We should treat all anti-Communists at least as well as we do persons who helped the fight against us in World War II.

UMT and Draft Extension

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the following telegram be printed in the RECORD:

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Hon. M. G. BURNSIDE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

The following national organizations urge your support of Senate bill No. 1, as amended by House Armed Services Committee, including UMT and extension of draft in one bill.

National Guard Association of the United States, by Maj. Gen. Ellard A. Walsh, President; Reserve Officers Association, by E. A. Evans, Executive Director; Military Order of the World Wars, by Milton G. Baker, Commander in Chief; Adjutant Generals Association of the United States, by Maj. Gen. W. H. Harrison, Jr., President; Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, by Charles C. Ralls, Commander in Chief; The American Legion, by Miles D. Kennedy, National Legislative Director; Disabled American Veterans, by Boniface R. Maile, National Commander; AMVETS, by Harold Russell, National Commander.

Unconventional Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker under permission to extend my remarks, I include an important address made on Sunday, March 18, 1951, over the Mutual Broadcasting System network by Gen. William J. Donovan, former Director of the Office of Strategic Services, for the Committee on the Present Danger of which he is a member.

These views of General Donovan should be read as widely as possible:

UNCONVENTIONAL DEFENSE

(By William J. Donovan)

Fellow citizens, I am speaking as a member of the Committee on the Present Danger, under whose auspices weekly Sunday evening broadcasts are being given on the peril that faces the American people and on how it can be met.

This committee is a bipartisan, nongovernmental group of citizens who have organized to work together as the Nation prepares to safeguard freedom.

The first broadcast 2 weeks ago was that of Dr. Vannevar Bush, a scientist of world reputation, and the second was that of former Secretary of War, Robert P. Patterson. Others will follow this broadcast.

On March 4 over this network Dr. Bush told us (and now I quote his words): "We wish to avoid war * * * we wish to preserve our freedom and the free way of life. In a world where aggressive dictators are still at large, there is but one way to achieve these ends. That way is to be strong. * * *"

"The key to the matter is the A-bomb. The deterrent effect of our A-bombs is real, but we cannot count on its remaining fully effective forever. I trust we have time—time to prepare the defenses and avert war * * * but we do not have time to waste."

Last week Judge Patterson, speaking from his broad experience in high office during and after World War II, explained that the time will come when Soviet defenses against atom bombing will be more effective and a Russian stockpile of atom bombs will tend to neutralize ours.

For that reason he said our Nation's defense line must be in Europe. He stressed the imperative need of giving united support to General Eisenhower and told us that the unanimous judgment of our military leaders was, that only by joining with the free nations of Europe can be build a sound defense.

Generally, nations make use of two methods for reaching the goal of their policies. These are: (1) The employment of skill in diplomacy; or (2) the use of violence by shooting in conventional warfare.

Both Dr. Bush and Secretary Patterson were speaking of defense by orthodox methods. Americans are accustomed to think of war in these terms. They picture traditional and organized forces with planes, marching troops, ships, guns, bombs, grenades, and guided missiles.

There is, however, a phase of war which is not shooting. It is irregular and unconventional. It uses weapons other than those of the military and its methods are as diverse as the situation requires. This is called subversive war and it has been waged and is being waged against the United States by the Soviet Union at least since 1945.

This kind of war may be defined as a war of maneuver by subversive means, short of involvement in open hostilities. In varying degrees this kind of war has been used through the centuries. Hitler and Mussolini took it, modernized the propaganda and fifth column activities, and used them in support of conventional operations. Stalin improved upon this by holding his Red Army as a threat, and employing his subversive maneuvers on the main field of attack.

The Soviet fifth column is different from the Nazi fifth column as we saw it in World War II. The Nazis had only small groups of adherents in the democratic countries and their espionage operations were limited. On the contrary, the Soviets make use of the fifth column and the Communist Party as an army of occupation. The Communists stress the tactical importance of the channels of public information, the infiltration into radio, movies, music, and other arts, and special effort is made to obtain Communist control of labor in key industries in order to disrupt a nation's economy.

The pattern of this program is found in its purges in southeastern Europe; its pressure even today upon France, Italy, and Germany; its activities in Africa and the Middle East; its masked guerrilla war in Greece; and its full-scale military operation in Korea.

In each target country, operations are directed by Moscow-trained leaders with a small but strategically well placed hard core Communist minority, ready to engage in sabotage and in partisan warfare.

To visualize the interplay of that kind of war, there is no primer where it is more simply described than in the White Book recently issued by Yugoslavia on the aggressive activities of the Kremlin against Tito. You will see there in detail the political forms of aggressive pressure all the way from breach of treaties to Soviet organization of Yugoslav deserters and terrorists to undermine the internal security of the country. You will see economic aggression in the obstruction of free navigation to Yugoslav vessels in the Danube and in the stoppage of railway traffic and postal service. You will see the pressure of espionage and terrorist action by the smuggling of spies and saboteurs, and finally military pressure by provoking border incidents and massing Hungarian, Bulgarian, and Rumanian armies on the Yugoslav frontier.

We have only just begun to grasp the special nature of Communist organization and methods. The real strength of the Soviets lies in their world-wide organization, highly developed techniques and communications and in the discipline of leaders especially trained in the Lenin School in Moscow.

All of this should teach us that we are faced by an enemy against whom we cannot lower our guard—a foe that is always alert—and ruthless—and tenacious. Against such a foe we must exercise sustained effort, perhaps for many years. Soviet tactics may change even to the point of temporary retreat, but the objective is always the same—a world empire.

Only by our understanding of the manner in which the fight will be carried to us will we be able to deal with it. We can't sit back and hope to be let alone. There is no place for complacency, or indifference, or fear—we can't buy our way out or dream our way out, nor should we be misled by seeming successes until we have totaled the score on a global scale.

We must win this subversive war. It is necessary to win it because in winning it we would have the edge in the shooting war, if that war should ever come. It is essential to win it because in winning we may make a shooting war impossible. Therefore, we must be strong enough to compel the peace.

For a period of many months to come we will be building up our military forces and turning out armament. During that period unless we take positive and affirmative action in countermeasures, the free nations can lose strategic areas and strong points needed for defense against military operations by the Soviet Union.

Let us see how one of these areas is already endangered:

An AP article March 15 states that the Soviet Union has been courting Iranian officials for 6 months with presents such as release of captured Iranian border guards and the signing of a $20,000,000 barter treaty.

Iran produces 6 percent of the world's oil. It is the most valuable of the non-American supply sources which serve the western nations. It is a vital strategic area and therefore a sought-after military prize. There has been open speculation on the possibility of a Stalin invasion and what we should do in that event. But why should Stalin run the risk of a shooting war? Instead he called upon Tudeh, the Soviet-controlled political party to lead a movement in the Iranian Lower House to nationalize the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co., despite the fact that it is 53 percent British-owned and is operated under a concession that does not expire until 1993.

Watch the succeeding steps. Moscow has already paved the way to obtain a trade agreement, an agreement which could give her use and control of these British wells and refineries. If this cold-war tactic proves successful, Stalin will have outmaneuvered us again, without the necessity of taking over the Government, let alone of a military invasion.

Victories like this should teach us that it is nearly past the time to integrate our unorthodox resources as we have unified our conventional services. Economic political and psychological countermeasures, pulled together under centralized direction, with a well-conceived strategic concept and the recruitment of the best brains and most courageous spirits can be of great assistance as a counteroffensive in this war, whether we call it hot or cold.

Today the way to prevent a war is to put aside our own fear and create fear in the minds of our enemy. Dr. Bush has told us that Stalin can be deterred from waging a total war by his fear of the atom bomb. Stalin might be equally deterred by the fear that he cannot determine in advance the loyalty of his own people. For no dictator dare move if uncertain of his safety at home. It is well to keep in mind that our greatest ally can be the Russian people.

More than 2,000 years before either the atom or the hydrogen bomb was known, Demosthenes wrote the following:

"Shame on you Athenians * * * for not wishing to understand that in war one must not allow oneself to be at the command of events, but to forestall them. You Athenians are the strongest of all the Greeks, in ships, cavalry, infantry, and revenue, and you do not make the best of them.

"You make war against Philip like a barbarian when he wrestles—if he suffers a blow, he immediately puts his hand to it. If he is struck again he puts his hand there too; but he has not the skill or does not think of parrying the blow aimed at him or of evading his antagonist. You, likewise, if you hear tell that Philip has attacked the Chaeronea, you send help there; if he is at Thermopylae, you run there; and if he turns aside you follow him, to right or left, as if you were acting on his orders. Never a fixed plan, never any precautions: you wait for bad news before you act."

Thus Demosthenes, the Greek orator, in the fourth century B. C. speaks from Athens to the people of America in 1951 this message of warning we so much need today—that we, in our present danger, must not wait for the bad news of enemy action against us before we act to defend ourselves.

Genocide in Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, for the past 2 years occasional reports have been filtering through from behind the iron curtain of the mistreatment of Jews in Soviet Russia, the annihilation of Jewish cultural life and religious activities, the closing down of Jewish schools and the press, and so forth. It seems that every trace of organized Jewish life in Russia has been wiped out, and this concerns a community of several million souls.

A very prominent Jewish national organization in the United States, the Jewish Labor Committee, has now brought this matter to the attention of the United Commission on Human Rights as a case involving spiritual and cultural genocide. The fate of the Jews in Russia is assuming alarming proportions, the more so since it is almost impossible to ascertain what is actually taking place in that unhappy land and whether the Communist persecution of a minority is limited only to cultural and religious matters or also extends to physical extermination of the Jews.

As for those who are hasty in their judgment of a whole people because of the misdeeds of a few individuals, I can refer them to the current treatment of the Jews in Russia. No better commentary or reply is necessary.

In this connection, I am placing in the RECORD an editorial from the Jewish Advocate, of Boston, March 29, 1951, which reads:

WHAT OF SOVIET JEWRY?

The question of what has become of the Jews in Soviet and satellite countries was brought officially before the international tribunal of the United Nations Human Rights Commission last week. A delegation of the Jewish Labor Committee, consisting of top leaders of the labor movement, including David Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union; Jacob Potofsky, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union; Joseph Baskin, general secretary of the Workmen's Circle; and Adolph Held, chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee, presented a memorandum on the spiritual and cultural "genocide" suffered by the Jewish people in the Soviet Union and its satellite states.

The memorandum, a bulky document based on evidence collected by agents of the Jewish Labor Committee in Communist countries, made certain definite charges and asked specific questions.

According to official Soviet reports, there were 3,000,000 Jews in Soviet Russia in 1939 and some 2,000,000 more were added since World War II. What has become of all these Jews physically and culturally? asks the memorandum. Not a word has filtered through from behind the iron curtain about them for nearly 2 years. It is true that little is known about most other national minorities in the Soviet Union, except what is contained in the official Communist press, but Soviet Jews now lack even this official mention for there is not a single Yiddish newspaper in the whole of Soviet Russia; not a single Yiddish book has been published during the last few years, and not a single act of cultural, literary, religious or artistic activity has been reported on in the Communist press, indicating the existence of any kind of a Jewish group life in the entire country. It is as if the entire 5,000,000 Jews have disappeared culturally and spiritually.

This, the committee rightly considers, is very disturbing, suspicious and even alarming. For until 2 years ago, it was a prominent feature of Soviet propaganda to stress and even to boast of its Yiddish schools, theaters, books, writers, and cultural activities. The committee, therefore, asks: What has become of the network of 1,500 Yiddish schools of which the Soviet press boasted until recently; of the Yiddish Art Theaters, whose fame resounded throughout the world? Where are the newspapers, books, clubs, and social institutions which make up a cultural life? Above all, where are the people who for years had conducted these activities? Where is the group of fine Yiddish novelists, poets, dramatists, and writers whose names have become classics in Yiddish literature and who used to figure so prominently in all Soviet propaganda? And what has become of the famous Crimean colonies; of the so-called Jewish Republic of Biro-Bidjan and of the other specific Jewish social, political and cultural efforts of more than a generation of Jewish life in Soviet Russia?

From these questions the committee easily passed to charges and accusations of spiritual and cultural annihilation of the entire Jewish group in Soviet Russia and made a specific demand of the United Nations to start an investigation, with public hearings similar to those on slave labor, in order to unravel one of the great mysteries of the period and to ascertain with more or less certainty what actually happened to these Jews.

The Jewish Labor Committee, while raising the problem of Soviet mistreatment of the Jews to an international level, also limits it to cultural and spiritual persecution and discrimination, which makes the charges more plausible, more specific and more certain of the sympathy of the entire civilized world, including even parts of the pro-Communist world. It would be futile and it would recoil against the initiators of the effort, if this new move against the Jews were to be compared with the Nazi genocide attempt to exterminate the Jews physically; but a type of genocide effort it nevertheless is, one which seems to work all too effectively, and the Jewish Labor Committee is fully justified in trying to draw the attention of the world to it.

Senate Bill 1, an Act To Provide for the Common Defense, History of Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the present bill before us, S. 1, has two main purposes. The first purpose is that of providing for an extension of selective service and to this purpose there is no real opposition at the present time. The second fundamental purpose is to provide for universal training and service, and to this purpose there is strong and active opposition.

Of course, the history of draft legislation is well known to all of us. The first draft bill in modern times passed by the Congress, was the draft act of the First World War. Again in the course of the Second World War, the draft was put into active operation, but the first peacetime passage of a draft law in this country was immediately before the Second World War when the House Military Affairs Committee reported to the Congress a bill invoking selective service in anticipation of the military needs of the country as we approached the obvious eminence of war.

Universal military training in this country is not a matter of recent origin or discussion. Shortly after the end of the First World War, patriotic and service organizations and leading exponents of a strong national defense, urged the early adoption of a system of military training to give our country a strong military posture. It was not, however, until the establishment of the Woodrum committee, headed by that able former colleague of ours now gone to his reward, Cliff Woodrum, of Virginia, that Congress took official recognition of an argument which had been waged in this country through more than two decades. I was a member of the Woodrum committee and I attended most of its sessions which ran for 3 or 4 months daily, hearing arguments and assembling information as to universal military training. Its report is available to Members of Congress at the present time.

Following the end of the Woodrum committee hearings, the old House Military Affairs Committee held one or more extensive hearings on the same subject and as a member of the Military Affairs Committee, I sat through these hearings also. In fact, the House Military Affairs Committee voted out a bill which, however, was never favorably approved by the House of Representatives.

The present bill, S. 1, represents the result of extensive hearings of both House and Senate. These hearings have extended over a period of many weeks when military leaders and civilians were heard either for or against the present measure. Heretofore the House has taken the lead in handling this type of legislation, but in this instance the Senate has acted upon universal military training and sent the measure to us for our consideration. Our Committee on Armed Services reported the measure favorably with only three opposition votes to it.

MANPOWER IS OUR GREAT PROBLEM

Mr. Speaker, manpower today is our great problem. National defense requires the service of many, many persons. As national defense is set up today, it in effect requires the full response of a Nation in time of crisis or of war. This has produced a strong need of manpower. The anomalous situation is that 10 years ago this country had a population of 132,000,000 people and an unemployment load of 15,000,000 persons. There were those at that time who were loud in proclaiming that this country had reached the saturation point in population and that there would always be a surplus of persons in our midst.

In a few short years, our population has increased to 153,000,000 people and in the same time the employment situation has completely reversed itself. At the present time, there is an extreme shortage of manpower. This shortage has gone into the labor market to bring into use women in employment and many jobs heretofore jealously guarded by the male segment of our population are now made available to trained women personnel so badly needed by this country in crisis. The shortage in agriculture workers has reached the point where we are extending our program of bringing hundreds of thousands of Mexican laborers into this country for the purpose of helping grow and harvest our farm crops. I saw official figures given by the government recently to show that at present over 63,000,000 persons are employed in the United States, an all time record for employment. Yet all of this is not enough. It does not relieve all of our present problems.

We are in a world crisis and in this crisis we are seeking by this legislation to put our defense house back in order. From a position of military preeminence in 1945, we fell quickly into a position of military impotence. A great machine put together for the successful waging of World War II, disintegrated so rapidly as soon as fighting ceased as to cause the Nation to rub its eyes in wonderment as to whether it could be so rapid and so complete. We are now engaged in the difficult job of providing the Nation with a well-balanced Military Establishment of 3,500,000 persons and at the same time, we are engaged in a program of reinforcing our Army, Navy, and Air Force with needed implements and machines for the conducting of modern war. We, therefore, find our machine shops, lathes, and factories competing with the armed services in their efforts to obtain the needed personnel.

Because of this, our committee presents to you a program for the extension for 3 years of the program for the drafting of military personnel by selective-service means. There is no alternative to this if we are to make an honest and faithful effort to give to our country reasonable national security.

It is a sad chapter in our national defense history to read of the failure to develop a proper Reserve program. George Washington, our first Commander in Chief, warned that the duties of defense fall upon the militia, meaning all able-bodied men of the Nation. In spite of repeated warning from the birth of this Republic to the present day, our Reserve program has been sadly neglected. For the first time this bill will provide the fundamentals for the organization of such a program.

Under the terms of the bill men from 18 years 6 months to 26 are subject to induction and service, not to exceed 26 months. Under the terms of this measure these men are subject to a total of 6 years active and reserve service. When a period of active training and service is completed, these men are referred to the Reserves. They may go into the National Guard or into the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard Reserves. They will then no doubt be placed in organizations and assigned definite duties depending upon their previous training, education, aptitude, and locality. The program will then have to determine what part of these men will be put in organized units and Congress will have to provide the money for them.

I personally believe that out of 1,100,000 men reaching the age of 18 years 6 months, some 550,000 or 600,000 will be immediately available for training under the provisions of the National Security Training Corps. The difference is represented by those who are weeded out due to mental or physical deficiencies and disabilities, by those deferred for educational and occupational reasons or who are granted hardship deferments or discharges. Many of these men will subsequently come into training and service as reasons for the deferments are eliminated. While the Security Training Corps may begin with 550,000, in time it may reach a peak of 700,000 or 750,000, and in the overall set-up there should in time be 3,000,000 men in the Reserves. If the number becomes greater than Congress wishes to provide the funds for, under regulations, those furthest removed from training and service can be discharged from the active Reserve. This can be done by regulations.

During the course of this debate already universal training has been repeatedly referred to as an alien philosophy by those who would defeat this proposal in this bill. They refer to this as an alien doctrine imported from the Old World into the New.

These people who would wreck the UMT proposal fail to heed the history of this country and the facts of this case. It was General Washington, the Father of our Country, who suggested many years ago that the burden of defense of a country falls properly upon all of the militia, meaning all of the male citizens of this country. Through the years our leaders interested in our security have urged the need for an extensive program of national defense based upon the use of a militia, both organized and unorganized, and in recent years, since the organized militia has been turned into the National Guard, they have urged universal military training. Leaders, such as Dr. Connant whose reputation as patriotic Americans and educators of international reputation, after making most careful studies of the proposal of universal military training, have repeatedly urged the adoption of such proposals.

More than that, every patriotic organization in the country has gone on record in favor of UMT, which the opponents have dubbed "alien philosophy." If it is an alien philosophy to follow the recommendations of great patriotic organizations such as the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the American Legion, then I am willing to rest my case on these recommendations from them. On the contrary, rather than being an alien philosophy, a system of providing for universal training is more nearly democratic than that system which provides for selection of only a limited number of people upon whom the whole burden of defense may fall.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING AND SERVICE

The fundamental question which must be resolved by this House is whether or not we are to have a universal military training and service program? I think it is most appropriate that this matter should finally, at long last, come before the House for a vote. The country has waited many years for us to stand up and be counted on a controversy which involves the safety of the Nation.

Years ago I become interested in a program of universal military training. In fact, I introduced several universal military training bills at the request of the American Legion. I became interested in the universal military training program because of my deep and abiding interest in the Reserve program. I believe also that the burden of defense of the Nation should not rest upon a selected group of individuals called upon to carry the full burden of defense responsibility. I have always entertained the view that the obligation of national security should rest as far as possible uniformly upon all members of the male segment of our population within certain active ages. I, therefore, have supported, and do now without reservation support, S. 1, and especially the provision relating to universal training and service.

I have devoted much of my time while in Congress to work on the Reserve program. In my judgment, it has never been what one would call an adequate or a satisfactory program. The Navy Reserve program has been fairly satisfactory in the past and at least there has not been the friction observable in the Navy Reserve program as has obtained in the Army Reserve program. The Air Reserve program is of short history and during the time when it has been in operation it has been changed and reorganized one or more times because of difficulties and objections to the prevailing program.

The coming of the First World War found us without any Reserve program whatsoever. We had to start from scratch, enlisting first by voluntary means the needed manpower for our Army and Navy. We followed this belatedly with a selective-service law which was in full operation before the war ended.

The coming of the Second World War found us with a makeshift Reserve program. Even before that many of us had urged that a more adequate Reserve program be built up to implement the provisions of the National Defense Act relating to the Reserve Establishment. In spite of this fact, when the Second World War came, we found that we had a National Guard in varying states of readiness numbering 350,000 men and had a Reserve wholly inadequate and without personnel, training, or equipment necessary. In fact, the Reserve program, outside of the National Guard, consisted largely of Reserve officers, and when the War Department called all of the Reserve officers to active duty, it found that this call produced only 110,000 available, physically fit officers of the proper age. This call of 110,000 completed the activation of the War Department Reserve program.

With the coming of the crisis in Korea, we found ourselves with a Reserve program numbering roughly two and one-half million persons. This Reserve included the Army, National Guard, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force. Of this two and one-half million persons, only 900,000 were on a pay status. The others were largely inactive or volunteer Reserves serving without pay and without regular training. The Congress began at that time to appropriate roughly $1,000,000,000 per annum for the Reserve program, but this money included the ROTC as well as the other parts of our Reserve program. To date roughly 30 percent of our total National Guard has been called into service, consisting of about 80 percent of the Air National Guard, and four divisions of the Ground Guard, plus two regimental combat teams of the National Guard. At the time Korea broke upon a peaceful world, the Navy had the largest active Reserve Establishment which totaled 1,200,000 persons. At the present time almost the entire Marine Reserve and almost the entire Enlisted Reserve of the Army has been called into service.

Mr. Speaker, during the time that I have remained in the House of Representatives, I have always exhibited a real, active interest in our Reserve establishment. As a result of this fact, I believe more than any other person, I have received criticisms, suggestions, and advices as to the handling of the recall of our Reserves into active service. I have literally received thousands of letters from Reserves from all over the country, protesting induction into service and asking that the burden of defense be made more universal. Many of these men are veterans with years of active war service. Thousands are men with families who have for the second time within a short period left their homes, their families, and their businesses to fight for the security of this country.

Many of these men are Organized Reserves; but they feel in many cases that others upon whom the burden of national defense has not yet fallen should be called upon to do their part. Many of them are men with hardship cases; and they have gone patriotically to do their duty the second time for their country within a few years. Thousands of these men are what are called inactive Reserves; and they are men without training as Reserves, without uniform, without organization, and without pay as Reserves. They were certainly led to believe that they would be called to the colors only after the Organized Reserves; and they feel that they should be used again only in the case of an all-out war. Not a mail comes to my office which does not bring new appeals from these men, many of whom are in far-off Korea.

I believe firmly in rotation. I believe in liberalization of the burden of defense. I believe in equity and fair treatment. I believe that these men have a case; and that they are entitled to come home after a reasonable service. The provision of this bill as written will give these men hope of an early return to their homes and their families. I submit these men have a right to life and home just as much as others who have not carried the full burden of American citizenship. We cannot have a satisfactory rotation policy without legislation. We must have this bill.

Under the terms of this bill, our men upon reaching the age of 18½ years would enter the Military Establishment. They would then replace those who are presently serving with long tours of duty in the present Korean war and during the Second World War. They would then do their part in the defense of this country. There would then be equity and fair treatment in the handling of the military burden.

Heretofore, our theory of the duty of the Reserve was to be available for call out in the case of an all-out war. Few of them contemplated, as they year by year worked actively in the Reserve program, that they would be called to Korea or to other parts of the world in times such as this. They were willing to go when the all-out needs of the country demanded. They were willing to grow older, acquire responsibilities, businesses, and families under these conditions. They are not going now to stay in this program.

Many of these men tell me that they will not continue in the Reserve program once they are out of service. They tell me that they are not satisfied to carry the entire program. In fact, I have not heard of a single one who has said that he will continue voluntarily in the Reserves after he serves a second time in the active establishment.

We here in the Congress are going to wake up some morning and find that we have no Reserve personnel. We are going to find that the program upon which we have spent so much time and to which we have given so much lip service has dissipated as a mirage in summer. We are then going to look around and find ourselves stripped of our national defense except the Regular Establishment filled with cadres from the Reserves with long years of service, and with men from selective service.

Our Reserve defenses are getting into bad shape, and our hope of bringing them up to par again is to work out a new Reserve program, one which will bring new blood into the program and which will be fair to those who participate in it. This bill holds out these hopes for the future.

Here we are in the midst of a world crisis. We are face to face with Communist aggression; we are beset with troubles in the Far East and in Europe. Every few months, a new crisis appears, threatening to engulf the world again in war. Sinister and sadist influences fan out from the Kremlin; and seek to enslave the world. I doubt that any more loathesome and despicable doctrines have ever been carried on the winds of propaganda which sweep the world than those which emanate out of the Kremlin, and at this moment we find our reserve defenses in a wretched condition.

Oh, you may try to place the blame for this condition on first one cause or the other; but regardless of who or what brought this about, we are dealing with a fact—an accomplished fact—and only by treating with the existing condition can we hope to meet this situation.

We must establish a sound program of building up and maintaining a sound reserve. We can do this by establishing universal military training, which will be the vehicle for supplying the men for this strong reserve.

But if we choose to defeat UMT—then we must depend upon our veterans; or we must continue to induct men for service, followed by required service in the Reserve.

In that respect, I must say that I am somewhat amused by some of the arguments that I have heard against UMT. I have heard that it will destroy democracy; I have heard that it will corrupt the morals of our youth; I have heard that this proposed bill is an unholy alliance.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the bill before us today is an unholy alliance, then the Selective Service Act of 1940 was a Judas kiss, and the 1948 act is the ethereal spirit of Benedict Arnold, because it will come as an awful shock to some people to learn that we had substantially this program by a different name on the statute books twice since 1940. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the 1940 act inducted men for service and then provided that they be put into the Reserves for 10 years; and the 1948 act inducts men for service and provides that they serve in the Reserves for 5 years.

And, in both the 1940 act and the 1948 act, this so-called awful military bastille, the Pentagon, retained complete control over the training and the Reserve assignment.

It is time the opponents of this bill realized that the provisions of this bill provide for civilian control of the universal military training features of the bill.

And, if we do not adopt this bill, we will have to continue drafting men for service for the indefinite future. For those who distrust the men we have selected to lead our Armed Forces, I say this, the bill before you today places universal military training in the hands of civilians; but if we compel the drafting of men for service for an indefinite period by defeating this bill, we will be forcing the Nation to maintain a large military force under the complete control of the military leaders, and at a tremendous cost to the Nation's economy.

Mr. Speaker, make no mistake about this—the American people will not permit this Nation to become weak during these perilous times. They will demand protection, as they have the right to demand, and that protection will either be a large standing Army, or an adequate, well-trained Reserve. We propose the creation of a strong Reserve—constantly maintained by freshly trained men who have completed a period of 6 months of universal military training. Our proposal provides security. It provides security at far less cost than the maintenance of a large standing force. And it provides security with far less disruption of American lives. Which do you prefer: Keeping our World War II veterans on active duty and drafting men for 26 months of service; or a system by which young men can be trained for a short period of time and then returned to their communities for normal peacetime pursuits and a reasonable Reserve obligation?

I suppose it is natural for a general and an admiral to want to command more and more men. I have even known Congressmen who have wanted to enlarge their constituency. But it seems to me that we ought to pause here for a moment and consider just what UMT means to the generals and the admirals.

As the size of our Reserve increases, the size of our standing forces will decrease. That is the economic justification for UMT. And, let us give credit where credit is due. As the size of our standing forces decrease, the need for general officers and increased rank decreases proportionately. No, Mr. Chairman; instead of criticizing our military leaders for favoring UMT, I think it is time we gave them the credit that is their due.

UMT has also been called a foreign ideology. I never knew that the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other patriotic organizations sponsored un-American ideas. It is the first time I have ever heard Dr. Conant called un-American. It has surprised me to hear that George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and James Madison embraced a foreign philosophy. And, contrary to all of the laurels that have been heaped upon him, it is the first time I ever heard George Marshall accused of favoring the destruction of democracy.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe the American people are thinking far ahead of some of the opponents of this bill. I believe the American people, being realists, want preparedness. I believe they want universal military training. And I, for one, will support this measure without reservation. If it is undemocratic to favor national security, then I answer the charge of being undemocratic; if it is un-American to favor UMT, then I answer the charge of being un-American; if the proposed bill is a shotgun marriage, then I can think of no better honor than to be the best man; if this bill is an unholy alliance, then the preservation of freedom and liberty is grim mockery.

Let those who oppose preparedness now, as they did in 1940, and again in 1948, explain their actions to posterity. For me the course is clear—preparedness now or disaster later.

India's Food Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the Washington Post of April 2 contained a very fine editorial urging the Congress to act and to act now on the proposal to extend emergency food aid to India. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDIA'S FOOD CRISIS

Congress ought to stop dilly-dallying with the President's February 12 request for emergency action to cope with the mounting food crisis in India. The longer the necessary legislation is delayed, the more acute will grow the threat of famine. By the same token, the easier it will be for subversive Communist forces to capitalize on the accompanying unrest in the great Asian subcontinent.

As pointed out by the President in his February message, India's 1950 food crop has been sharply reduced by earthquakes, floods, droughts, and locust plagues, with the result that 6,000,000 tons of grain must be imported this year. The Nehru government has arranged for the cash purchase of four million from Canada, the United States, Australia, and several other countries. It is hard put, however, to finance the remaining two million, which apparently can be procured only from us.

To meet this critical situation, the President has recommended to Congress that it promptly authorize shipments to cover the 2,000,000-ton deficiency, but that it appropriate—in the form of an outright grant—funds to cover just half of the total, with India paying all the ocean freight charges. As for the question of financing and supplying the remaining 1,000,000 tons, action would be deferred pending additional study. Further, as far as conditions are concerned, the Nehru government would undertake to distribute our aid fairly, keep the public fully informed as to its source, and employ the proceeds from its sale to help improve the Indian economy with the assistance of a special mission from our Economic Cooperation Administration.

But the President's request—which he has just described as urgent in a new appeal for congressional action—has bogged down in the House. Although approved by the Foreign Affairs Committee, it has run into a road block in the Rules Committee. Some members are opposed to the idea of a grant. Others want the proposed aid conditioned on a raw-materials agreement with India. And more than a few are inclined to be hostile because Prime Minister Nehru—whose efforts to walk a neutrality tightrope between the free West and the Soviet Union have led him to make some pretty muddled statements—is in disagreement with the United States over Red China and how best to stop aggression in Asia.

But while Congress hems and haws over issues of this kind—and while Moscow and Peiping reportedly are making good propaganda for themselves with offers to send small supplies of food—the specter of hunger looms larger and larger for many millions of Indian men, women, and children. Famine does not wait on legislation. As the President has pointed out, prompt action is vital. It is vital because summer will bring the monsoon season to India, and many roads will then become impassable for grain shipments to remote parts of the country.

Thus, from now on, every day that Congress fails to deal with this matter will increase the difficulty of heading off starvation conditions in India. The House and the Senate, if they are going to act favorably at all—and it seems inconceivable that they will not do so—ought to act now. Our humanitarian traditions, the simple rules of Christianity, demand as much. Beyond that, our own self-interest is directly involved, for the consequences of an Indian famine could gravely affect the security of this Nation and the entire free world.

Pity the Poor Retailers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TIMOTHY P. SHEEHAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been hearing from retailers and their organizations as to the hardship and complications incurred by the new pricing regulations.

One of the newspapers in my district, the Edison-Norwood Review, covered some of the retailer's trials and tribulations in their editorial of Friday, March 30, which follows:

Washington has again hit the small-business man with a new price regulation order called ceiling price regulation No. 7. This instrument is designed to establish fair mark-ups and in its way, curb inflation.

The new regulation will need a Philadelphia lawyer to interpret its meaning and figure out how it is to be compiled. A local merchant has had a qualified man working full time for 2 weeks compiling the data for his store. The man has spent over 100 hours and is now half done.

Another merchant stated that he would have to close his store in order to fill out the regulation on time.

Meetings have been held in Park Ridge and many local merchants have attended them in order to acquaint themselves with the requirements. After three meetings they stated they didn't understand it any more fully.

Why does a Government agency have to be so complicated, why are things made so hard that the people for whom they are intended can't understand them? Most retailers want to do a good job and follow the regulation.

If the Government continues to make ceiling-price regulations so difficult that they are not understood, then they will not be followed.

It can be summed up from a quote from another small-town paper:

Jefferson (Ky.) Jeffersonian: "Pity the poor retailers as they tackle the tape that ties together the big bundle of price-control regulations. O, simplicity, thou art a jewel."

The Responsibility of the United States in Building a Stable World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "To Regain the Peace Initiative," written by me and published in the New York Times magazine of yesterday.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO REGAIN THE PEACE INITIATIVE

(By HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.)

After an American writes an article or makes a speech or persuades a group to adopt a resolution, he feels that he has accomplished something real—and rightly so, because we live in a country in which words are important. Words matter in America because ours is a government in which public opinion underlies all our public-policy decisions. Words matter also because ours is a government of laws in which due process, and not the whim of an individual dictator, counts.

Perhaps this American faith in words explains the fact that our most frequent error in foreign relations throughout the years has been our tendency to believe we have accomplished something in international affairs merely by uttering words and then proclaiming our agreement with them. The ineffectiveness of such proclamations becomes painfully clear when we reflect that the most powerful nation outside of the United States is not moved by public opinion, and authority in that nation rests on the whim of the dictator rather than the due process of impartial law.

This overreliance on words has in many vital international undertakings caused us to put the cart before the horse. In the United Nations Charter, for instance, we subscribed to an all-embracing commitment to repel aggression wherever, whenever, and under whatever conditions it might occur, regardless of the lack of military force without which aggression could not be repelled, let alone prevented.

This is undoubtedly the rock on which the United Nations is most likely to founder—and the aggression in Korea very nearly did wreck it. Should another aggression occur and should once again the rank and file of member states of the United Nations fail to put up military manpower in proportion to their populations, the faith of the American people in the United Nations will fall to a new low.

We read of "victories" at Lake Success for the American viewpoint, but it is not much of a "victory" for the United Nations to vote 54 to 5 in favor of our position when the only result of the vote is to permit us—and a few other stalwart nations—to expand our own manpower. As a United States delegate to the United Nations, I was frequently reminded that it was only fair for the United States to make a large financial contribution to the United Nations because we had more dollars per capita than any other nation. To this truth must be added the far more poignant truth that our manpower per capita is no greater than that of the other nations of the world.

When, therefore, we consider the world role of the United States, we would be wise to ask, "What can we do?" before we ask "What should we do?" Such an attitude would at least mean that whatever decision was finally made would be a valid decision with a practical hope of success. In conformity with unhappy tradition, many of us still argue foreign policy by trying to divide the American people into globalists, internationalists, and interventionists on the one hand and retreatists, nationalists, and isolationists on the other. Actually it would be far more fruitful to argue on the basis of what we can or cannot do. If our potential is clear, our course will no longer be obscure.

When we think of the world role of the United States, there comes to mind the picture of a great powerhouse from which huge cables extend to engines in distant parts of the world. The force of the current flowing through these cables, the very length of the cables themselves, and the size of the engines in foreign lands all depend on the amount of power which the United States powerhouse can generate.

National power is not a fixed quantity. A nation, like a man in a rowboat on a river in front of a float, is either going backward or forward; he is never standing still. Nor can national power be measured like so many yards of cloth; there is too much stretch to it. It certainly cannot be measured by population, since people in some countries are much more productive than they are in others. It cannot be measured by natural resources—whether agricultural or mineral—because these have to be converted into usable goods. The best measure of national power is production. The trump card of our national defense in World War II was our productive power. Thus the first requirement for a successful American role in the world is big production.

This is, in truth, the lifeblood of our economic influence abroad. But this is not all. Without big production, we cannot have other forms of national power such as scientific development, which is of such great international importance, notably in atomic and medical fields. Without it we cannot have military power, which gears itself to industrial production and thus to the economic strength of the entire civilian community.

Without it we would lose our ideas of political freedom, which can only exist in a climate created by a competitive and productive economy. These are the ideas which give life to the whole system and, in essence, are that for which we fight. While military power cannot exist without big production and cannot exist without men, the basic truth is that men will not be effective fighters without an affirmative and enthusiastic faith in their country's institutions. This they will not have if the pressing social problems which our competitive economic system in some instances is not able to handle effectively are not solved by public action.

The world role of the United States, therefore, regardless of social justice or of ordinary liberal or conservative political philosophy, requires policies which stimulate production. These may take the form of tax laws which encourage the little man with the bright idea who is fundamentally the source of new jobs and new wealth, or keeping the dollar constant and requiring economy and efficiency in Government, which will maintain economic health and make production attractive.

And this same American role equally calls for social action that meets whatever pressing problems are not solved by our competitive, free-enterprise system. There must thus be certain standards of living—of health, of security, of housing, and of civil rights—so that the young men who come out of American homes will be enthusiastic for American life as they actually know it. On no other basis can American Armed Forces be constructed. American political leadership must thus demonstrate by deeds that our society has dynamic purpose, which, in the words of the Constitution, is "to establish justice"; and that we really believe the words which we all learn in school, "that all men are created equal."

These are some of the things which make a strong American potential, which provide the energy for the American powerhouse. If America is not strong, she cannot have an effective world role. Without an effective American world role, the free world is in danger.

Let us assume a powerful America and face the questions of how to use our potential and how to determine our responsibilities as a member of the family of nations. The aim of American foreign policy, which must also be the aim of the free world, is: To preserve peace, and if the struggle against communism should turn to war, to have effective partners.

We, therefore, should help to build a stable world. This does not mean a static world. Ideally speaking, it connotes rapid yet orderly progress. It requires a multipurpose effort and before we can really set about it we must first regain the initiative which we lost in 1945, when we so imprudently disintegrated our Armed Forces which had won us the victory, and lost the chance to create a lasting peace.

The first step is to build military strength both at home and abroad, which we have started to do. Secondly, based on our productive power, we must build economic strength abroad. We must also, in the third place, conduct a really effective campaign of information which not only gives the truth about America and the free world but which will be part of whatever promising counterrevolution for freedom there may be. Underlying these programs is the one rule in foreign policy which applies without exception—that all programs be on the basis of "continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid." These words, taken from the North Atlantic Pact, are "the law and the prophets."

1. In the military field this obviously means: A maximum effort in the most efficacious manner by our allies in the Atlantic Pact; by the former neutrals and former enemies of World War II; and by the stateless men in all parts of the world who wish to make their military contribution to the defense against Communist imperialism.

Perhaps our greatest military weakness as a Nation is in the quantity of our manpower; due to the requirements of production only a comparatively small residue is left for the armed services; of this residue a large part goes to highly mechanized branches, such as the Navy and Air Force, leaving a relatively small number for combat troops. In this regard we ourselves must always do our full part and never accept foreign help as a substitute for our own effort. But obviously we must welcome any supplement to that effort, whether it comes from allies in their own uniform and under their own flag or from aliens who fight as individual allies in our uniform and under the Stars and Stripes.

2. In the economic field the Marshall plan shows what great things can be accomplished when the principle of complete self-help and mutual aid is applied. We cannot stop economic aid now. A revolution is under way in the world, particularly in the East. Less-favored nations will not stand still and be content with the low living standards of the past. The agents of communism have their greatest success in countries in which poverty and disease prevail.

These conditions cannot be met with military power—or with propaganda. The young American doctor, with his capacity to cure diseases, and the young engineer, with his knowledge of irrigation and electric power, can discharge a vital American responsibility, which will pay immense dividends in peace for ourselves and the world.

As General Eisenhower said:

"Communism inspires and enables its militant preachers to exploit injustices * * * among men. This ideology appeals not to the Italian or Frenchman or South American as such but to men as human beings who become desperate in the attempt to satisfy common human needs. Therein it possesses a profound power for expansion. Wherever popular discontent is founded on group oppression or mass poverty or the hunger of children, there communism may stage an offensive that arms cannot counter. Discontent can be fanned into revolution, and revolution into social chaos. The sequel is dictatorial rule. Against such tactics exclusive reliance and military might is vain. The areas in which freedom flourishes will continue to shrink unless the supporters of democracy match Communist fanaticism with clear and common understanding that the freedom of men is at stake; meet Communist-regimented unity with the voluntary unity of common purpose, even though this may mean a sacrifice of some measure of nationalistic pretensions; and, above all, annul Communist appeals to the hungry, the poor, the oppressed, with practical measures untiringly prosecuted for the elimination of social and economic evils that set men against men."

Much can also be done by an overhaul of our own economic policies to end the present economic dependence of foreign governments on the United States Treasury. In this respect it is easier to say what is wrong than to point unhesitatingly to what should be done. But the following observations are perhaps useful: the old system of congressional tariff-making was dangerous and evil and must not be revived; the present system is based on a conception of reciprocity which does not actually exist; there are probably foreign goods which could be admitted without danger to American industry; the new overhaul should be truly national in scope and must not result in a few industries carrying a destructive and unduly heavy burden caused by tariff changes.

As an integral part of this overhaul, our agricultural policy should certainly be revised so that farm prices are not kept so unrealistically high as to push overseas farmers into uneconomic planting of such crops as cotton and wheat, thus reducing United States export of these items.

Paul Hoffman shows that agricultural products have comprised 24½ percent of all United States foreign trade and entire areas in the Southwest Cotton Belt and various wheat States depend largely on foreign customers. He adds that if we believe—as we should—that the mainspring of free enterprise is to expand production by means of high-volume output at low unit cost, we must be troubled by the deadening effect on American agriculture which comes from reversing this process. The Commodity Credit Corporation in 1950 held billions of dollars' worth of surplus grains, eggs, butter, soybeans, and other products which it is either forced to continue to hold or to dump—a procedure which angers the foreign farmers and causes their governments to retaliate.

The harmful effect of such policies on the American consumer is all to clear.

3. We seem to lag behind in the campaign of information and the total political campaign of counterrevolution of which this campaign should be a part. Perhaps one reason we lag is that we have not seen it in its true perspective. When we speak of the "war of ideas," we tend to think in terms of radio broadcasts, printed matter, and the exchange of students. These are all obviously very good things and should be done intelligently and, if done intelligently, should receive adequate funds.

But there are undoubtedly many millions of people in the world whose ideas are much more influenced by being cured of hookworm or by receiving some much-needed food or by converting some desert into land from which they can live. There are undoubtedly many more millions whose ideas will be much more effectively influenced if we can end their fear that either military strength or political guile will make them satellite peoples. There are still many more millions, who are now behind the iron curtain, who will be much more influenced by help in organizing an efficient underground, either in the form of parachuted radio sets, of actual individual helpers, or of any other concrete activities necessary to advance a real counterrevolution for freedom.

Certainly no counterrevolution was ever successfully fomented from outside of a country solely by the use of a broadcasting station. This last is perhaps another example of our reliance on the power of words.

These activities will, if successful, regain the initiative for peace which we lost in 1945. We are justified in believing that, without fighting a war, the Soviet leaders, confronted with such force, will agree to the organization of the peace based on justice which they now spurn. But, of course, if war should come, the policies herein outlined will help us to win the war.

It is natural and human, when we are so clearly on the defensive, to think solely in terms of that defense and to refuse to discuss the day when the arrow of strength points from us to them. But we must, none the less, start planning now the broad policies which we and our partners will favor once we have regained the initiative. We must not be caught once again with a victory on our hands and no mature idea of how we intend to use it. Some broad aims to be achieved after we have regained the initiative are:

1. To establish a reliable program of international inspection and control of atomic activities and conventional armaments on which real disarmament must be based.

2. After halting the present lawless aggression of the strong against the weak, to encourage the freedom-loving elements in all the satellite countries to become members of the free world on an equal basis.

3. To pursue every effective means to give greater strength to the United Nations, urging a special session of the General Assembly to amend the United Nations Charter, as proposed in the Vandenberg resolution of 1948, so that we may actually profit by the bitter experiences which we have recently had, and thus build a truly effective world organization which is based on realities and which cannot be paralyzed by members who actually want to destroy it.

4. The complex of military, economic, and political policies herein described should result in an improvement in the standard of living in the poverty-stricken and disease-ridden areas of the world, notably the East, which will eventually free them both from the suspicion which they now have of the motives of the United States and from the Communist clutches.

5. It should result in the creation of a really strong complex of European peoples—a regional organism which can function efficiently in its own defense, even though it may not be a full-blown United States of Europe.

With the help of providence and an effort which is both vigorously sustained and intelligently led, we might see the sharply defined shape of these five broad aims within 10 years—and without a war.

Thus will be ended the present highly dangerous condition in which there is no balance of power in the world and the United States must carry such an undue part of the load of preserving world peace.

Thus can we start looking for the growth of a common sense of justice on which closer collaboration between peoples can be based.

Thus will we, inspired by the dreams of our founding fathers and doing our share, of course, to keep the peace, be free once again to pursue our own American ideals because there will at least be other strong people to carry a major part of the load.

Thus will an advancing world be able to benefit by our American Revolution, which Lincoln called the "germ which has vegetated and still is to grow and expand into the universal liberty of mankind."

Moral Disarmament and the Propaganda of Chinese Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 9 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, last year in the Senate I compared the propaganda war now raging throughout the world with a vast political campaign. I was therefore particularly interested in an editorial titled "Moral Disarmament" in the March 24 London Economist. This editorial says:

No local politician, however inexperienced, is so foolish as to think that he stands a chance at the polls without the aid of an active party machine. There is no reason why foreign ministers should be more optimistic in the international contest that is now on. A permanent machine for western political warfare should be created, and, once in action, it must be used for firing incessantly into the enemy's ranks.

The editorial concludes along lines recommended in a resolution I submitted to the Senate last year, on which hearings were held by the Foreign Relations Committee. The editorial calls for a North Atlantic political warfare executive, and points out that in political warfare the western nations have, in freedom and truth, two potent weapons which the Communists cannot copy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this penetrating editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed a column from the same issue of the Economist entitled "The Propaganda of Chinese Communism." This column shows what we are now up against in China. It was Russian propaganda which softened the Chinese peoples for the marching Communist armies. It is propaganda today which is being used to keep the Chinese people whipped up to the task set for them by their new Red rulers. This column points out how the Communist speakers of China "proudly proclaim that the most concrete and best contribution China could offer to universal peace at this time is in fighting against American aggression in Korea." I think the Congress will be interested in other illustrations in this column, which parallel the policy pattern set forth in Moscow for Communist propaganda activities throughout the world.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORAL DISARMAMENT

Napoleon's maxim that in war the moral is to the material as three to one has been overquoted and overrated. But it has sane truth, and even in the midst of material preparations for self-defense, the moral campaign should not be forgotten. For a period of time, the length of which no one can foresee, both the free nations and the Soviet Empire face a test of the morale of their citizens. A continuous struggle will be waged for the minds of men, which will range across the frontiers between the two worlds. Political warfare will seek to weaken the resistance of the opponent as well as to strengthen the staying power of friendly populations.

Perhaps these phrases seem overdramatic when applied to Great Britain. Morale to an Englishman is something that only foreigners have—some of them have good morale, some bad. It is true that Great Britain's psychological defenses against political warfare are perhaps the strongest in the world. There are few Communists here, and even in the trade-unions, as an article last week pointed out, their influence, though by no means negligible, is small. But even in England Soviet political warfare should not be written off; the last 6 months have shown how many people will dance to a tune composed in Moscow who would be horrified to know that they are helping the Soviets win the cold war. And in other countries, with livelier imaginations and less fortunate pasts, political warfare can be all-important.

In this campaign the Russians have already secured the initial advantages that come to the party that is both organized and unscrupulous. They have in the World Peace Council, the body which directs the Soviet peace propaganda, an instrument for the moral disarmament of the West which is worth serious attention on account of the part which it plays in Russian strategy. There is some danger of underestimating the council, which recently held a conference in the Soviet sector of Berlin to deal in particular with the question of German and Japanese rearmament. On the face of it, the Berlin conference seemed to be just another gathering, under the sign of Picasso's preposterous bird, at which insults were hurled at America by the stage army of Signor Nenni, the Red dean from Canterbury, Mr. Kuo Mo-jo from Peking, a Soviet woman agronomist, a black African student, German proletarian poets, and Professor Joliot-Curie, in absentia because he had once again been refused a visa. Moreover, the council had mournfully to record that none of its previous demands to the United Nations had been considered by that body. And its latest set a resolutions look on the surface turgid and pretentious.

The council decided to send a last warning to UNO and to present itself as an alternative where the "people"—especially the people of the colonial territories—can air their grievances; it decided to organize regional conferences in France to oppose German rearmament, in India to oppose Japanese rearmament, in Mexico to oppose "Truman imperialism" in Latin America. It will seek joint action with pacifist societies, the Quakers and others, it will canvass the support of the churches, it will set up a propaganda office, start its own newspaper with M. Pierre Cot as editor, and award peace prizes worth 15,000,000 francs through a jury on which the Dean of Canterbury will sit. On the whole, it seemed the council might be dismissed as a talking shop.

There are, however, a number of reasons why such a judgment would be wrong. The first concerns the nature of propaganda in general. Mere reiterated talk with the object of hammering in one simple lesson is the basic method of all effective methods of influencing the minds of men en masse. Once external circumstances appear to accord with the propaganda, the simple slogans that have so often been half-consciously heard become an explanation of events and a guide to behavior. Specifically, the sudden threat of American action against China to counter Chinese intervention in Korea for the first time made large members of Europeans almost automatically conclude that the United States was a potential danger to world peace. At that moment, the Russian campaign scored a victory.

In the second place, the World Peace Council is relatively potent in comparison with western propagandists because it constitutes a branch of an organization. Lenin laid down, and Stalin has adopted the principle, that organization is vital, that once the "correct" policy has been decided upon by the party leaders, everything stands or falls by the extent to which a disciplined organization is in existence to carry it out. The peace campaign is no exception. Policy is laid down by the Cominform, which represents, in the language of capitalism, a holding company with two principal operating subsidiaries—the World Peace Council with the intelligentsia as its "market" and the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) to corner the labor world. In each case the directing brains are provided by the parent company working through the local Communist parties of the world.

All the Cominform branches have a special task allotted to them. The WFTU and subversive agents everywhere must create civil wars, strikes, mutinies, sabotage, and rebellion, and the World Peace Council must see that western governments do nothing about them. The basic aim of all is to bring about "revolutionary situations" in the western camp, following the Leninist tactic whereby the Communist elite preserves itself as a general staff, directing the masses into the front line without exposing itself to disastrous reprisals. Behind the peace campaign are the same revolutionaries who seized power in Russia after mutinies of the masses against an imperialist war, following years of underground subversive work. It is, indeed, one of the most disquieting features of the present situation that so much evidence offers itself to prove that the minds of Russia's aging rulers dwell so much on the experience of their early careers. They appear to be seized with a mortal terror lest any Communist at home or abroad should think that history is not precisely repeating itself down to the last dot of Marxist-Leninist theory and Stalinist practice.

The aim of the peace movement is, then, to aid subversion, not mere pacifism. Quakers and neutralists will be used, but Stalin demands positive actions. The World Peace Council met in Berlin with a directive from the Kremlin, conveyed in Stalin's recent interview with Pravda. It was to take action because, although war is "not yet inevitable," it can only be avoided if "the people's will" makes itself felt. To aid this process, the World Peace Council has two main tasks: The first is to prevent the United Nations from supporting the western powers if they take action to resist aggression, to subdue rebellions, or to arm the Germans and Japanese. The second, related to the first, is to foment the very actions which the western powers are to be hindered from resisting. A resolution at the Berlin conference revealed very clearly the importance which Moscow attaches to unrest in the colonial territories. It was also explained recently by a propagandist speaking to the Russian people. America, he said, would find it hard to start a war until the colonial revolts had been suppressed. In other words, the native rebels are to act as cannon fodder in order to give Russia time to complete its rearmament. This, according to Moscow, is the era of colonial liberation—of the attack on the "rear of the capitalist camp."

The democracies, therefore, are faced with the problem of combating a much more insidious attack than one launched openly by Communists for communism. They must meet an appeal not to do something unpleasant but—far more seductive—to do nothing. How should they best tackle the task? It is clear from the outset that no success can come of trying to overwhelm an organized campaign designed to win the educated masses of the world by an occasional address from an individual to individuals. Western statesmen, foreign offices and broadcasting services must rid themselves of the idea that to make an admirable, weighty rejoinder to Moscow's charges, and to make it once, is enough. If they find it difficult to grasp what is required of them, let them imagine themselves involved in a permanent international general election. No local politician, however inexperienced, is so foolish as to think that he stands a chance at the polls without the aid of an active party machine. There is no reason why foreign ministers should be more optimistic in the international contest that is now on. A permanent machine for western political warfare should be created, and, once in action, it must be used for firing incessantly into the enemy's ranks.

Next to the organization comes the policy. Successful propaganda needs a consistent theme, to be plugged on every occasion. And the theme, if it is to be really effective, must not be defensive. It is true that the Communist accusations of warmongering cannot be left completely unanswered. But much the best defense is attack, unceasing attack against the crimes of the Soviet imperialists. There should be a full-scale onslaught on the fraudulent, sinister peace campaign of the Soviet Union's rulers and their cynical misuse of the workers and colonial peoples. An unremitting attack should be made on Russian imperialism, with exposures of the inner contradictions (to borrow a Marxist phrase) of the neo-czarist camp. The point should be made over and over again that communism means economic exploitation, that its first victims are truth and decency, that it is a device for depressing the living standards of the workers.

In such propaganda there is no need to go beyond the truth—indeed, it would be both wrong and foolish to do so. There is plenty of perfectly truthful material to hand. The peace campaign itself has created difficulties for Moscow which offer many opportunities for exploitation. To take only one example from recent weeks, when Signor Togliatti, on his return from the Kremlin, announces that the Communist Party of Italy will drop its opposition if the Italian Government will only change its foreign policy, he provides an opening which should be seized at once until neither a patriot nor a Socialist can remain in the party with an easy conscience.

In material rearmament it is possible only to have larger numbers than the enemy of the same weapons as are in his hands. In political warfare the western nations have, in freedom and truth, two most potent weapons which the Communists cannot copy. But, like all other weapons, they need to be mounted, ranged, and fired at the enemy to produce any effect. That is the task to which a North Atlantic political warfare executive should be addressing itself.

THE PROPAGANDA OF CHINESE COMMUNISM

The propaganda of communism everywhere conforms to a pattern determined by basic Communist doctrine and theory of revolutionary method. A few essential themes are ceaselessly reiterated, though with a great variety of application, and the definiteness of the Communist objective, combined with the Communist exclusion of dissenting opinion, insures that there is always an effective concentration of publicity forces for a psychological offensive at any time, even though there may occasionally be moments of confusion when one of the notorious somersaults of party policy is taking place in Moscow. These general characteristics of Communist propaganda are evident today in China no less than in European Communist-ruled countries, but the Chinese propaganda output has some features of its own which deserve study.

The dominant theme is the task of preserving world peace by fighting the Americans, as laid down at the Second World Peace Conference in Warsaw, which was attended by a strong delegation of 65 members from China. The head of the delegation, the writer Kuo Mo-jo, thus reported to the Central People's Government Council:

"What were the circumstances under which the Second World Peace Congress was held? On the one hand, we have the aggression clique led by United States imperialism madly engaging itself in an armament program, intensifying its war propaganda, continuously threatening the world with atomic weapons and actively rearming Germany and Japan. * * * On the other hand, we have the invincible world peace camp led by the great Soviet Union, its strength greatly surpassing that of the aggression clique. * * * As was described by Chairman Joliot-Curie, the Congress was truly a real international council of the broad masses of the peoples of the various countries * * * the Congress tried its best to dissuade some of the 'pacifists at all costs' in order to achieve complete unanimity among the delegates on the over-all principle that 'to safeguard world peace, aggression must be opposed.' * * * We Chinese people are now engaged with great vigor in the sacred campaign to resist America, aid Korea, protect our homes and safeguard our country. This is what the Chinese people have done to carry out most faithfully and effectively the decisions of the Second World Peace Congress."

The war in Korea is thus presented as a struggle in defense of peace, in which China has not only the support of the Soviet Union and the People's Democracies but also the backing of the World Peace Congress representing all the peoples of the world—in contrast to the United Nations, which is dominated by the American imperialists. Great efforts have been made to build up the Peace Congress in Chinese publicity as the true parliament of mankind. In the principal cities of Manchuria mass meetings were held and addressed by the delegates on their way back from Warsaw to Peking, and at the capital they were welcomed by General Chu Teh, the commander in chief of the People's Liberation Army:

"Speaker after speaker urged that a wide campaign be launched immediately to spread the message of the Congress throughout the length and breadth of People's China. They proudly proclaimed that the most concrete and best contribution China could offer to universal peace at this time was in fighting against American aggression in Korea."

Combined with this propaganda of the international struggle for peace is the anti-American hate campaign which lives up to the best standards of Communist invective:

"The American and Syngman Rhee butchers carried out a policy as utterly blood curdling as the worst perpetrated by the Hitlerite Fascists. The war as exemplified by the MacArthur cavemen in Korea is not a war between nations. It is a war between men and beasts in human form."

For those Chinese who still remember American philanthropic activities in China in the medical and educational fields, a special propaganda line is adopted:

"Through their economic exploitation the United States sucked the blood and sweat of the Chinese people and then hoped to buy off the Chinese people with a small portion of what they had squeezed from their toil. The United States imperialists specially intensified their cultural aggression against China with a view to spiritually benumbing the Chinese people. They made big investments to subsidize religious, cultural, and relief bodies in China. * * * But the United States imperialists are completely mistaken in thinking that they can really buy the hearts of the Chinese people with a few of their dirty, blood-stained dollars."

Although America is the principal target, British iniquity is not forgotten. A spokesman of the foreign ministry asserted 2 months ago that the "concentration camps" of Malaya were "filled with innocent overseas Chinese," that many Chinese had been "killed and tortured to death" in these camps, and that 400,000 had been made homeless. He demanded that the British Government "immediately put an end to the policy of persecuting and deporting overseas Chinese," release all those detained and pay them compensation for losses suffered. These demands were adopted in resolutions by youth, labor, and other federations.

Fortunately the people's government is able to assure the people that it has nothing to fear from the imperialist instigators of war. In the words of People's China:

"Efficient and brutal in killing peaceful civilians, levelling homes, devastating cities, burning, looting, and raping, the American troops have proved themselves impotent and even imbecile on the battlefield when pitted against patriots and democrats. * * * Alarm and despondency spreads among the American satellites. * * * Mistrust grows in the thieves' kitchen, and particularly mistrust between the United States and Britain and France."

The Chinese people, according to the argument, have for several thousand years been "in the front rank of world culture," but for the past century they were "ruthlessly oppressed" by the capitalist imperialist nations. But Chinese patriots "found the truth of Marxism-Leninism as a weapon to free the Chinese people." This has enabled China "to surpass the western capitalist nations ideologically, politically, and even militarily." With its Russian alliance China is now invincible:

"The alliance of the victorious Chinese people and the Soviet people is not only the alliance of the countries of the largest populations and territories in Asia and Europe; it is also the alliance of the most advanced and most consolidated countries. Therefore, such an alliance is matchless."

Letter From Constituent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Edward Menhennett, 389 Chenango Street, Binghamton, N. Y.:

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., March 19, 1951.
Hon. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I wish to thank you very much for all the legislation which you have introduced in the Congress of the United States.

I feel free to express my feelings concerning my friendship for you because you support the desires of your constituents who have placed their trust in you as their Congressman we all know.

This is true, you supported the Townsend bill in Congress, and may the good Lord bless you and that we may always keep you in Congress as long as you wish to stay.

I remain,
Most respectfully,
EDWARD MENHENNETT.

Another Marine Speaks His Thoughts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, another Marine speaks his thoughts as follows:

FORT WAYNE MARINE SAYS KOREAN WAR IS "USELESS"

FORT WAYNE, IND., March 29.—President Truman has received a letter from a Fort Wayne Marine lieutenant, serving in Korea, denouncing the Korean War as useless.

The letter was received by the editor of the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel from Marine Lt. Gale C. Buuck, of E Company, Second Battalion, Seventh Marines, First Marine Division, who has been in Korea since January. The letter said:

"Will you please relay the following question to Harry S. Truman?

"How many years are you going to let American manpower, materials, and money drain into this Korean sewer? How many more of my men must die on account of your stubborn refusal to pull out of Korea? The undersigned dares you to take the following issue to the people:

"Shall we pull out of Korea?

"Some day you shall answer for this sell-out of American manpower and materials. Unfortunately, on account of you and your administration, most of the boys over here won't be alive to register their righteous wrath against this sell-out.

"Again the question, Mr. Truman, how long must we stay here in this God-forsaken hole of Korea?"

Lieutenant Buuck also sent the following note to the editor:

"I believe that you stand a better chance of getting this message to H. S. T. than I do. Do what you will with it but I had to sound off.

"I could write 20 pages on the utter uselessness of this war in Korea. All my men hope for two purple hearts, or a wound severe enough, which will make them eligible to return home.

"Two days ago, I lost over 50 percent of my men taking one hill—and for what? None of us know why we are here and none of us can understand why we stay.

"Never have American men fought in a more useless war. (At least, that's the way they feel about it.)

"Surely, someone back home ought to wake up Congress or somebody and get us out of here."

The News-Sentinel announced it had forwarded the letter to President Truman.

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering what he thinks of the sending home of 123,000 South Koreans and how many here at home are in doubt as to the cause of this war—its objectives—the things which our fighting men must accomplish before it is over.

Europe Sells Our Steel Back to United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. McVEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. McVEY. Mr. Speaker, press reports reveal that America has shipped to Europe more steel than certain countries can use. This is a strange anomaly, especially in view of the shortage which many manufacturers are experiencing. Some of the steel which we have shipped to Europe is pouring back into this country at exorbitant prices, a Government agency has admitted. Other steel of an inferior quality is being shipped to America from Marshall-plan countries which have found they can get a better grade of steel free from this country and sell their inferior products to us.

The Economic Cooperation Administration is authority for the statement that the Netherlands has been selling in America large quantities of steel given them under the foreign aid program. That country has been given so much steel that it has been able to invade the American market in which our own manufacturers have been unable to buy the specified steel at any price.

The ECA admits that other countries which are receiving steel under the ECA are not only selling some of it in American markets—they may be selling it to the iron curtain countries. A spokesman for the ECA explained that much of the steel sent to foreign countries had been sold to private operators who had stored it instead of using it for reconstruction purposes. Some of this steel had been stored since lend-lease days.

This situation was first called to the attention of the ECA when an Atchison, Kans., manufacturer paid premium prices for steel and then discovered it was stamped "Lend-Lease from U. S. A."

It seems strange that in our rush to distribute our resources all over the world, we should not find time to study the problems of other countries and place our gifts where they are needed, and where they will be used for the purposes for which they are intended. The merits of lend-lease and Marshall aid may raise debatable questions in the minds of some people. There is no argument, however, in favor of grants of aid to countries which do not need the materials furnished them and which by subterfuge attempt to gouge American firms through the sale of our products back to us at exorbitant prices. Some effective manner of preventing such injustice is the responsibility of those who administer our foreign-aid program.

Curbing Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the Long Beach (Calif.)—my home town—Press-Telegram is a daily paper.

Its headline editorials for January 12, 1951, January 15, 1951, and February 28, 1951, are ones which I feel pleased to call to your attention and to that of all of my distinguished colleagues in this Congress.

They are as follows:

[From the Long Beach (Calif.) Press-Telegram of January 12, 1951]

NEW CONGRESS FACES CHALLENGE OF CURBING DANGEROUS INFLATION

Inflation faces the Eighty-second Congress with a challenging problem.

Immensely larger military outlays will be necessary. They may rise about $75,000,000,000 in the 12 months starting next July. Congress will not stint these appropriations. But authorizing heavy expenditures is easy. Financing them by methods that won't eat away the buying power of money that people receive for their labor is what will put political courage to the acid test.

The frightening fact about inflation is that it has occurred because the people thought it was inevitable.

Applied in time, price and wage controls could have stopped the spiral. But the authority Congress voted last August is defective. It actually forbids effective controls of farm and food prices. And only now is the Government setting up the machinery necessary for enforcing controls at all.

In 1951 inflation has gained alarming headway even before the forces that set it off in 1941 really have begun to operate again. But this year will witness a rapid acceleration of those forces. Government spending for rearmament must be vastly increased. That, inevitably, despite our tremendous productive capacity, must mean fewer goods and services for the civilian market.

For whereas the defense program of 10 years ago started from a depression, this one starts amid a great boom. The labor force is almost fully employed. Most industries are operating at or near their plants' capacities. The national income in 1951 is expected to be more than two and one-half times what it was in 1941.

This country cannot produce enough guns to insure its safety in a threatened world, and at the same time, enough butter to increase, or even maintain, its people's present living standards. If a swelling supply of dollars chases a shrinking supply of things the people can spend them for, disastrous inflation will result. They are quite right who say that price-wage controls alone cannot prevent it. Nothing can prevent it unless other stern measures counteract the tendency of huge defense spending to increase the already vast supply of consumer cash and credit.

Chief of the weapons that should be used is taxation. Still higher tax rates on individuals and corporate incomes; taxes on purchases; taxes enough to pay as you go the costs of the defense program and of Government.

Restrictions have been imposed on consumer and business credit. They should be further tightened to keep income not yet earned from joining money already circulating in the competition for scarce goods.

A companion weapon is rigorous economy in Government, an economy that will slash drastically spending on all ordinary projects and activities, cuts that will fully match the sacrifices demanded of the people.

Taking such steps is the duty that confronts the new Congress and challenges its courage.

[From the Long Beach (Calif.) Press-Telegram of January 15, 1951]

WHO SHOULD FOOT DEFENSE COSTS?—INCOME STATISTICS SAY EVERYONE

President Truman's request for $140,000,000,000 for lending and spending in the 2 years ending June 30, 1952, emphasizes the gravity of the international problem and this country's relation to it. The request also raises the question of how the costs of this program will be divided.

Notwithstanding passage of two tax measures and imminence of a third, Washington has not yet faced up to the question of who will pay for rearmament, just as it has avoided making many another hard decision since last June. Yet it is clear that if a slow, protracted erosion of United States currency is to be prevented, the cost must be wrung out of today's toil. As 1951 wears on, the piper will grow increasingly importunate. He must be paid. Experiences during World War II and afterward have shown he had best be paid promptly.

Who is to foot the bill? One good measure of ability to pay is the statistical record of national income. From that single gigantic purse must be taken the bulk of the taxes needed each year to defray Federal expenses. In the September quarter of 1950, the United States was earning at the rate of $240,000,000,000 a year (before taxes), or roughly $4,600,000,000 a week. Of this amount, $145,000,000,000 was wages and salaries. Individual proprietors, such as small-business men, professional people, landlords, and farmers, gathered in $45,000,000,000. Corporate earnings retained totaled $25,000,000,000. Dividends were $9,000,000,000 and interest $5,000,000,000.

These figures speak volumes. They prove that business alone, even if it were to sacrifice every penny of profit, could not begin to support rearmament. Military spending in the coming 2 years is apt to be around $70,000,000,000 a year. The most business could contribute to this is $34,000,000,000. And, in that unhappy event, what would become of the unprecedented program of industrial expansion mapped out for 1951, most of which will be financed by retained earnings?

More than this, the figures reveal unmistakably that the heaviest part of the load will have to fall on wage earners, salary holders, and individual proprietors. Together, these groups receive more than three-fourths of the annual national income. Inevitably, they face the necessity of bigger income and excise taxes, and stiffer credit controls, if the United States is to pay as it goes.

Support for this thesis has come from the Council of Economic Advisers which in its fifth annual report to the President, noted: "The total amount of wages available for spending cannot, in real terms, rise in accordance with cost of living and annual improvement formulas. It certainly is not too much to ask that wage earners in general forego efforts to increase their living standards at a time when the economy simply cannot produce more civilian goods and also carry the heavy burden of rapid rearmament."

The curbing of farm prices is one thing which the wage earner regards as necessary if he himself is to make comparative sacrifices, and this should be done by Congress immediately. The wage earner regards the cost of food as the unerring barometer of his well-being. He will not supinely watch it rise—still less will be inclined to sacrifice—when his grocery bills are racing skyward.

If the economy of this country is to stand up under the cost of rearmament, every American—and there can be no exception—must make sacrifices of money and luxuries.

[From the Long Beach (Calif.) Press-Telegram of February 28, 1951]

EACH STAGE OF INFLATION CYCLE CREATES PRESSURE FOR CONTROLS

Necessity for widespread military preparedness to protect this Nation and for assisting the peoples of other countries to build their own defences against the threat of a Communist Russian dominated world is hardly open to question.

But unless these objectives can be accomplished in a way that preserves the financial integrity of this country and basic incentives of its free enterprise system, the United States will as surely have lost its American heritage as if it had been taken from us by military defeat.

Some indication of the extent of inflationary developments in recent years is provided by the fact that today the dollar will buy only 59 percent as much as it would in 1939. The burden of this depreciation in the dollar is unevenly distributed.

Obviously, those whose incomes have remained more or less stationary in dollar terms have suffered severely from the inflation of prices.

Inflation penalizes the traditional American practice of individual savings which have provided the capital to finance development of the Nation's resources. Billions upon billions of dollars in savings have had their purchasing power whittled away by inflation in recent years. Since 1938 the sum of the annual savings laid aside from year to year by the American people in form of private insurance, United States savings bonds, savings and time deposits, and other forms of liquid savings is approximately $180,000,000,000.

However, if each year's savings were discounted to allow for the depreciation that has occurred since they were set aside, total loss in their purchasing power would amount to roughly $44,000,000,000. Similarly, since 1938, the investors in the United States savings bonds alone have suffered an erosion in purchasing power of $13,000,000,000 out of $49,000,000,000 of principal and accrued interest they accumulated in this medium of savings.

From time to time the Government has justified its policies of holding interest rates at artificially low levels because of the importance it attributes to keeping the cost of interest on its tremendous debt at a low level. It has, of course, been frequently pointed out that it is only by inflationary credit policies that low interest rates have been maintained. In this connection, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that what the Government has saved on interest it has lost many times over, due to inflation.

The Government is paying a terrific toll in higher cost of its functions. For example, during the years 1947 through 1950, the Federal Government will have spent a total of $161,000,000,000 in cash payments. Of this sum roughly $92,000,000,000 will have been spent for purchase of goods and services in which the element of price inflation can be identified clearly. If it had been possible for the Government to buy the goods and services represented by these $92,000,000,000 of expenditures at the average prices prevailing in 1946 instead of those prevailing in the years of actual disbursement, the Government would have saved approximately $16,500,000,000.

The relationship between inflation and socialism is closer than is generally appreciated. At every step in the inflationary process new distortions arise and new pressures are created for Government to "step in" with a new set of controls designed to rectify the difficulties, real or imagined, in which one group or another of the economic body finds itself.

Thus the risk of inflation may be used for an excuse for assumption by the Government of responsibilities beyond its capacity to discharge, except by diffusing and obscuring the real causes through further inflation.

Kentucky Baptists Oppose Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letter from Mr. W. O. Carver of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary of Louisville, Ky.:

THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY,
Louisville, Ky., April 7, 1951.

The Honorable DEWEY SHORT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SHORT: I am writing especially to express appreciation of your leadership in the effort to prevent the use of the present emergency in the conflict between the United States and Russia as leaders of the opposing forces in the tragic division of human life today, to bring about the further solidifying of the movement toward military domination of our country. The emergency is being used, as you well know, to try to fasten on us permanent universal military training for our youth. Current developments make it entirely clear that no such universal conscription is necessary even for the emergency, to say nothing of establishing UMT as a permanent policy in American life. We are in imminent danger of having the entire Nation put in subjection to a military hierarchy, to employ a very apt phrase found in an editorial of the Courier Journal recently.

I am in position to appraise with a good deal of accuracy the feeling in my own section. I can say quite positively that relatively few of our people realize that the bill now under consideration does involve setting up a permanent policy and not merely meeting an emergency which we hope may be resolved within a few years.

No matter what the promoters of this program may think about it, its success would inevitably move definitely toward totalitarian control; toward the militarizing of the thinking of our people; and toward the destruction of that individual freedom which is the basic principle and factor in the American ideal.

You are rendering a great service to our ideals, our history, and our future in the leadership which you are now providing. May the efforts which you and others are making be rewarded with success.

Sincerely yours,

W. O. CARVER.

Let Us Not Kill Incentive—27½ Percent Depletion Allowance Should Not Be Reduced

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, there is under consideration now a reduction in the 27½ percent yearly depletion rate allowed for income from oil-producing properties as provided under the present Internal Revenue Code.

This reduction would seriously curb the oil industry and discourage experimental drilling for the purpose of developing new sources of oil at a time when we need to increase our supply of oil for the defense program. The maintenance of the oil resources of this Nation is vital to our national security, and we should recognize this fact when considering any proposed reduction in the present depletion allowance for the oil industry.

The provision for depletion allowance was originally provided by act of Congress some 25 years ago in recognition of the fact that, to assure an adequate supply of oil for this Nation, for each barrel of oil produced another must be found, and drilling for oil is a hazardous business undertaking which involves financial risk.

At the present time the oil industry accounts for 3 percent of the national income, but produces 7 percent of all taxes, which indicates that the oil industry is already paying more than its portion to taxes.

From the facts there can be no sound reason for decreasing the depletion allowance for the oil industry at this time. We need all the oil we can produce in view of the critical world situation, and we must encourage the development of our oil resources to the maximum.

The California State Legislature recently passed the following resolution urging the Congress to refrain from any action which would reduce the present depletion allowance on oil-producing properties, and I fully agree with this resolution:

Assembly Joint Resolution 22

Assembly joint resolution relative to continuing the 27½ percentage depletion rate for oil-producing properties in the Internal Revenue Code

Whereas committees of the Congress are considering a reduction of the 27½ percentage yearly depletion rate allowed for income from oil-producing properties as provided by the Internal Revenue Code, section 114 (b) (3); and

Whereas any reduction would decrease incentive for oil exploration, reduce reserves at time of emergency, cause shutdown of marginal wells with a consequent irrecoverable loss of oil, and cripple the program for expanded emergency production; and

Whereas a percentage depletion is the only just method of avoiding a tax on return of capital which is expended on experimental drilling (60 percent of which proves unprofitable); and

Whereas the present income-tax laws penalize a taxpayer who produces oil from a well, in that tax advantages would result if he sold the well immediately after discovery, or held it for over 6 months, the tax on the gains being respectively limited to 30 percent and 25 percent; and

Whereas the percentage depletion of 27½ percent does not fully make up for this vice; and

Whereas the depletion over the years can never exceed the actual amount of capital expended by a taxpayer; and

Whereas the oil industry accounts for 3 percent of the national income but produces 7 percent of all taxes, and any reduction in depletion allowances would further burden an industry paying more than its portion to taxes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully memorialized to refrain from any action which would reduce the present depletion allowance on oil-producing properties; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California.

Missouri Farmers Oppose Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include a letter from Mr. H. E. Slusher, president of the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation.

This is a great organization, and though we differ at times on public issues I am happy that they have approved my position on the present draft and UMT bill.

The letter follows:

MISSOURI FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Jefferson City, Mo., April 6, 1951.

Hon. DEWEY SHORT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHORT: If the House and Senate have not definitely made final disposition of S. 1, which provides for universal military training, and H. R. 2811, I hope you will give careful consideration to the plans as outlined in H. R. 3364 (BARDEN, of North Carolina). This new bill certainly conforms more nearly to the policy of the American Farm Bureau Federation and that of our Missouri Farm Bureau Federation.

This bill provides (1) for the elimination of universal military training provision, which we feel at the present time is both unnecessary under the present draft law and would entail an enormously high cost for administration; (2) it raises the age limit to 19 years; (3) there would be only 24 months of service required; and (4) the ceiling on the number of troops would be left to the discretion of the selective-service program. Furthermore, it shows a definite date of termination to the operation of the law, which to us seems rather fundamental if we are to keep this Nation from becoming a militaristic nation.

We recognize that it is very difficult at a time like this to escape the impact of an emotional appeal which will be brought upon us as a result of the present Korean situation. I sincerely urge that you consider the question from the standpoint of what is best for the United States over a 10-, 15-, or 20-year period.

Sincerely yours,

H. E. SLUSHER,
President.

P. S.—Thanks for all the good work you have done on this question.

H. E. S.

Letter of Clayton C. Edwards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK T. BOW
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, there has been much said in the debate regarding universal military training as to the position of the rank and file of members of the American Legion. I have recently received a communication from Clayton C. Edwards, commander of the American Legion, of Tuscarawas County, Ohio, which I feel would be of interest to the membership of this House. I am therefore inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Commander Edward's letter, which reads as follows:

APRIL 1, 1951.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BOW: I was very happy to read accounts of your stand on domestic and foreign policy, and I wish to say I have talked to hundreds of people on these questions and I will say that 98 percent are agreed on the following:

No American troops to Europe, or only on a voluntary basis, believing that an American youth is entitled to have the right to say whether his life should be given in defense of Europe or in defense of America, and we do not associate Europe's defense with the safety of America in spite of the warmongers and their propaganda.

I am in favor of air and sea power aid to those of Europe who are willing to defend their own land and who wish our help.

Not in favor of the 18-year-old draft or a huge land army.

Do not favor any increase in taxes, but in favor of cutting down Government bureaus and using this money for the defense of America.

In favor of impeachment of Truman and resignation of Dean Acheson.

We think George Marshall has passed the time of usefulness to our Nation and his judgment is not being based on the best interest of the people of America.

His errors being too costly and following too closely the dictates of an unseen Government; as an example, his appointment of Anna Rosenberg, whom we do not have any faith in, regardless of the clean bill given by the Senate committee.

I am the county commander of the American Legion of Tuscarawas County, and these questions have been discussed in our meetings.

Now a big question now being discussed is Korea. Knowing the administration has no desire of establishing peace in Korea, as that would diminish the size of the emergency club being held over the American people, for the purpose of extracting huge sums of money to build up their huge political machine and further their socialistic plans. Who can the people look to for peace? It looks more and more that the people themselves will have to take that matter in their own hands and see that their will is carried out by those who are supposed to represent them. The administration so far has seen fit to ignore the people's wishes, and we feel they will continue to do so unless we stop it.

Yours truly,

CLAYTON C. EDWARDS,
Tuscarawas County Commander of the American Legion.

Those Unfilled Veterans' Hospitals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in further support of the data I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Friday, last, outlining the deplorable situation that has developed in our Veterans' Administration hospitals, due to the shortage of medical, dental, and nursing staff, I would like at this time to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Roanoke (Va.) World News of April 6, 1951, under the caption "Those unfilled veterans' hospitals."

THOSE UNFILLED VETERANS' HOSPITALS

According to Congressman CLEVELAND BAILEY, Democrat, of West Virginia, there are six Veterans' Administration hospitals completed and equipped that have no doctors and no patients. They are standing idle at vast cost to the taxpayers, with no benefit whatever to veterans.

Congressman BAILEY should know. One of these hospitals, gradually coming into use after months of idleness, is located in his home town of Clarksburg. Another is not too far away, in Beckley.

As Mr. BAILEY tells it, they had a field day in Clarksburg last December when Administrator Carl R. Gray, Jr., dedicated the Clarksburg Hospital. He had dedicated the Beckley institution the day before. Each had cost about $6,000,000. Thousands of people viewed the 200 patient beds, the 900 rooms, the latest medical instruments, and the spotless operating rooms. A month or so later there were only two things missing: They had no doctors and no patients. A month later there were two doctors at the Beckley Hospital but still no patients. The two hospitals cost about $12,000,000. Maintenance comes to about a million dollars a year.

Congressman BAILEY told the House of Representatives recently that the 140 veterans' hospitals in operation at the present time, there is a shortage of 384 members of the medical staffs—that 6 completely equipped hospitals had no medical staff and cannot be opened for the benefit of veterans. Several months after completion, the Clarksburg Hospital had about 150 employees—none of them doctors—and the Beckley Hospital, a staff of 160 with 2 doctors.

The Veterans' Administration has indicated that hospitals will not be opened for patients, even for emergency cases, until each has at least 8 full-time doctors. It would prefer not to operate until there are 12 doctors available.

William J. Barnhard, writing in Tax Outlook, says the Nation's taxpayers have never been niggardly in their treatment of veterans. Even veterans with no service-connected disability have been well cared for in veterans' hospitals. In fact, according to the record, over two-thirds of all veterans' hospital bed patients have been treated as non-service-connected cases.

It is estimated that the Government will spend more than $800,000,000 on hospital and medical care for veterans during the fiscal year beginning July 1. How much of that will go to projects similar to the empty but fully equipped hospitals at Beckley and Clarksburg has not been estimated.

Beckley was the twenty-third and Clarksburg the twenty-fourth building completed in the current program which aims at 75 new hospitals and hospital additions by 1956, with a total of 131,000 available beds, including 80,000 for non-service-connected cases. Yet Administrator Gray has admitted to a Senate committee that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to staff the number of hospital beds now authorized. In many instances the unfortunate choice of site, far from any important medical center, bars specialized assistance and expert treatment required in many cases.

Stop Gerrymandering

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 5, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following is a statement which I submitted to the House Judiciary Committee on April 2, 1951, with reference to H. R. 2648, which seeks to stop gerrymandering of congressional districts:

STATEMENT OF ABRAHAM J. MULTER, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, FOURTEENTH DISTRICT OF NEW YORK, RE H. R. 2648, TO REQUIRE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS COMPOSED OF CONTIGUOUS AND COMPACT TERRITORIES IN THE ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity to present this statement to you in support of H. R. 2648.

There can be little doubt that gerrymandering is merely a modern adaptation of the old, rotten borough system. It is not democratic and tends to destroy the democratic process. H. R. 2648, if enacted into law, will go a long way toward carrying out the intent of the founding fathers, as expressed in our Constitution. It will tend to provide fair and equal representation. There can be no justification for having one Member of the House of Representatives elected to act for 800,000 people while other Representatives, elected out of the same State, may represent districts with as few as 200,000 people.

Unless the Congress will perform its duty, as required of it by the Constitution, by the enactment of H. R. 2648, the States will continue to ignore and violate the injunction of the United States Constitution for equal representation. I urge your favorable consideration of this bill.

Let me take this opportunity to commend your chairman and members of your committee for their devotion to duty in this and other matters.

Generating Electricity by Sun Heat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the entire country was taken by surprise when President Peron of Argentina intimated that the scientists of that country had developed a process of generating electricity or atomic energy, with sun heat. It seems to me that Mr. Peron's scientists were trying to make use of a development which the scientists of this country announced many years ago—that of developing electricity with heat from the sun.

As we move forward into the electric age and note the wonderful progress that has been made since Edison invented the electric light—the incandescent lamp—70 years ago, we are prone to take more seriously the astounding suggestions of the marvelous developments that lie ahead of us. Here is one of the most astounding propositions that has ever come under my observation, that of generating an unlimited amount of electricity by the heat of the sun. If it proves a success, it will mean the production, not of billions of kilowatt-hours, but of trillions of kilowatt-hours of electric energy every year.

In a report made by Dr. Charles G. Abbot, of the Smithsonian Institution, in 1939, it was stated that one of the Southwestern States "could supply from solar radiation over 10,000,000,000,000 horsepower-hours per year of mechanical power, which compares with the power possibilities of all coal, oil, and water at present used annually for heat, light, and power combined in the United States."

I am inserting in the RECORD a letter from Dr. Abbot, of April 5 of this year, stating that the electric energy that can be produced on one square mile of the arid area in the Southwest would amount to "nearly a million horsepower per square mile." That would mean anywhere from one to three billion kilowatt-hours. If electricity can be generated from the heat of the sun and properly stored, as Dr. Abbot suggests in his letter, it will mean the real beginning of a new day in the use of electric power, the like of which we have never known, and of which most of us have never dreamed.

Remember that when Thomas A. Edison was working on the development of the electric light the leading scientists of the world were ridiculing him, as many of them no doubt are today ridiculing Dr. Abbott and those other scientists who have joined him in this program to generate electricity from the heat of the sun.

The year I came to Congress the people throughout the United States used only 37,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity. Last year, 1950, they used a little more than 329,000,000,000, or almost 10 times as much as was used 30 years ago.

Thirty years ago not even 3 percent of our farmers had electric lights in their homes. Today approximately 90 percent of the farm homes of this country are electrified.

If this program of generating electricity from sun heat and storing it for use the day round and the year round could be developed, it would bring about as great a revolution, in proportion, as did Edison's invention of the electric light—the incandescent lamp—which made possible the use of electric power for all purposes for which it is employed today.

At this point, I am inserting Dr. Abbot's letter of April 5, which I trust everyone who reads this RECORD will take the time to read. The matter referred to follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, D. C., April 5, 1951.

DEAR MR. RANKIN: As you request, I put the substance of our phone conversation into a letter.

The southwest part of the United States has a very large percentage of cloudless sky. There is a region in Nevada, California, New Mexico, and Arizona where some 150,000 square miles of contiguous desert has an annual rainfall of 3 to 5 inches, and a percentage of 70 to 90 percent of cloudless sky. Other less cloudless areas are available.

The average intensity of the energy of sun rays in the clear sky in this region is about 1.4 calories per square centimeter per minute (5.2 B. t. u. per square foot per minute) equivalent to 1.15 horsepower per square yard, or nearly a million horsepower per square mile.

The devices shown in my patents No. 2,247,830 of July 1, 1941, and 2,460,482 of February 1, 1949, respectively, are computed to be able, in connection with the most mechanically efficient steam engines, to convert 15 and 25 percent, respectively, of the solar energy intercepted by their mirrors into mechanical work. The rectangular mirror, shown in Patent No. 2,247,830, is the easier to construct, but if wholesale production was in question, cheap means of producing the circular, more efficient, mirror of Patent No. 2,460,482 would be prepared.

At efficiencies such as these, if only one-tenth of the desert area above referred to were devoted to production of power, more than 20 times as much power could be produced from solar energy as is used for all purposes, heating, lighting, transportation, and manufacturing in the United States.

Three objections rise to the mind.

Firstly. The sun is obscured at night and in cloudy weather. Continuous power availability may be had by (a) storing heat in water at high temperatures; (b) storing electricity in storage batteries; (c) by electrolyzing water, storing the hydrogen (oxygen is available in the air), and burning it as power is needed.

Secondly. Power can hardly be efficiently distributed by electricity more than 500 miles. Solar power would, of course, be produced also in other States where cloudiness is not excessive. This would cause a movement of population, if solar power was depended on for manufacturing. Similarly, the cotton manufacture, formerly almost confined to New England, has gone to the South to be near the cheaper facilities. Power stored as hydrogen could of course be distributed, and to a moderate extent also in storage batteries.

Thirdly. Large mirrors would present their surfaces to winds. This limitation would perhaps hold solar power units to not more than 50 horsepower. This would require of circular mirrors a diameter approaching 50 feet. Many units could, however, be combined.

The cost of solar power comprises a return on the investment for machines and the cost of supervision and maintenance. The solar boiler, compared to an automobile or a sewing machine, or a typewriter or a computing machine, is far more simple, and if built wholesale would be very cheap. Little expense for supervision would be required, for the apparatus moves automatically to follow the sun. Maintenance also would be relatively inexpensive. It is impossible to estimate with certainty on these things until fairly large solar boilers have been built and tested. But I believe the cost of solar power in California would be less than the cost of coal power at the mines. Of course other areas are available, though less cloudless.

As yet, no engineering-scale solar boilers have been constructed along the lines above referred to. Workable models are on exhibition in the old Smithsonian Building in Washington, D. C.

In closing, I may remark that power was approaching a bottleneck in World War II; that at present a considerable supply of oil for power is imported, and subject to interruption by submarines in war. A power source in the desert, above referred to, would be immune to ships and, covering a wide area, would be difficultly interrupted by bombing.

The solar energy is produced in the sun by atomic processes which, so far, have not been available on earth. The fission atomic-energy production is costly and dangerous. It seems a pity not to avail ourselves of the enormous quantities of atomically produced energy furnished freely by the sun, without the dangers attending terrestrial atomic sources.

Yours sincerely,

C. G. ABBOT.

Exemption of Operas and Symphonies From Admission Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement and letter:

STATEMENT FROM THE OFFICE OF HON. ALBERT P. MORANO, OF CONNECTICUT

President Truman has received a request from ALBERT P. MORANO (Republican, Connecticut), to support his bill to exempt operas and symphonies from Federal admissions taxes.

Mr. MORANO, in a letter to the President released today, pointed out that Mr. Truman's reputation as a lover of good music exceeds that of any previous President. His daughter, he said, has established herself firmly in the music world, and the First Lady, active in music circles, is well aware of the cultural need music fills.

The text of Mr. MORANO's letter follows:

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I was in the audience which shared with you and Mrs. Truman the wonderful experience of hearing Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, as rendered by the National Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall on Wednesday evening.

Fittingly, the inspiring choral symphony was dedicated to Brotherhood Week, for the message of this great work is: "All mankind shall join as brothers."

The visiting foreign ministers of 28 Western Hemisphere Republics surely shared our pride in witnessing the chorus of Negroes and other groups, joined voices in this theme. What better confirmation of the need for the continued advancement of such ideals as wrought through music.

Your reputation as a lover of good music exceeds that of any previous President. Your daughter, with her gracious personality and lovely voice, has established herself firmly in the music world. The First Lady is active in music circles, and well aware of the cultural need music fills.

Good music—the great common denominator between peoples—faces what appears to be insurmountable financial difficulties. This includes our great nonprofit symphony orchestras and opera companies, which cannot survive unless properly supported.

Therefore, I respectfully request that you support H. R. 2524, and that in your weekly meeting of legislative leaders, you urge them to enact this measure. It is a nonpartisan measure designed to assist these great musical organizations in their goal to bring the wonders of music into the hearts and homes of all, especially in these troubled times when understanding between nations and people can benefit from its common language.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT P. MORANO.

Immorality in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over station WHAM, Rochester, N. Y., on April 8, 1951:

It is not a very happy or pleasant subject which I have selected for discussion with you on this occasion but it is one which is not only timely but also which strikes at the very foundation and security of our Government. It has nothing to do with communism or Communists, with debts or high taxes, nor with war and conscription or any other of the manifold problems which confront the American people and perplex the Congress. Simply stated, it has to do with honesty and decency, morality, and character on the part of people in government or those dealing with government.

Recent exposures of several investigating committees of the Congress have brought to light a condition which is most discouraging and disheartening—political favoritism has reached a new low in our current history ranging all the way from petty bribery through the medium of mink coats and deep freezers to exorbitant and unconscionable profits to an extent which has brought the entire Government into disrepute and has shattered the public confidence in all public officials.

This condition is distressing and deplorable but it is not new in our history. In times past the people have found dishonest and corrupt public officials who have been promptly punished either through criminal prosecution or summary dismissal from their posts of duty. No such treatment of these corrupt officials now appears to be in the offing; instead, it is proposed that some commission be constituted which will establish a code of conduct for our public officials. That is the development which to my mind is far more deplorable than the fact of corruption itself. To think that we have reached the point in our national life when it is felt that a formal code of moral conduct is necessary to guide the work of our public officials is most distressing—a depth to which I doubt if our country has ever sunk so low. The tragedy of it is that the only solution to be advanced for the correction of this condition of depravity is the formulation of a set of written rules which will be framed appropriately and hung conspicuously on the wall of each officeholder from clerk to President in the naive belief that by doing this the evils will be corrected and thenceforth our officials and servants will perform honestly and honorably. Alice was never more fanciful in her Wonderland peregrinations.

Public office is a post of public trust; no set of formalized rules of conduct are needed. Printed principles of ethics do not make people ethical in their judgments or their actions; laws do not make people honest, they simply discourage dishonesty. Good men in public office need no set of rules, evil men would give no more attention to such a format than as though it did not exist.

Where, then, does the trouble lie that we find corruption rampant in government and that the mode of correction is the concoction of a set of principles which may or may not prescribe the proper attitudes of character which the lessons of the ages have taught to us? To be sure, initially the fault lies with the very persons who have provided the basis for these disclosures of impropriety as well as those in office who through some purpose known only to themselves have failed or refused to take appropriate action to treat the guilty in the fashion which they deserve. But fundamentally the fault lies with us, the American people, ourselves for allowing such persons to be in office and the fact that we have placed them in these positions is the consequence of a new concept of life which has come upon us in recent years but which is quite foreign to the American way.

This new demoralization is the product of two decades of profligacy and sophistry in government which has blinded and distorted the judgment of the people. It is the concept of a solicitous Santa Claus, of getting something for nothing, of dependence upon someone else for our intellectual as well as economic security. Our sense of moral values has become warped and debased; our self-reliance, our self-initiative, our self-respect have been undermined and weakened.

Only by a reawakening by the American people to the causes of this distressing condition and a reconsecration to the unwritten laws of morality and decency and character which have guided us in the past can this dangerous trend be curbed, decent people placed in posts of trust and commissions to devise rules of conduct be assigned to other fields of endeavor where their talents can be centered in more constructive uses.

The Honorable James M. Mead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, on February 14, 1951, the Honorable James M. Mead, Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission and a former Member of the United States Senate, appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to present certain testimony and to comment on legislation affecting the Federal Trade Commission.

In presenting him to the committee, our distinguished chairman, the Honorable ROBERT CROSSER, addressed him as follows:

Senator Mead is well known to the members of this committee, but as we know, you got your training where it is very often gotten by distinguished Government officials and others, in the House of Representatives. We want you to know that we are glad to have you here a Chairman of this Commission and will be glad to hear you.

At this point Mr. Mead proceeded to present his testimony to the committee, which was followed with utmost interest by the members.

James M. Mead has attained a most impressive career which underscores the opportunities still existing for the average American youth to reach the top through sheer character and industry. At an early age he was elected by the Buffalo railroad switchmen as president of their union. In 1910 he found his way to Washington and received an appointment on the Capitol Police Force, in which capacity he served for a year around the legislative halls where he was destined to sit one day in his own right.

After returning to his home city, Mead became successively a member of the Board of Supervisors of Erie County in 1914, he served as a member of the New York State Assembly from 1914 to 1918, was elected a Representative from Buffalo to the Sixty-eighth Congress and served through the Seventy-fifth Congress. In 1938 he was appointed to the Senate to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Copeland, and 2 years later he was reelected to the Senate for a full term. In the Senate, he served as chairman of the Senate War Investigating Committee, succeeding in this office our present President, Harry S. Truman, who headed the same committee when he was a member of the Senate. Mr. Truman had the opportunity to observe the ability, industry, and integrity of Mr. Mead. Consequently, upon the expiration of the latter's term in the Senate in 1949, President Truman named him as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. Mead's philosophy toward business is aptly expressed in his own words:

It is self-evident that the well-being of our economy cannot be divorced from the well-being of small and medium-sized corporations. * * * The nessence of the revitalization of small business requires that it be provided with more capital and better credit facilities.

The comments of the members of our committee on Mr. Mead's ability and the fine work he is doing as Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission deserve wide attention. After Mr. Mead presented his testimony, the following views and observations were made:

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, Senator Mead, the only thing I have to say is that you said you were unused to being a witness. I do not think anybody ever appeared before the committee with more aplomb and savoir-faire, and it is what we expected from you.

Commissioner MEAD. Thank you very much, Congressman. I feel a little bit uneasy on this end of the project. No matter how often I presided or participated in committee deliberations I felt like a raw amateur the first time I appeared as a representative of the Federal Trade Commission looking for money.

Mr. HARRIS. I also, Mr. Mead, want to accept the statement made by our colleague from New England. You have given us a very enlightening picture of the problems of your great Commission. There are a lot of technical questions that you must deal with. We well recognize that when we get to dealing with our economy of the country and various businesses, entanglements, and so forth, it becomes exceedingly technical, we found out the other day.

You have made some very interesting suggestions here with reference to legislation, most of which, of course, comes under the jurisdiction of this committee. I believe, however, the proposed amendments to the Clayton-Patman-Robinson Act will go to the Judiciary Committee. I assume that as full an explanation as you have given to this committee will be very helpful and beneficial will also be given to the members of the Judiciary Committee in order that their attention will be called to matters you have in mind.

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Chairman, as a freshman on this committee, I realize that I should be seen but not heard, but may I trespass at this time to join in the sentiments of my colleagues, Congressmen McGUIRE and HARRIS? I should like this committee to know that Senator Jim Mead is one of New York's favorite sons, and has the love and affection and respect of all of the people of the Empire State. Of course, today he belongs to the Nation as Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, and he is doing a swell job. The statement which he just gave this committee was informative, interesting, and constructive. To my mind his testimony clearly indicates that he has made a very intensive study of the problems confronting the Commission, and I want to commend him for his fine grasp of the subject matter which he has just called to our attention.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. WOLVERTON is recognized.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I join with my colleagues to the right who have sought to pay tribute to the ability of the witness. It has been my privilege to have been associated with him for many years in the House. The ability that he shows today in his splendid statement that he has presented to us is no different than the ability that he showed on all occasions in the House. I concur with the gentleman from New York. I would not ordinarily concur in everything that comes out of New York, but I would concur in the fact that he has mentioned a high regard in which you are held, not only in the State but far beyond the boundaries of the State. It is very gratifying for me to see appointments such as yours made to these boards, commissions, authorities, and so forth, because it brings to those boards a man, as in your case, with a background of experience that makes you realistic rather than theoretical in your approach, and you have demonstrated that this morning in the statement that you have presented to us. I am certain that I echo the feeling that is in the thought and mind and heart of every member of this committee—that we are appreciative of the way in which you have brought this matter to us and the realization upon your part of the desire of cooperation between this committee and those agencies of Government that come more or less within the legislative jurisdiction of this committee.

I think there is a great deal that can be accomplished by a better understanding and a closer relationship existing between the Congress and these agencies, and that it would result in common good.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Senator Mead, I want to concur in what the others said about complimenting you. The thing that has always impressed me about you is that when you were a Senator representing the great State of New York, very, very busy all the time, as everybody knows you always have been, you were never too busy to accord the greatest courtesy to even the most unknown Members of the House, and those that you had from time to time opportunity to meet. It impressed me very much, and I have told a good many of my friends about you in that connection.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Senator, I join in the encomiums that have been heaped upon you this morning. I appreciated your statement very much.

Mr. O'HARA. Senator Mead, I share with my colleagues of the committee the very high regard and respect for you. I have been sitting here and listening to all of these tributes which have been paid to you, and knowing your background as a baseball player, I am amazed that you have not been recommended as the commissioner of baseball. You are the only distinguished person in the United States that has not been mentioned.

Commissioner MEAD. Mr. Chairman, if I may just express my deep sense of gratitude for the—and this is uncharitable—undeserved encomiums that have been paid to me this morning, and for the patience with which you listened to me. If I may leave with the assurance that the Federal Trade Commission will respond instantly, and as effectively as we can, to your every request, and that we will try to carry out the law which you have outlined for us, and that we will try to be that arm of Congress in the matter of investigations that it was intended that we should be.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Commissioner, the rest of the committee have done such a wonderful job of appropriating all the beautiful things that could be said that there is not much left for the Chairman to say. But the Chairman assures you that I have the deepest affection for you, and that I am more pleased than I can tell you about the wonderful way you have handled the case here this morning.

An American Plan for National Security Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, on April 3 the gentleman from California [Mr. WERDEL] made what I believe to be ill-considered charges against the proponents of national security training. It was somewhat of a shock to me to find a member of the Republican Party unwittingly giving voice and official recognition to the insidious propaganda of the Communist Party.

I should like to have answered the gentleman forthwith, because I felt it important that his charges be answered without delay. It seems, however, that the members of the Armed Services Committee feel bound by precedent to dominate the argument in the Committee of the Whole to the exclusion of noncommittee members, who desire to carry on the debate as a debate rather than as a mere series of overly long prepared statements, having no immediate relation to the phases of the subject which some of the members would like to have discussed.

I have full respect for the older Members of Congress who have served in the House for a long time, but their willingness to spend all of their lives as Members of the House of Representatives, and their ability to get reelected, does by no means give them the omniscience that the seniority system tends to cause some of them to feel they possess. This is evidenced by the fact that most of these older Members have been in power in this Congress while this Nation was drifting into the precarious and confused condition which presently exists. It seems entirely possible that less fixed and inflexible viewpoints brought to the Congress by some of the newer Members might prove beneficial to the Nation, and in this I am, of course, not speaking for myself, except as one who would like the opportunity to hear what some of the newer Members think about some of the issues before the Congress.

Of course, I recognize the heavy responsibility carried by the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and I feel that under his guidance the committee has done a fine job in endeavoring to hammer out a compromise likely to be supported by a majority of the members, and this without compromising away the more essential beneficial provisions of the proposed legislation.

Now to get back to the speech by the gentleman from California, I will not repeat much of that speech, because it is available in the RECORD. I should like, however, to point out that on February 12, February 26, and March 15 of this year, I called attention of the House to the formation of phony Communist peace organizations, formed for the obvious purpose of fighting national security training through the diabolical method of causing it to become identified in the public mind with German militarism, and particularly with Heinz Guderian, Hitler's chief of staff.

From the standpoint of psychology, the association of ideas employed by the Communists is a tactic well known in psychological warfare, and make no mistake about it, the Communist campaign against national security training is psychological warfare against the people of the United States. Obviously, the Communists are not interested in the legitimate arguments against national security training advanced by many loyal Americans who are most certainly sincere, but who are, in my judgment, mistaken. On February 12, I said:

The Communists are, of course, fully cognizant of the fact that many good citizens are concerned, as we all are, over the necessity of requiring our young men to spend considerable time in the Armed Forces. They are seeking to capitalize upon this concern by using it as a pretense to contact as many citizens as possible in order to spread their propaganda calculated to destroy faith in our Government, weaken our Armed Forces, and our determination to resist the aggression plotted by the imperialists in the Kremlin. We can see the propaganda on the petitions, but we know not what lies the Communists used to obtain the signatures. We can well imagine that those who signed will be indexed and cataloged for future softening up by the Communists.

Before coming here from Los Angeles, I received first a telegram and then a mimeographed letter from this so-called peace council. The communications denounced the draft and universal military training. They claimed that these proposals emanated from a Nazi general, and were so obviously the product of the Communist Party that I immediately forwarded them to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. At the same time, I sent an investigator to the address of the so-called peace council. He found there only a locked door with a paper on the outside and the name "Southern California Peace Council" written on the paper. Apparently, this Communist brainchild was hastily conceived, and the nefarious propaganda was considered so important to the Communists that they started spewing it out before they had time to give their infant front organization even the outward appearance of legitimacy.

The Communists are against national security training only in the United States and other non-Communist countries. They are all for it in Russia and Kremlin-dominated countries, and this of course shows the sheer hypocrisy of their position.

That the Communists set out last year to attack our proposed military training plan the label "Guderian" is evidenced by the telegram which the so-called Southern California Peace Council sent on October 27, 1950, to various candiates, including myself. The telegram reads as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., October 27, 1950.
Hon. SAMUEL WILLIAM YORTY,
Los Angeles:

Current United States News and World Report details plan devised by Nazi General Heinz Guderian for universal military service plan calls for drafting all 19-year-olds regardless physical or mental condition for 2 years training in military and key civilian jobs. It would accomplish complete military control of American economic and political life. Southern California Peace Council in name of all peace groups this area requests statement of your attitude toward Guderian plan now called Universal Military Service.

CHARLES GLENN,
Executive Secretary, Southern California Peace Council.

As a follow-up to the telegram, I received a mimeographed letter. It read as follows:

Re our wire of October 27

(A bulletin of the Southern California Peace Council, 326 West Third Street, room 310, Los Angeles 13, Calif.)

THE GUDERIAN PLAN

United States News and World Report (October 27, 1950) reports on plans for universal military service already approved by military leaders for presentation to Congress. This plan threatens democracy at home and peace throughout the world.

Universal military service differs from universal military training or selective service. Without going into details of other plans, here is what UMT would do:

UMT would conscript every youth of 19, regardless of mental, physical, educational, or marital status. Period of service would be 24 months, with no exemptions from foreign service for youth mustered into military services.

UMT would train only part of the physically adequate youth for the military. Other physically adequate youth would be trained for service under the military in key defense jobs. The military, then, would enter the civilian economy picture as a dominant force.

Most youth aspiring to college would have to give it up until age 21 at least. A youth, entering school at 18, would be removed at age 19 for performance of his 24-month tour of duty. A youth of genius, enrolled at an early age in scientific or medical institute, would be removed from school at 19, regardless of his closeness to graduation. Remove from school as a junior or senior, he could resume studies only after his 24-month tour.

Disabled youth (even to the point of being legless) and physically weak youth—even mentally undeveloped youth—would be conscripted and placed in noncombat jobs with military services or industry.

It is not an accident that UMT follows in carbon-copy detail those plans followed by Adolph Hitler. Presented as a plan of the American General Staff, UMT actually finds its genesis in the work of Gen. Heinz Guderian, former Chief of Staff to Hitler. Guderian was admittedly employed by the United States military to draw up total mobilization plan, UMT.

In its issue of February 10, 1950, United States News and World Report detailed work done by Guderian, calling it "a blueprint to remove defects in a staff plan under which Germany lost two world wars * * * centralization of power in professional military hands is at heart of the Guderian plan. There would be no layers of civilian authority between military and the President as Commander in Chief."

On September 8, 1950, the same magazine reported Guderian's boast that h's plan is a Bible for American military officers and is approved by President Truman and Gen. Omar Bradley.

Universal military service is at best a pretty way of saying "the Guderian plan." Although United States News does not, in its October 27 issue, call UMT Guderian's plan, its earlier reports make such a step unnecessary.

WHAT TO DO ABOUT IT

The blueprint for total American fascism has been known to exist in Washington for some time. Many candidates, some of them incumbents, may choose to deny knowledge of UMT and Guderian's part of it. When such is the case, you can still inform your candidate of the facts behind UMT which will face Congress at its next session.

There is adequate time to so inform your candidate and to secure an expression of opinion from him. There is also time to react to his expression of opinion, time and opportunity on November 7 at the polls.

There is adequate time to protest UMT and the part of General Guderian in its formulation. Protest to your Congressman, the President and Cabinet members.

There is also adequate time to tell your friends and neighbors wherever they gather, in their homes, churches, places of employment, to tell them of UMT—the Guderian plan—to organize and mobilize their sentiments against universal military service.

The expenditures of this time and this energy is vitally necessary if we are do do our share in bringing peace to the world and defeat of UMT would be a seven-league step in that direction.

The Guderian plan, once put into action, won't stop in the United States. It is a plan for domination of the world by a United States under the iron heel of a military dictatorship. History has proved time and again that such a dictatorship is not an end in itself, but is a means towards a larger end—military conquest. The Guderian plan is proof—if such is needed—that the American military machine does not intend always to stop at some Manchurian border.

In this regard, the Southern California Peace Council urges that protests on the Guderian plan be accompanied by resolutions on the use of United States armed force in Asia.

The wanton destruction of Korea—its people and its industries—is followed now by a $2,000,000,000 armaments loan to France for the purposes of building up the French Government's "dirty war" invasion of Indochina for the purposes of supporting the corrupt night-club emperor, Bao Dai; and there are broad hints that American military might well be committed to Indochina, even as it has been committed to Korea.

As the same time, we press Western Europe into rearmament program, putting guns once again into the hands of Nazis, and forcing upon the North Atlantic nations a military combination under the leadership of General Eisenhower.

These moves portend war. These moves can be halted by action of the people in pressing for abandonment of the Guderian plan for adoption in the United Nations of the Nehru plan. This is the central hope for world peace.

THE NEHRU PLAN

The very character of the United Nations would be destroyed if current United States efforts to bypass and undermine the Security Council were successful. In the words of India's Premier Nehru, such steps, if successful, would make of the UN "an organization for war, rather than peace."

All Asia is today up in arms against the military domination policies—the "new colonialism"—of the U. S. A. In this regard and at this moment, India, with a seat in the United Nations, finds herself Asia's spokesman against settlement by saturation bombing of the problems which beset whole peoples to search for freedom.

Through Sir Benegal Rau at the UN, India's Premier Nehru has proposed that the Korean War and all other conflicts in Asia and Europe be mediated by the UN; he has proposed that such mediation can have real meaning only if the People's Republic of China be seated in the Security Council and the General Assembly of UN; he has proposed that UN mediation can have real meaning only if voice is given both North and South Koreans; he has proposed that the UN concern itself with conciliating the differences between the U. S. A. and the U. S. S. R. in approaches to the Korean problem.

None of Premier Nehru's proposals has been adopted in the UN. The peoples of all Asia are today expressing their desires for national freedom. The UN Charter guarantees the right to expression of such desires; the Nehru proposals would implement the guaranties of the UN Charter. American military might in Korea, Indochina, all Asia, undermines those guaranties.

The Southern California Peace Council urges that the Nehru proposals be made known to every peace group, in churches, in homes, in shops and offices and that support, in the form of letters and resolutions go to Sir Benegal Rau, India's UN delegate, Lake Success, N. Y.

We urge, too, that a stand on the Nehru proposals be taken by all incumbent Congressmen and Senators. We urge, in these days before elections, that all candidates be approached by delegations and in meetings, that candidates be made to take a concrete stand on peace or war by an expression of support or opposition to the Nehru plan, by an expression of support for or opposition to the Guderian plan, now known as universal military service.

In all instances, the people must know what is happening to their peace. Tell your neighbors, your coworkers, your organizations about the Guderian plan and the Nehru plan. The people can be organized for peace. Knowledge is your best organizer.

ATTENTION

Armistice Day is November 11. On this day the Southern California Peace Council will sponsor a work meeting for all individuals and organizations interested in peace. Plans for activity of all in search of peace will be presented. A concrete program for full activity will be presented Saturday, November 11, 1 to 5 p. m., Park Manor, 607 southwestern.

After receiving the telegram and letter, I investigated the peace council because it was obvious to me that it was a Communist-front organization. In 1939 and 1940 I was chairman of the California State Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities, and because of that experience I can usually discern Communist propaganda, which is in reality quite transparent to anyone who has taken the trouble to study their methods and objectives. My suspicions were borne out by the later activities of the so-called peace council which I described in my talks referred to a few moments ago. These activities included the barring of a newspaper staff writer from one of the so-called peace meetings because of the fact that he was seen taking notes. It is no coincidence that last Friday our own House Committee on Un-American Activities issued a report describing the activities of these phony Communist peace organizations.

I have no way of knowing why the gentleman from California permitted himself to be the vehicle by which propaganda spread by the Communist Party was placed in the RECORD of this House. The gentleman is a fine, loyal American and most certainly would not knowingly spread Communist propaganda. It is obvious, however, that he either agrees with the Communists and believes that our Armed Services Committee is furthering some kind of a plot to turn this country into a military dictatorship along the lines of German militarism, or else he is himself the victim of subversive propaganda. Those of us who favor national security training are certainly entitled to answer the gentleman by making it clear that we are not militarists; we do not favor dictatorship of any kind; and we are proposing an American plan for national security training, our own plan, and not a plan suggested by Guderian or any other person of similar views.

In his laborious attack upon our Army leaders, the gentleman omitted the admirals, and I suspect that much of the classified matter which the gentleman inserted in the RECORD was nothing more than a rehash of the bitter recriminations over the unification program—recriminations which in the interest of national security and unity should be allowed to remain buried. The gentleman accused the Army of circulating in the Pentagon a military analysis by Guderian, and inserted that analysis in the RECORD, but the letter of transmittal from the Historical Division of the Army says, in plain words:

The solution outlined in Manuscript No. T-113 was evolved by Guderian without guidance or suggestions from Army personnel; its distribution does not constitute endorsement of Guderian's recommendations by the Historical Division of the Department of the Army.

There were times during my own service in the Army when I was called upon to see that histories were prepared of the operations of our units, in order that any mistakes might be subject to later study. It seems to me the Army Historical Division would have been negligent indeed if it failed to study the causes of the failures and successes by both sides in World War II in order to enable us to avoid repetition of our own undiscovered errors which our adversaries might be in a position to disclose to us, or to discover errors which they themselves made about which we might have no knowledge. The analysis by Guderian would quite naturally be of interest to the military leaders of all nations, and I am sorry that the gentleman has seen fit to make it available to our enemies in spite of the fact that it evidently was classified by the Army in order to keep its contents from falling into the hands of our enemies who might desire to see it.

This whole matter of divulging the contents of classified material is serious indeed, and if the gentleman has served in the Armed Forces, he should know better than to lightly divulge the contents of classified documents. Classification of documents is a matter of consequence, and in many cases only a trained intelligence officer is in a position to know the importance of keeping a particular document classified. Breaches of security can cost many lives.

I am reminded of the shock I received when our wartime breaking of the Japanese secret code was made public. As one of those who regarded our success in breaking that code as a top-secret matter, I could not understand why we should put any possible future enemies on notice relative to weaknesses in the Japanese security system, thereby giving them the opportunity to avoid similar weaknesses in their own system. Whoever divulged to the gentleman the contents of the classified matter which he placed in the RECORD should be investigated, and I believe this is particularly important when one sees the similarity between the argument used by the gentleman and the propaganda spread by the phony Communist peace groups. We simply cannot afford a break-down of military security. The lives of too many people are involved. If the documents were cleared, as to security, which I hope was the case, the gentleman should so inform the House, and that phase of the matter will no longer cause concern to those of us who dislike and fear the effects of breaches of security.

Without going into great detail, it is obvious from a comparison of what the Comunists claim national security training to be, and what our Armed Services Committee has proposed, that there is no similarity except that any plan for national security training must, of necessity, involve an obligation on the part of every eligible person to accept training, or the plan cannot truthfully be called democratic and universal. The plan proposed in S. 1, as amended by our committee, is in line with the recommendations made by George Washington, when he was President of the United States. The Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress has made a very excellent analysis and historical summary of universal military training and the problem of military manpower—Public Affairs Bulletin No. 90, February 1951. I should like to commend it to all persons interested in what I believe to be an impartial survey of the available evidence both for and against national security training. On page 25 of the document, there appears the following:

During the 7 years under the Articles of Confederation the same situation prevailed. A primary objective of Washington himself in supporting the new Constitution was to provide adequately for the national defense. His idea was that there must at all times be a small professional army, but the primary purpose of this army was to provide a nucleus for a national militia. "Although a large standing army in time of peace," he wrote in a recently discovered treatise, Sentiments on a Peace Establishment, "hath ever been considered dangerous to the liberties of a country, yet a few troops, under certain circumstances, are not only safe, but indispensably necessary. The only probable means of preventing insult or hostility for any length of time, and from having exempted from the consequent calamities of war, is to put the national militia in such a condition as that they may appear truly respectable in the eyes of our friends and formidable to those who would otherwise become our enemies." (Washington, George. Writings of George Washington from the original manuscript sources, 1745-99. (John C. Fitzpatrick, ed.) Washington, U. S. Government Printing Office (1931-44), vol. 26, p. 374 ff.)

Washington's concept of the national militia (i. e., a militia not controlled by the several States but by the Federal Government), as expressed in this document of 1783, runs thus:

"It may be laid down, as a primary position, that every citizen who enjoys the protection of a free government owes not only a proportion of his property, but even of his personal services in the defense of it, and consequently that the citizens of America (with a few legal and official exceptions) from 18 to 50 years of age should be borne on the militia rolls, provided with uniform arms, and so far accustomed to the use of them that the total strength of the country might be called forth at short notice (and) duly organized into commands. * * * They ought to be regularly mustered and trained, and to have the arms and accoutrements inspected at certain appointed times (and) able-bodied young men, between the ages of 18 and 25 * * * drafted to form a corps in every State * * * to be employed whenever it may become necessary in the service of their country * * * but no independent or volunteer companies foreign to the establishment should be tolerated."

It now appears that Washington's professional army, established to be the nucleus of a nation (that is, a Federal) militia, was itself to be a citizen army, a special fraction of the militia.

On becoming President, Washington called upon Congress for a "uniform and effective system for the militia of the United States," pointing out the diminishing number of veterans of the Revolution who were well-instructed officers and soldiers. The only response was an authorization to call into service from time to time such part of the militia of the States, respectively, as he should judge necessary. The States were unwilling to give up their control. A year later, in 1790, Congress authorized enlistment for a regular army of 1,216 officers and men, to be formed into one regiment of infantry and one regiment of artillery. Congress rejected in that same year the bill for a national militia, the Boudinot bill, which had been the result of many years of study and collaboration on the part of Washington himself, General Knox (the first Secretary of War) and Baron von Steuben, who has been called "Washington's one-man general staff." Strictly speaking, the Boudinot bill was not rejected; it was emasculated by amendments, and finally emerged as the "Militia Act of 1792" which stood on the statute books for over a hundred years.

The Militia Act of 1792 affirmed the citizen's obligation for military service, and the Government's power to compel such service. Section I provided "that each and every free able-bodied white male citizen * * * who is or shall be of the age of 18 years shall * * * be enrolled in the militia * * *." The value of the act for national defense, however, was vitiated by the fact that the "Uniform Militia" which it established was not a Federal force, but 13 separate armies under the control of the 13 separate States. The Federal Government had to leave to the States all requirements for training, discipline, and inspection. The Federal Government could call out these troops under certain conditions, but had to take what the States offered. It was not long before the States had granted so many exemptions, had suffered so much favoritism to develop in the choice of officers for political reasons, had provided for no service of supply, and in general had administered their militia with so much laxity, that when the test of real service came, the militia was found wanting and fell into disrepute.

The essence of the plan which President Washington proposed is the one the proponents of S. 1, as amended, wish to see adopted. We want a strong Nation. We want our citizens trained to defend the Nation, but we do not want a huge, permanent, standing Army which lack of national security training might make necessary for a period of indefinite duration. Now, it is obvious that the Communists could not have made headway against national security training by calling it the President Washington plan, which it is. They were forced, for their purposes, to call it the Guderian plan, which it is not. The great wisdom of President Washington is once again demonstrated by the fact that the Eighty-second Congress is today finding it necessary to adopt the more essential features of the plan which he proposed to the First Congress.

National security training cannot be considered in an abstract way without relation to time, place, and circumstance. As an abstract proposition, very few of us would favor it, but man has not evolved sufficiently or become sufficiently civilized to compose his differences with others without resort to force. To protect those of us who believe in peaceful methods against the ruthlessness of would-be tyrants, it is necessary that we remain at all times prepared to defend ourselves, and it is for this reason only that national security training can be and is, in my opinion, justified. No hysteria impels me to this conclusion. Several of the opponents of national security training have, during the course of this debate, accused the proponents of acting in an atmosphere of hysteria. It is a strange coincidence that hysteria, too, is a word always used by the Communists to describe efforts to discover them and nullify their influence. The proponents of this legislation are proposing it in a calm, deliberate manner, not as something new, but something old which has been too long neglected. We cannot make our Nation secure by castigating our military leaders, many of whom are too disposed toward pomp and ceremony, and who most certainly suffer from some of the shortcomings ascribed to them by the opposition, but we cannot prepare our defenses or prevent war by destroying our Military Establishment, much as we dislike some of its practices. Of course, in a way, I suppose we fulminate against our generals because we hate war, and all that goes with it, and our generals symbolize the fact that, no matter how distasteful war may be, it nevertheless hovers over us like an ominous black cloud.

I had plently to say about the generals during my military service, but the fact remains that our generals have always guided our Armies to ultimate victory, and I take it we are all agreed that this is an important measure of their ability. It probably is not easy for our military men, who bear full responsibility for our protection, to watch our political antics which some continue to indulge in right up to the brink of disaster. They would like to get on with the job, and some of them might harbor an impulse to overstep their proper bounds in order to acquire power and speed and direct our decisions, but I do not believe that there is any concerted Pentagon plot to make this country a military dictatorship, and certainly if there were national security training would be a mistaken way to accomplish it. Civilians who have served in the Armed Forces, as have many of the Members of this House, and who have been subjected to military discipline, can certainly be depended upon to resist military control even more than those who have never personally experienced it. National security training will, in my judgment, cause our young men to be more attached, and not less attached, to the principles of our Constitution.

The bill is, of course, not perfect. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee has announced his intention to amend it in a manner suggested by some of the members. I, myself have an amendment already drawn, deleting the provision of the bill dealing with segregation. I regard this provision as retrogressive and unwise. The bill is, however, essentially sound and capable of being amended in such a manner as to make it acceptable to all who believe in the principle of, and necessity for, national security training.

State Bar of Texas "ROD Month" Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL J. KILDAY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, the State bar of Texas has set a precedent in my home State through its January citizenship project, designated as "ROD Month"—responsibilities, obligations, and duties of the citizen. The "ROD" idea was conceived by John Ben Shepperd, Texas, secretary of state and chairman of the Texas Bar's American Citizenship Committee. Following the announcement of the idea in a speech at a San Antonio bar convention in San Antonio last summer, the American citizenship committee, under the direction of Shepperd, began formulating plans for the State-wide project, the first of its type ever to be undertaken by the Texas Bar. My friend, fellow townsman, and distinguished lawyer, T. Kellis Dibrell, of San Antonio, served as chairman of the ROD subcommittee.

Other committee members were: Roberty Storey, Jr., Dallas; Dalton Cross, San Antonio; Levert J. Able, Houston; Homer E. Dean, Jr., Alice; C. W. Kennedy, Jr., Crockett; George Grant Roane, Rosenberg; Byron Skelton, Temple; and James C. Watson, Houston.

Slogan for the month was "Spare the 'ROD' and spoil the country," and its purpose was to encourage Texans to think more about what contributions they can make to democracy rather than what they can get from it. The program was based on the assumption that in order to perpetuate individual freedoms and to have liberty without hindrance, it is necessary to make wise use of these freedoms and liberties and to be responsible to them. The committee also advanced the idea that as efforts are increased to build up the physical defenses of this democracy it is fully as necessary to increase vigilance over the personal freedoms of its citizens.

Many civic clubs and schools over the State were invited to participate in the project. At the close of January, 1,500 ROD programs had been reported by these groups. Speakers on these occasions were members of both the junior and senior bar associations of Texas. ROD month received wide publicity through the press, radio, and television.

The committee, in order to remind Texans of their responsibilities to the rights granted them in the Constitution and Bill of Rights, prepared a bill of responsibilities which catalogs duties of allegiance, awareness, defense of rights, patriotic activity, education, propagation of democracy, free enterprise, and self-reliance. The bill is thought to be the first authoritative statement of a citizen's responsibilities ever to be drafted, and since it was written, approximately one-quarter million copies of it have been distributed. A copy appears below:

BILL OF RESPONSIBILITIES

We who advocate democracy as the best form of government for an enlightened and progressive people, enjoying as we do the blessings of liberty under the Constitution of the United States, do set forth this bill of responsibilities as a guide to all citizens for the preservation of individual freedom and democratic government.

I. It shall be the duty of every citizen to render undivided allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, to work for its betterment and perpetuation, to respect the sovereignty of the people's government, and to defend the Nation against all its enemies whomsoever.

II. It shall be the duty of every citizen to be familiar with the Constitution of the United States and to be informed as to what rights and liberties are his, and to use these rights in such manner as is consistent with his own welfare and the welfare of his fellow citizens.

III. It shall be the duty of every citizen to defend with his life the rights and liberties granted to him and to his fellow citizens by the Constitution, to obey the laws of the land and aid in their enforcement, and to oppose vigorously any persons whose intention is to transgress the law or to oppress the rights of others.

IV. It shall be the duty of every citizen to make honest, wise, and courageous use of the free and secret ballot at every election; to exercise freedom of thought, speech, and worship; to protect the freedom of the press; to safeguard the right of trial by jury and to render willing jury service when called upon; and to perform all other acts conducive to the perpetuation of the rights set forth in the Constitution.

V. It shall be the duty of every citizen to protect and sustain the unwritten liberties and rights vested in him by custom and usage and to perpetuate the ideals of the equality and dignity of the individual, upon which the Constitution is founded.

VI. It shall be the duty of every citizen to be active in the political party of his choice, and to be vigilant of the public officers, to render all possible aid to them, and to serve in public office by appointment or election when qualified and when called upon to do so. It shall be his duty to strive for the selection of public officers of ability and upright character; and when holding public office, to serve in such manner as will subordinate private or minority interests to those of the people at large.

VII. It shall be the duty of every citizen to achieve the highest practicable level of education, and to work for the advancement of education by supporting and improving the public schools and by fostering the desire for education among his fellow citizens.

VIII. It shall be the duty of every citizen to instruct his children in the principles of freedom and to spread the ideals of democratic government at home and abroad.

IX. It shall be the duty of every citizen to defend the right to buy and sell, to own land and other property, to engage in commerce, and to work and earn a living wage, as a fundamental guaranty of the freedom and welfare of the Nation.

X. It shall be the duty of every citizen to preserve an attitude of self-reliance, and to use all legitimate means to achieve financial independence and security; to practice thrift and economy in his own affairs and to require the same of local, State, and Federal Government.

In order that citizens of Texas might take stock of their citizenship activities during the past year, the committee prepared a citizenship questionnaire called Were You a Full-Time Citizen in 1950? It was reprinted in many newspapers and one-quarter million copies of it have been distributed. The questionnaire is reprinted below:

WERE YOU A FULL-TIME CITIZEN IN 1950?

(Prepared by the American Citizenship Committee of the State bar of Texas)

Test yourself and find out if you were a full-time citizen in 1950. Consider only the questions which are applicable to you. The highest possible score is 130. You may type your citizenship according to the following scores: 110–130, superior; 95–109, good; 70–94, average; 50–69, fair, and below 49, poor.

1. Did you pay your poll tax in 1950? (Five points.)

2. Did you vote—

(a) In the July primary? (Five points.)
(b) In the August primary? (Five points.)
(c) In the general election? (Ten points.)
(d) In your city election? (Five points.)
(e) In your school election? (Five points.)

3. Did you make a conscientious effort to find out something about all the candidates on the ballot each time you voted? (Ten points.)

4. Did you attend—

(a) The precinct or county convention of the party of your choice? (Five points.)
(b) A meeting of your city council during the year? (Two points.)
(c) A meeting of your school board during the year? (Three points.)
(d) A meeting of your commissioners' court? (Two points.)

5. Did you do any work in your party in 1950? (Five points.)

6. Did you serve on a jury in 1950? (Five points.)

7. Do you know—

(a) Who the two United States Senators from Texas are? (One point each.)
(b) Who your United States Congressman is? (Two points.)
(c) Who your State representative and senator are? (One point each.)
(d) Who the State Governor is? (One point.)
(e) Who the speaker of the State house is? (One point.)
(f) How your United States Congressman voted on any major bill during the last session of Congress? (Five points.)
(g) How your State representative or senator voted on any major bill during the last session of the legislature? (Five points.)

8. Did you write to your Federal or State representative or senator on any issue during 1950? (Ten points.)

9. Are you active in a civic group such as the chamber of commerce, Rotary Club, Lions Club, Jaycees, American Legion, VFW, study or business club, PTA, League of Women Voters? (Five points for each with a maximum of 10 points.)

10. Do you keep well informed on current public issues? (Five points.)

11. Can you list the Bill of Rights? (One point for each.)

12. Did you attend church regularly in 1950? (Five points.)

13. Did you contribute regularly to the support of any church in 1950? (Three points.)

14. Did you contribute to a worthwhile charity during the year? (Two points.)

One of the first radio talks on ROD month was presented over the Texas Quality Network by Secretary of State Shepperd, with the introduction by Mr. Dibrell. The text is printed here:

TQN BROADCAST, JANUARY 5, 1951, STATE BAR ROD MONTH

Mr. DIBRELL. In our present state of national emergency, we have been asked to contribute our every physical resource to the defense of the country, we have been asked to forget such selfish interests as higher wages and shorter working hours and to pledge ourselves to the burden of higher taxes and longer hours on the job. We are asked to help preserve our democratic form of government through military preparedness which must be accomplished through financial, mental, and physical sacrifices on the part of every person. Most of us have no doubt at all about the final outcome of a total war, should the situation come to that, we are confident that right would win in the end, that the United States and her allies would defeat the communistic aggressors. But right now here at home, how are we progressing in our small, silent battle against those of our citizens who have lost their spirit of self-reliance, unselfishiness, initiative, and industry and their sense of obligation to themselves, to others, and to their freedom? The lawyers of Texas have united themselves in order to intensify the battle against those who are in arrears in discharging their citizenship responsibilities. During January, which the State bar Texas is calling "Responsibilities, obligations, and duties month"—or in short ROD month—the American Citizenship Committee of the bar is launching a campaign to get every Texan to think more about his duties to his citizenship rights than about the rights themselves. Our committee has adopted this project because we believe that the light of freedom cannot burn forever without constantly being watched and rekindled by freedom-loving people. Many ROD speeches and programs will be presented during the month for civic organizations and schools, and one of the first of these is scheduled for tonight by Secretary of State John Ben Shepperd, American Citizenship Committee chairman, who first advanced the ROD idea in a speech at a July bar convention in San Antonio. Mr. Shepperd, former national president of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, is well known for the citizenship work he has done as originator of Democracy Beats Communism Week, now known as the Gladewater plan, and as chairman of the 1950 Texas H-Y Youth and Government program, of the Americanism Committee of the Texas Department, American Legion, and of the Education for Citizenship Committee of the East Texas Chamber of Commerce. As chairman of this first ROD project to be directed by the bar, I now present my distinguished friend and fellow lawyer, John Ben Shepperd.

Mr. SHEPPERD. One hundred and sixty-four years have passed since the Constitution of the United States of America was written for a "by, of, and for the people" form of government. During this period, which is only a brief moment in the span of time, Americans have enjoyed a freedom acquired only after a small group of our ancestors undertook a perilous trip across the sea, spent many years of privation and tyranny in tiny, insecure colonies and fought a war with their mother country.

We Americans come from a sturdy stock, from a group of pioneers who were willing to risk their lives many times for the freedom of religion, speech, and action—the freedom which would give them worth and dignity as individuals. The sturdiness and strength of the first American settlers became innate characteristics in each successive generation, and the history of those generations is a series of epic tales of territorial expansion, scientific discoveries, important inventions, economic and political growth.

As we take a backward look over the past three centuries, we see in a vast panorama the growth of the United States—a growth which began in tiny settlements on the New England coast and spread at tremendous speed from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean and from the Canadian to the Mexican border.

The growth was not realized without hardships and adversities nor without wars.

The American people have fought wars for economic reasons, for expansion, and in self-defense. We have also fought wars for liberty.

Many moving stories, poignantly expressing the desire and the will to ever be free, have had their beginning when our country was in war or on the point of war. Some of the most famous have lived through the ages and are just as moving today as they were many years ago.

Everyone knows the story of how Patrick Henry roused the colonists, who were on the verge of making a peaceful settlement with England, to open rebellion against their mother country, which had grown to be tyrannical. His "Give me liberty or give me death" inspired the colonial group, inferior in numbers and means, to a victory which meant a place for them among the free nations of the world.

Our own Texas ancestors scored another victory for freedom when they fought and defeated their Mexican rulers who outnumbered them 2 to 1. But Texas independence was not won until such valiant crusaders for right and freedom as Travis, Bowie, and Crockett were killed at the Alamo, as fewer than 200 Texans fought 4,000 Mexicans led by Santa Ana.

Out of World War I comes the story of a soldier whose dying words were, "I am glad I gave my life for the freedom of the world."

We now smirk at the statement that we have fought two world wars to make the world safe for democracy—but behind that smirk is an inner feeling of sickness at the realization that neither war accomplished its purpose for long. We become even more sickened when we are reminded in the daily news that a third world war is lurking near.

It is imperative that we defend our country against communism; it is imperative that we make an all-out effort to throttle the aggression of the malicious enemies of mankind. Through our concerted efforts we can set the world right again, we can suppress communism perhaps even without an all-out war. But when then? What of our personal rights and liberties granted to us by the Constitution? Will they still be intact? We have been enjoying them for a long, long time. So long, in fact, that we now take them as a matter of course.

We have gladly accepted every right and freedom that the Constitution and Bill of Rights have offered us. How highly have we valued these things? What have we given in return for our everyday liberties?

It hasn't occurred to a great many people that with each right accorded us, we have a corresponding duty. This fact has become very real to the lawyers of Texas in their daily dealings with legal matters pertaining to rights and responsibilities, and offenses against the rights of others. With the ROD program, sponsored by the State Bar of Texas, we want to awaken the public to their citizenship responsibilities. It is with great concern that we as lawyers face the fact that an American man will engage in physical warfare to defend the country itself and to defend his right to vote, but he will not insure the internal safety of the country by spending 30 minutes finding out something about the man who is running for district attorney—and he will not spend another 15 minutes going to vote for the qualified candidate who could be of real benefit to the country.

We will fight a war, but we won't serve on the jury without being almost forced to do so.

We are willing to give our lives for our country, but we will not take time to make occasional visits to meetings of the city council or school board where vital issues affecting us and our children are decided.

We will die for democracy, but we won't take time to write to our Representatives or Senators on any controversial issue.

We are willing to serve in our country's Army, but we won't work actively on citizenship and Americanism projects sponsored by civic organizations.

Too many people believe that their liberties are secure as long as the Constitution exists. That is only partly true. If liberty is to live, the people of the United States have got to stop looking at Government as though it were the job of the other person. Does the business man wait for a friend to replenish the stock in his store? Does a doctor just sit back and wait for his patient to be cured miraculously? Does a farmer plant cotton year after year in the same field and expect the yield to remain constant? Does a professor stay away from his classes expecting his students to learn his course by themselves?

No; the business man looks after his merchandise, the doctor makes a great effort to find a cure for his patient, the farmer keeps up his crop yield by rotations, and the professor spends much time in preparing lectures which will enlighten his students.

But what of the citizen and his citizenship? Do we sit back expecting to have the liberties promised by the Bill of Rights and Constitution fulfilled with no effort whatever on the part of the individual? Yes, most of us do. We feel no responsibility at all to our rights. We do not realize that if we ever lose our liberties it will not be through defeat on the battlefield, but it will be caused by our failure to keep faith with them by fulfilling our duties as citizens.

What exactly are our duties as citizens? To answer this question the State bar's American Citizenship Committee has prepared a bill of responsibilities which is designed as a guide to good, responsible citizenship. During ROD month the bill will be distributed over the State. I would like to read it to you. (Bill of responsibilities.)

A bill of responsibilities such as this, if kept ever before us, will help us fight not only public lethargy and gradual dwindling of hard-won freedom but also against the tendency in times of crisis for rigid controls to put a permanent halter on the rights of the individual, which tendency is fatal to the democratic ideal.

Representative editorial comment on ROD month follows:

One of the most comprehensive and unusual citizenship programs yet devised is now actively underway in Texas. * * * As the fundamental basis for this ROD program the Texas American Citizenship Committee prepared a bill of responsibilities which was widely distributed through the State. A copy of this outstanding document is enclosed with this bulletin. It deserves the widest publicity throughout the United States (Citizenship Bulletin, January 1951, published by the American Citizenship Committee of the American Bar Association).

"Government for the people" is the ascendant political philosophy of 1951, with millions of Americans thinking only of the favors they can get from the Government. They are completely disinterested in the implications of government of and by them. It is the purpose of the Houston Junior Bar Association, cooperating with the State Bar's ROD program, to prevent the further spread of this attitude toward government before it destroys democracy (the Houston Chronicle, January 23, 1951).

A "citizenship score card" is being used by the American Citizenship Committee of the State Bar of Texas in its January educational programs in civic organizations and schools. The score card permits the individual to rate himself on 14 points of good citizenship. * * * Some pretty low scores might be turned in, even by recognized civic leaders and those who consider them exemplars of citizenship in their communities (the Austin American, January 8, 1951).

How many Americans were full-time citizens in 1950? Not many, if the quality of their citizenship is based on a questionnaire prepared by the American Citizenship Committee of the State Bar of Texas. * * * The citizen, who can say "yes" to all these questions is such a rarity he might be nonexistent. (Beaumont Enterprise, January 4, 1951.)

Through the ROD month program, the bar leaders hope to arouse the people to inform themselves better, and to think more seriously concerning their civic obligations than they have up to now. What public service is more needed, or could prove more useful? (San Antonio, Tex., Express, December 27, 1950.)

Most publicity material that comes into a newspaper office is not worth the paper it is mimeographed on. But, despite the high percentage of stuff that is absolutely unusable, all such material must be opened and at least scanned. You have to scan it because once in a while something worth while turns up in the mimeographed letters. Just such worth-while material came to my desk the other day from an organization that might do a lot worse, the State Bar of Texas. * * * There is only one thing I would like to suggest to the State Bar of Texas. Wouldn't it be better to make the ROD campaign not just a project for January—but a continuing campaign to last all year? I think it would. (Al Altwegg in the Arlington, Tex., Journal, January 12, 1951.)

Probably no better way for self-appraisal of citizenship could be devised than the point system of the citizenship questionnaire the ROD committee has outlined. (San Antonio, Tex., News, January 16, 1951.)

Quotes from letters on the ROD month project follow:

I returned a few days ago * * * and found on my desk the very interesting communications indicating the progress of your ROD citizenship program in Texas. Needless to say, I am very greatly impressed. (John C. Cooper, Princeton, N. J., chairman, standing committee on American Citizenship of the American Bar Association.)

The American Citizenship Committee of the State Bar of Texas, of which the Honorable John Ben Shepperd, secretary of state of Texas, is chairman, has prepared a bill of responsibilities for the guidance of our citizens. A copy of this excellent document is enclosed herewith. * * * Members of the American Bar Association have long felt that too little emphasis has been given to the responsibilities of a citizen. The State Bar of Texas, through its American citizenship committee, has performed an outstanding public service in preparing the enclosed bill of responsibilities. (Taken from a letter written by the Honorable John C. Cooper, Princeton, N. J., to Tappan Gregory, editor of the American Bar Association Journal.)

I received a copy of the bill of responsibilities today and I think it is one of the finest resolutions I have read. (Taken from a letter written by Hon. John R. Sailer, attorney at law in Elizabeth, N. J., to Vernon Law Book Co., Kansas City, Mo.)

Thanks for the ROD month material and the bill of responsibilities. You are on the right track in an excellent manner. (F. G. Swanson, Tyler, Tex., attorney.)

We had a wonderful talk on a ROD program last night. I didn't realize that we as American people could do as little as we do and still think that we are doing our best as citizens. * * * I wish to take the opportunity as secretary of the Azle Lions Club and as an individual to thank the State Bar of Texas for giving us this most unusual and inspiring speakers' material. (Jim Bob Nation, Azle.)

This program you have this month is certainly one that can do much good. I would like to see all of the other clubs in this town use it at one of their meetings; also I would like for the schools here to inject some of it into their classwork. (L. E. Ray, Aransas Pass Lions Club.)

We had a splendid address on ROD month and had distributed the citizenship questionnaire to our membership, to the superintendent of the Grand Prairie school system, the Business and Professional Women's Club and the Federated Women's Club. We have had a number of requests for the bill of responsibilities. (Joe F. Cooper, commander, American Legion, Grand Prairie.)

Thanks for sending enough copies of the bill of responsibilities for the pupils in my class. The bill is so excellent that I would like to have enough additional copies for all the students in my building. (Miss Jacqueline Pratt, teacher, Mission Public School.)

We have presented ROD programs for the Rotary, Lions, and Kiwanis Clubs and have given ROD radio programs over two local stations. * * * All professors of business law at A. and M. College have gladly agreed to speak 20 minutes in each of their classes on the ROD subject. It is significant to note that by this channel, our program will be brought to the attention of 750 heterogeneous students who will represent a composite group of the entire student body of this institution. (Arthur Stewart, Bryan attorney.)

Manpower Waste

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article by Jim G. Lucas which appeared in the Washington Daily News of April 9, 1951:

TWENTY THOUSAND NONESSENTIALS IN D. C.—SERVICEMEN ARE WASTED

(By Jim G. Lucas)

(NOTE.—You've heard a lot lately of this country's manpower problems at a time when we're trying to build up our Armed Forces. Manpower is a basic and precious commodity for the military—but it can be wasted. How much of that is going on today? Scripps-Howard Reporter Jim Lucas, a World War II veteran who spent 5 months in Korea and is nationally known as an analyst and writer on military affairs, has recently completed a careful study of the question. This is the first of a series in which he sets forth his findings.)

The Armed Forces have been pressing Congress for more fighting men, ever since the Korean War broke out.

Yet the record shows that they're wasting much of the manpower they have.

Without too much digging you can count 20,000 soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines—most of them around Washington—working in nonessential jobs. Nonessential, at least, in the sense that they're not what the men were hired to do—fight battles, man ships, and fly planes.

Between 3,000 and 4,000 work in the Pentagon. Another 1,900 hold public relations jobs, and 13,000 are on recruiting duty here and all over the country. Another 1,350 are on or subject to ceremonial details here. Approximately 800 fly special missions out of Washington for high Government officials. Another 225 are running a correspondence school. In lesser degree, it's the same at military command headquarters wherever they are located.

Some of these nonfighters in uniform like their work and are good at their respective jobs. But others are frankly embarrassed and eager to get on with the Military Establishment's main job—which is the build-up of a capable, well-trained fighting force.

ONE MORE DIVISION

Twenty thousand men would give us an extra Army division. We could use it in Korea. Or it would give us seven heavy-bomber and 12 jet-fighter groups. It would man six aircraft carriers the size of the Midway, with 2,000 men left over. That would be enough for a battleship. Naturally, it would be impossible to lump them together and assign them to the same outfit, because they come from all services. But the illustration shows what's happened.

That's only scratching the surface. These 20,000 men are the ones you can put the finger on and say "Here, Joe." It doesn't include the countless thousands clerking in post exchanges and ships stores, in laundries, officers' clubs, or in Army and Fleet post offices. For some reason, information cannot be published on the post-office roster.

No one contends that the services these men perform aren't necessary. The armed services must have post exchanges, laundries, clubs, and post offices. But a strong case can be made that these are jobs which can be filled by civilians or by men now rejected as unfit for combat duty.

It does little good to check the personnel files. Because the records conceal—rather than tell—the story.

MOS DEVICE

All services, for instance, employ a little device known as the MOS. MOS stands for Military Occupation Specialty.

Theoretically, a man's MOS is the key to his job assignment. He may have several MOS numbers revealing he's competent in several fields.

In practice, however, the system is a good cover-up. A man may be listed in the MOS files as a machine gunner but given the job of mowing a general's lawn. The only way to find out he's doing something else is to watch him doing it.

When I began research on this series I submitted a number of questions to all the services. Among them was one asking how many enlisted men were assigned to the Pentagon. After a week and a half an Army public information captain came up with the answers, warning in advance that they weren't what I wanted because I hadn't put the questions properly.

SOUNDS SILLY

"There are no enlisted men assigned to the Pentagon as such," he said, and he added, "I know that sounds silly."

He went on to explain that Army enlisted men working in the Pentagon were assigned to a number of paper units throughout the city and detailed to the Pentagon as "additional duty." As far as the records were concerned, however, they were stationed at Fort Meyer, Fort McNair, etc. A couple of enlisted men were busily typing while this discussion went on. Before we were through an enlisted messenger deposited a sheaf of papers on the captain's desk.

I'd also asked how many enlisted men were assigned as clerks, typists, cooks, messengers, waiters, etc. After each question the Army had written a big zero.

I protested that I'd eaten lunch in the general's mess and seen six enlisted men—all of combat age—waiting on tables.

"Probably true," the captain said. "But that's not their MOS. You'd have to check the file of each man personally. As far as their MOS is concerned, they're doing some other job. They're probably carried as drivers of riflemen. They're just filling in as waiters. I'll bet you can check every MOS in Washington and you won't find a single man listed as a waiter."

THE MILITARY SIDE

The services have some apparently valid explanations. One general pointed out that if we begin accepting 4-Fs, "they'll be on the taxpayer's back the rest of their lives. Every one of them will qualify for a pension. We'd lose money in the long run."

The Navy said its policy was to guarantee a man 2 years of shore duty after he'd been at sea 2 years. As long as he's ashore he might as well work at the Pentagon and save the Government that much.

The Air Force says it's trying to replace enlisted men with enlisted women, but is not altogether successful.

Grain for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the Pilgrim is a worthy designation of a weekly church bulletin, printed by the First Congregational Church of Long Beach, Calif., of which church I am a charter member. It is one of the largest churches of that denomination in the United States. The distinguished pastor is Rev. Emerson G. Hangen, formerly a chaplain of the United States Navy. Each week in the Pilgrim, on the back page thereof, is printed some pertinent or appropriate word which has more than just local significance or origin. The Pilgrim is mailed to me each week.

In view of the instant and immediate need of this Congress doing something tangible and intelligent and generous to the starving people of India, in connection with supplying of grain during this time of present famine in India, I know that you and my colleagues of this Congress will be pleased to read these two articles herewith by Dr. John C. Bennett, in the March 11 and 18, 1951, issues of the Pilgrim; and one by Dr. James K. Mathews, in the February 25, 1951, issue.

Dr. Hangen informs me that Dr. Bennett, the author of two of these articles, is one of the keenest Christian observers of our world, and one of the great theologians of our day, and is located at Union Theological Seminary, New York City. Dr. Hangen further states that "This is one of the great issues of our day—a problem with which Christian people should be familiar."

Dr. Mathews is associate secretary of the Board of Missions of the Methodist Church.

HAS INDIA AN ALTERNATIVE?

(By John C. Bennett)

PART I

What is the alternative to communism? That is the question that has haunted me ever since I left India. Everywhere I went in India that was the question that the most thoughtful people asked. Many of them saw no alternative shaping up in their own country. Any alternative must deal radically with the three great problems of most Asian lands: desperate poverty, oppressive landlordism, and political corruption. Nehru is generally admired but there is great dissillusionment about the Congress Party. I am sure that the Indian people want to have a constitutional democracy and that they abhor totalitarianism, but I found many who fear that because of failure to solve economic and social problems and because of the corruption that gnaws away at the foundations of government, communism will come whether they want it or not.

I went to India to discuss with Christians the Christian response to communism, but I had to admit that Christianity does not have a full economic program and that it is not a movement with political power which would put such a program into effect if it had one. It is the responsibility of the Christian to try to find the best program on which Christians and non-Christians can unite to solve the problems that drive people to communism as a desperate remedy. But a small Christian minority cannot, of itself, create such a program, even though it should do everything in its power to aid in its development.

Are we deceiving ourselves?

America may think that it has a program. But everything that we do presupposes such fabulous prosperity that our institutions and our advice seem irrelevant to the needs of a very poor country. Also, Americans speak so often as though they care only about freedom, but freedom alone will solve no problem. I often wonder why it is that America cannot make clear to the world that we really do care about justice and security as well as about freedom. I had to explain to Indian audiences that our actual institutions are better than our ideology and that we have had something like a social revolution in the past generation ourselves. If we were to emphasize all that we have accomplished in the interests of justice and security in recent years we would seem less irrelevant than we do when we stress only freedom; but, even so, in this country we were able to begin at such a different point from India with its vast population. We should give all the assistance possible to India—technical assistance and immediate economic help—but the task of creating an effective political alternative to communism is a task for India, and one of the greatest difficulty. I have organized my conclusions about the situation in India under the following generalizations:

First, the Communist movement at present is not very strong. In fact, I was surprised to discover much less sympathy for communism than I had expected. The Communist Party had shocked India by its use of violence during the years immediately after the war. It had to change its policy and it has been badly split. There are many ex-Communists who know what communism is and they can provide insight about communism that is very much needed in Asia.

We must remember that in India communism never did gain the leadership of the movement for independence. In fact, during the final years of the struggle when the Congress was opposed to the war the Communists were on the side of Britain as an ally of Russia. So the Communist use of the drive for national independence—so important today in Indochina, is not an important factor in India. This first generalization may seem to be a very hopeful one, but I warn the reader that it is the only one that can give him much comfort.

Communism's open door

Second, the external conditions that invite communism are present in India. I have already mentioned them—poverty, landlordism, and political corruption. They are not equally bad everywhere. I found that conditions are much more serious, for example, in Hyderabad than in Travancore. In the southeast, famine conditions are widespread. I spent some days in Madras and Tambaram, which are protected urban centers surrounded by a famine area where people are slowly starving. I shall tell about one experience that helped me understand the way in which poverty, landlordism, and political corruption constitute a single problem.

On a visit to the state of Hyderabad, I found that in the villages there is a civil war between the police and the Communists. The Communists do not control any villages fully, but they come out at night and make trouble. The villagers are often more afraid of the police than they are of the Communists. The police tend to be more indiscriminate in their violence than the Communists. I found that there are laws on the books which would rid the state of the worst features of its old feudal system (thus removing the chief condition which invites communism) but that these laws cannot be applied because the agents of government are bribed by the landlords.

Never before had I seen the full meaning of corruption. It is not merely a morally offensive accompaniment of government activity. It paralyzes government activity if the vested interests succeed in bribing the agents on which government must depend. It prevents the necessary social changes. Corruption is probably the major source of frustration because it prevents the overcoming of other sources of frustration. In every country I visited (Lebanon, Pakistan, India, Thailand, the Philippines) I heard the same story of corruption. This may be the factor which, more than any other, will drive people against their will to communism. Whatever may be said about communism, it does seem to be able to cut through this appalling corruption, at least for a time. So, while communism is not popular in India, the external factors that make for communism are there.

[From the Pilgrim of March 18, 1951]

HAS INDIA AN ALTERNATIVE?

(By John C. Bennett)

PART II

Third. I found a very general tendency to take an optimistic view of Chinese communism and of any likely development of communism in Asia. Asia has for so long been able to blame the west for its own ills that there is a natural habit of thinking that if only Asia is left to itself it will do better than the west. In discussion I always emphasized the fact that wherever communism has had power for long it has become intolerably oppressive tyranny. I explained the steps by which this tyranny developed in Eastern Europe. But usually there was a response to this effect: That was Europe; it will not be so in Asia. Even though I stressed the danger of losing national independence because of the way power is centralized in Russia, there was not a very vivid awareness of such a threat. Let me repeat that there was not much pro-communism or pro-Russian sentiment. Also, there was a definite rejection of the Indian communism party. But there was this vaguely favorable attitude toward communism in China.

Fatalism widespread

Fourth. What distressed me most was a very widespread fatalism about communism among people who were opposed to it. This fatalism may be related in part to a fatalistic tendency in the religions of India, but it has its chief source in the fact that the problems of the country are so desperate. If there were any alternative to communism on the horizon this fatalism would probably disappear, but I found no one who has great confidence in any such alternative. Communism may not solve any problem in the long run but it does appear to have a solution. It is a movement that has a definite program related to the special grievances of people and a definite political strategy for putting the program into effect. It has the momentum that comes from successes in other lands, especially in China. It is now almost impossible for Americans to understand how people anywhere can think of communism as a solution. For us it constitutes the greatest problem.

I always emphasized, while in India, the illusions in communism and especially the sad way in which what appears to be good turns out in practice to be the entering wedge for overwhelming evil. But this kind of argument is much more convincing to people in the west who have much to lose in terms of economic opportunity and cultural and spiritual freedom. How much do the 90 percent who are illiterate and who eke out a bare existence have to lose? Talk of loss of freedom means very little to people who cannot read and who never travel far from their village or who, as refugees, have no permanent home. I can foresee a situation in which communism will make a whole nation literate in order to indoctrinate it with its false slogans of hatred. But it is hard to make any such spiritual danger vivid in advance.

This was the most difficult question that I had to face: Is it not possible that the oppressive aspects of communism may be only a phase that will pass and that in a generation or so the majority of people in a country that has a feudal background may be better off as a result of a Communist revolution?

Will Communist tyranny pass?

It is easy to answer that question in New York, but I wish that more Americans had to answer it in Calcutta. I could point out both the uncertainty that any such permanent good might come and its cost even if it should come. The uncertainty would be admitted but about the cost I would be pressed with the question: Cost to whom? To the 90 percent or to the 10 percent? When driven back to this point I would often say that, granted the possibility assumed in the question, it is still premature to decide that India cannot find its own way to a constructive social revolution without having to rely upon the leadership of Moscow—an independent Indian social revolution that would prepare the people for opportunities that communism itself would deny them. But that leads us back to the original question of this article: What is the alternative to communism?

The difference between the west and the east is that we in the west have so much to lose that communism itself is our great problem. In the east the strength of communism is the symptom of more urgent problems. It is this different way of feeling about the issue that causes the people of India to be so indifferent to America's effort to save Asia from communism in Korea. I personally believe that effort, supported as it is by the United Nations, is right. Also I believe that we must make military preparations on an adequate scale to ward off a possible Russian attack upon some other part of the non-Communist world.

Causes and effect

But all this military activity is a way of gaining time to do more constructive things to counteract communism in the world. We are becoming so obsessed by this military approach that we may forget these other tasks. As we think of Asia cannot we give less attention to deliverance from communism and more attention to deliverance from the poverty, landlordism, and corruption which are the causes of Asian communism? This is far removed from the present American mood. It is harder and more baffling than to make ourselves militarily strong. But if we do not place our emphasis here, communism will advance in Asia no matter how great our military strength.

At this moment when feeling runs high in America against all in other countries who do not see the Communist issue exactly as it is seen here, I plead for better understanding of the Indian position. I have tried to explain some of its backgrounds in this article. I agree with the criticism that Indian statesmen have some illusions about Chinese communism, but I doubt if these illusions are worse than the prevalent American illusion that the Communist problem is primarily a military problem. To return to America today is to discover here a strange intransigence, a great narrowing of spirit, a growing inability to understand points of view other than our own. There could be no better corrective than for American Christians to go out of their way to see this greatest struggle of our time as it is seen in India.

STORED FOOD IS AMERICA'S ARSENAL OF PEACE

(By James K. Mathews)

These are days when we are preoccupied by wars and rumors of wars. But Christians must also be occupied with the ways of peace. During World War II the United States was known as the arsenal of democracy. We have today an arsenal of peace. Will we learn to use it?

America's arsenal of peace is her great store of food. Under the price-support program, the American people, through their Government, possess food stores reported to be worth as much as $4,000,000,000.

Presumably our political and military leaders are aware that this is a great potential weapon for peace. Recent grants of aid in the form of food to Yugoslavia and Italy would seem to indicate as much. Leaders of hungry nations know we possess this weapon. So doubtless does Joseph Stalin. But are we American Christians sufficiently aware of it? Will we insist that our Government utilize this food as a nonmilitary measure of meeting our present situation? Rightly used, it can do much to preserve peace and at the same time combat the Communist menace.

A major opportunity for us to use our arsenal of peace now confronts us. The Government of India has recently approached the United States Government for a grant of 2,000,000 tons of food grains, particularly wheat. This food is desperately needed, but India, a dollar-scarce land, can ill afford to pay. It should be made available as an outright gift, or at concession rates on extended credit. The right response promptly made by Americans may help to preserve peace and to assure the continued friendship of democratic India.

India's need for food is not well understood in this country. She has now undergone nearly 10 years of shortage, although she has been fighting a fierce, and until recently a winning battle on the food front. Prior to 1942 India imported a large part of Burma's rice surplus. The Japanese invasion cut off that source, which, due to continued disturbed conditions within Burma, has not been restored. The situation became so acute that in 1943 between 3,000,000 and 5,000,000 Indians in Bengal died of starvation. American GI's saw thousands die on the streets of Calcutta.

To meet these unpleasant situations, India has taken extreme and heroic measures. She has strict rationing and a careful procurement of food by government. Her rationing system has been called the most efficient in the world. Furthermore, India has embarked on extensive land-reclamation schemes. These involve clearing lands and draining swamps. The Saturday Evening Post, December 17, 1950, tells of the most extensive project in central India, the reclaiming of 3,000,000 acres of fertile land, up to the present rendered useless by a pernicious type of deep-rooted grass.

From natural causes India has been visited with additional leanness in recent months. In parts of the south, drought is now in its third year. In some other areas—Bihar, Crissa, East Punjab, and some of northern India—there have occurred severe floods. In other areas locusts have damaged crops. Assam was visited in August with the most severe earthquake yet recorded. All these natural disasters caused a loss of 6,000,000 tons of food from the country's already slender supplies.

It is this deficiency that must somehow be made up. India proposes to do this by purchasing 4,000,000 tons from Canada, Australia, Argentina, and the United States of America. The remaining 2,000,000 tons is the quantity India is requesting from the United States on the most favorable terms.

It is the opinion of many Christians, including this writer, that the United States should make available this food, preferably as a gift. Here are some of the reasons:

1. Because of India's acute need and valiant endeavor to meet it by her own resources. In her present circumstance of desperation and our situation of abundance, the problem becomes, under God, a moral one for us. Our store of food grains under Government control is variously estimated at from 7,000,000 to 11,000,000 tons. It is said that it is costing us over $70,000,000 yearly simply to store this grain. Remember, India is not asking for aid as a gift; she does not wish to assume the beggar's role. We should see the need and be inspired to give.

2. Because India is a bulwark of democracy. Her constitution and tradition are democratic; her leaders are democratic.

3. Because such an act may do more to combat communism than many armed divisions. Our use now of our "Arsenal of Peace" may win the abiding friendship of India's people.

To make grain available to India will require Congressional action. Christians can register their sentiment on this question in Washington. Thousands in many parts of the country have already done so. Church people can write President Truman, Senators, and Congressmen. Christian bodies, such as the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, the Methodist Board of Missions, the American Board, the Golden Rule Foundation, and other such groups have gone on record by resolutions, favoring such action. But individuals must act, and promptly. It is a matter of life or death for many people in India. May it not be a matter of life or death for us?

The Confusion of UMT

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of Monday, April 9, 1951:

THE CONFUSION OF UMT

The House has gone to work on Mr. Truman's program to convert America into a military state and has started auspiciously by compelling the Administration to abandon its demand for immediate passage of a universal military training bill. In theory, the measure has been shelved for study during the coming 6 months. More probably, it has been killed.

At best, UMT would have been a confusing and contradictory project while the country was engaged in peacetime conscription and the creation of large standing forces. There is no connection between these two designs for the procurement of military man power, yet the Administration tried to serve them up in a single package. Universal training would have competed with conscription, so that, if there is a requirement to prepare men for action quickly, UMT would have hindered the attainment of that end.

At worst, UMT would have saddled on the country a permanent state of militarization, in which the high command would have been vested with a claim over every young man as he came to military age. This system has long been in effect in Europe. It accounts for much of the great European emigration to the United States. Its military effectiveness may be disputed on the ground that the nations which practiced it were the losers in every great war.

The sentiment of the House on this issue was so manifest that the Truman leadership abandoned the project without a fight. The victory was the more striking in that the Senate, on March 9, had refused, by a vote of 68 to 20, to strike UMT from the military manpower legislation approved on that day. The Senators passed both UMT and a 24-month draft, beginning at the age of 18.

THE PUBLIC KILLED IT

It is clear that the House, on this issue, is close to the sentiments of the people—much closer than the Senators, who either have not been reading their mail or who, having read it, were too timorous to buck the administration. The recent Easter recess gave House Members an opportunity to get home and find out what their constituents were thinking. They returned to Washington with a knowledge of the people's convictions, and the shelving of UMT resulted directly.

With this proof of its understanding and temper, the House may now be expected to deal firmly with Truman's thesis that he possesses inherent powers to dispatch troops to the proposed European army under General Eisenhower without let or hindrance by Congress. The Senate met this challenge by passing an advisory resolution that he be permitted to send up to four divisions, after which he would be expected to obtain congressional approval for further levies. The Senators also proposed that the House act with them in the form of a concurrent resolution.

What the people expect of the House, and what we confidently believe the House will do, is to speak with none of the Senate's equivocation on this subject. Congressmen have urged that the House address itself to the problem through a joint resolution, having the force of law, which would put it up to the Senate if the two Houses were to agree. It has been further proposed in the House that Mr. Truman be required to obtain the permission of Congress before he sends any troops at all, and that this provision be written into the pending conscription bill.

We believe that this is the way to deal with the matter. Truman and his military cronies have tried to steal the ball and run with it, and they should be brought down by a hard tackle. The President is even now proposing to start two divisions to Europe without awaiting House action. He should not be allowed to get away with it. He is subject to the authority of Congress—which means the whole Congress, not merely the Senate half of it. The House can warn him that if he persists in endeavoring to usurp powers not fully allotted him, it can, through its control of appropriations, stop him in his tracks.

THE OLD SCARE TECHNIQUE

The administration has sought to bring pressure upon House Members by voicing veiled hints of impending calamities. Speaker RAYBURN descended from the rostrum to hint that Russian troops were massed beyond the Manchurian border in China, ready to intervene in Korea or strike elsewhere. The Speaker referred to "a terrible danger and maybe the beginning of world war III." Truman confined himself to the delphic utterance that RAYBURN is a "truthful man."

Congressmen have freely asserted that this looks like the same old scare technique employed by the administration countless times to jam pet legislation through a reluctant Congress. How can Congress or the people know the truth? The administration has lied to them so many times that they are no longer trusted. If RAYBURN and Truman hoped to profit by crying, "Wolf!" the strategy misfired. The refusal of the House to submit on UMT showed a skepticism which should be carried over to the related issues of conscription and troops for Europe.

One Hundred and Thirtieth Anniversary of Greece's Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, there are appended hereto news reports from the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune of today on the parade marking the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of the independence of Greece.

This is an outstanding event for it commemorates a new achievement of Greek independence, the triumph at long last over the Communist invaders and subversives who were responsible for the devastating civil war just brought to a close during this one hundred and thirtieth year of Greece's independence. In World War II Greece fought magnificently against the legions of Mussolini and Hitler and made a glorious record among all the free peoples. In their successful struggle against the Communist horde in the recent civil war Greece showed her enduring belief in freedom by refusing to be dismayed by disconcerting Communist tactics and by the aid to the Communists of powerful neighboring states, and went on to ultimate triumph. The American people recognize in Greece a powerful ally and a fighting friend in the vitally strategic Mediterranean area situated at the crossroads between Europe and the Near and Middle East.

The friendship and cooperation between the people of the United States and the people of Greece has been earned in common trial and suffering. It will be enduring through the years. The fine Americans who marched in the parade and the tens of thousands of other Americans of Greek extraction will keep alive in our country a knowledge of Greek history, culture, and tradition which will additionally fortify this friendship.

FIFTH AVENUE PARADE HAILS FREE GREECE—125,000 WATCH 15,000 MARCH IN PAGEANT DEPICTING GLORY OF PAST, HONOR OF TODAY

Hellenic-American societies celebrated the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of Greek independence yesterday with a Fifth Avenue parade that portrayed the colorful story of Greece's history.

Mayor Impelliteri was honorary grand marshal, leading the marchers up the avenue from Sixty-second Street to the reviewing stand at Sixty-eighth Street, where he was joined by Greek dignitaries, other city officials, and representatives of the United Nations.

There were 15,000 persons in the parade, and, according to the police, 125,000 spectators lined Fifth Avenue sidewalks all the way to Seventy-fourth Street, where the marchers turned east to the Greek Cathedral to receive the blessing of Archbishop Michael, of North and South America.

A THREEFOLD OBJECTIVE

The parade had a threefold purpose. It was an expression of gratitude to the people of the United States for their aid to Greece; it protested the abduction of 28,000 Greek children who are being detained behind the iron curtain, and it called for the reunion of the island of Cyprus with Greece.

One of the placards depicted Cyprus held by British chains and asserted that "Cyprus prefers her poor mother to her rich stepmother."

As the parade drew to a close Mayor Impelliteri, in a brief address, praised the pageant, declaring that the placards represent what a free people want for the democratic people of Greece.

In the parade were golden chariots of ancient days, likenesses of Alexander the Great and Homer, elaborate floats with Grecian goddesses and scores of other visual reminders of the glory that was Greece.

Leading the marchers was 9-year-old Anastasia Vagionis, wearing a Royal Guard evzone with great poise, for this was her fifth casting in the role. She is the daughter of Nicholas Vagionis, general chairman of the event. Behind her marched mounted policemen. Thirty-one bands provided music.

COSTUMES OF MANY VOGUES

Costumes worn by the members of the various Hellenic societies represented virtually every vogue from every province since the days of ancient Greece. There were old warriors with spears, and a relatively modern military man on a gray horse representing Gen. Theodore Kolocotronis, who was credited with Greece's victory over Turkey in 1921. And there was a group of Greek sailors who came from Boston where they are preparing to take two destroyers, gifts of the United States, to Greece on April 13.

The real show stopper was 20-month-old Katherine Siegrist, of 515 West Eighty-fourth Street. She held up the parade in front of the reviewing stand when she burst into tears as photographers swarmed around her. Mayor Impelliteri called for her and her tears ceased, but there was a new outburst when the photographers again approached her. Finally, after posing with the mayor, she rejoined the parade.

Earlier, Mr. Vagionis had sent a telegram to President Truman expressing gratitude for American aid to Greece and remarking that the march would signify "our admiration for the United Nations forces in Korea who are now fighting communism and for the Greek battalions, which in recent days were so highly lauded by General MacArthur and you, Mr. President, for their heroic gallantry."

PARADE MARKS ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH YEAR OF GREEK LIBERTY—15,000 MARCH UP FIFTH AVENUE—AMERICAN INDIANS AND THREE BAGPIPE BANDS IN LINE

New Yorkers of Greek ancestry marched in a Fifth Avenue parade yesterday afternoon to commemorate the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of Greece's independence. The 15,000 paraders included many women dressed in costumes native to various Greek provinces and bearing jugs and fruit, but also incongruously, three bagpipe bands and a contingent of American Indians.

The spectators, who were estimated by police at 125,000, crowded along the line of march from Sixty-second to Seventy-fourth Streets. They appeared not to notice the violations of the parade theme, and clapped heartily for the Indians and bagpipers, as well as for stately floats decorated with cheerful bunting, and municipal, school, and military bands.

MAYOR MARCHES SIX BLOCKS

Anastasia Vagionis, 9, daughter of Nicholas Vagionis, president of the Federation of Hellenic American Societies, the sponsoring organization, led the parade, which started from Sixty-second Street at 2:30 p. m. Mayor Vincent R. Impelliteri marched six blocks and climbed aboard the reviewing stand at Sixty-eighth Street, where he was joined by Athanasios Politis, Greek Ambassador to the United States; Alexis Kyrou, permanent Greek delegate to the United Nations, and Anthony Poumpouris, Greek Consul General in New York.

One of the parade high lights was a rider on a snow-white horse symbolizing Gen. Theodore Kolocotronis, who led the Greek Army to victory over the Turks in 1821. The actual date of Greek Independence Day is March 25, but since the Greek parade would have coincided with the Easter parade this year, it was postponed to yesterday.

Several floats in the parade were devoted to themes demanding that Great Britain relinquish jurisdiction over Cyprus and return the island to Greek control. Banners and placards stated that 97 percent of Cypriote residents had favored Greek annexation in a recent plebiscite.

SECOND REVIEW AT GREEK CATHEDRAL

The paraders turned right at Seventy-fourth Street and continued to a second reviewing stand in front of the Greek Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, 319 East Seventy-fourth Street. A 23-man contingent of the Greek Navy formed the honor guard across the street, facing the reviewing officials.

These officials included Archbishop Michael, of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America, and the Rev. Basil F. Fithimiou, dean of the cathedral.

The parade was followed by a doxology in thanksgiving for the liberation of Greece. Archbishop Michael led the service in Greek within the cathedral.

Packaged Thinking

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN T. WOOD
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I was surprised and chagrined to receive the following letter from the fine patriotic women of Caldwell, Idaho, and at a loss to understand their reasons for writing such a letter until I read the editorial titled "Packaged Thinking" in the Washington Times-Herald of Sunday, April 8, 1951, which is hereto appended.

Despite the fact that the United Nations has proven to be an instigator rather than a preventer of wars, has supplied a sounding board for our enemies to besmear and slander us, and has become a roosting place for spies, traitors, and fugitives from the New Deal, many honest sincere people still give support to this iniquity because they have been propagandized into believing that the United Nations is the world's last hope for peace.

I trust that after reading this editorial, the good women of Caldwell, Idaho, will recognize the United Nations for what it is—an ineffective debating society to lull us into a false security while our enemies without and traitors within replace our American system of Government with a militaristic, fascistic, totalitarian power state.

LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF CALDWELL,
Caldwell, Idaho, March 29, 1951.

Hon. JOHN WOOD,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WOOD: The League of Women Voters of the United States has from the founding of the United Nations wholeheartedly supported it. We of the Caldwell League, having studied the UN and watched current events affecting the UN during our 3 years of organization, join in that support.

We believe that even if there were no atomic bomb the steady march of scientific progress makes isolation impossible. We believe that membership in a world organization dedicated to the elimination of the causes of war and implemented to settle disputes offers the only possible hope for achieving ultimate peace. By supporting the UN and such regional arrangements as the Atlantic Pact, provided for under the UN Charter, we Americans can safeguard our own interests.

There are naturally military risks involved, but no course open to our country is without those risks. As wives and mothers we are all too aware of the possible suffering and heartaches that lie ahead for all of us, but we know that by acting wisely now our leaders may not only reduce future suffering, but eliminate future crises. The present Korean war has brought suffering to many Americans, but its shadow is small compared to that of a total war.

We urge you to work toward the building of a stronger United Nations. We hope you will vote for legislation that will not only strengthen the UN and develop its several agencies, but that you will support sufficient appropriations to enable us to meet our commitments under the UN and the Atlantic Pact and thus make them more than moral instruments for peace.

Sincerely yours,
Mrs. ELDEN DARLING,
President.
Mrs. JOHN V. WALKER,
Action Chairman.

PACKAGED THINKING

There has just started up in this city of 1,001 nights and a night of intrigue and even more by day, still yet another operation designed to press life, light, and independent intellect out of the American citizen.

This latest one calls itself "The Women's Clearing House for National Security." Mrs. Hiram Cole Houghton, chairman. Member organizations are:

American Association of University Women, American Legion Auxiliary, American Women's Voluntary Services, Association of Women of the American Farm Bureau, Soroptimist, General Federation of Women's Clubs, National Association of Negro Professional and Business Women, Association of Women Lawyers, Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Pilot International, Veterans of Foreign Wars Auxiliary, Zonta. It is instantly obvious that here are collected under a single dispensation, some of the finest and most useful women's organizations in the United States, superb in accomplishment and purpose.

But if it is one thing for the Women Lawyers to have their own special group, the Soroptimists to have their affairs, the American Legion Auxiliary to have theirs; it is quite another thing entirely for all of them to be tied together as above indicated.

The reason why, for the benefit of those ladies who may sense something wrong, but have not had time to dig into the details, is that such set-ups produce intellectual robots instead of citizens.

HOW IT IS DONE

Any woman who wants to see how that is done should write to the National Industrial conference board, 247 Park Avenue, New York City, and ask for a copy of an article entitled "Packaged Thinking for Women," by Lucille Crain and Anne Hamilton.

You will have to send along 25 cents, for this survey is no free throwaway, undertaking in itself to produce packaged thinking in disguise by opposing somebody else's packaged thinking.

All it does is to analyze the way 10,000,000 American women enveloped in some 21 organizations, were being subjected to thought control by a handful of specialists here in Washington, as of 1948 when the article was written.

Says the opening paragraph:

"The political structure of American women has the form of a pyramid. Its base is 10,000,000 federated women. They are represented by 21 separate organizations. At the apex is the Women's Joint Congressional Committee, seated in Washington."

MAKING THE BULLETS

The joint committee, in 1948, was making the bullets, over at 1649 K Street NW., and the ladies' clubs all around the country were shooting them.

Most of the deadly consequences, in affairs both foreign and domestic, were achieved without the rank and file ever knowing what they had done.

Now, 3 years later, a feminine observer says:

"This Women's Clearing House for National Security, my suspicious mind tells me, is a sort of marriage of the Women's Joint Congressional Committee, which packaged thinking first presented in its true light, and the program information exchange, now defunct, also analyzed in packaged thinking.

"My suspicion is that this is one more way by which important women's organizations are going to be used to reflect administration propaganda."

PACKAGED THINKING TECHNIQUE

Of course that is probably an obvious purpose. More than that, the packaged thinking technique can be further demonstrated with evidence and material at hand here at the Times-Herald in the form of exhibits furnished to this newspaper by members of the General Federation of Women's Clubs.

For instance, the blue-covered job labeled: "How shall we strengthen the United Nations? Program outline and discussion hit on various proposals looking toward world government now before Congress and the American people."

Inside the covers there is package thinking, for sure, put together with all the slick silky style of the propagandist at his most deadly.

COUPLE OF SAMPLES

BENTON and Bowles, before BILL became one of the windiest of Senators and Chester a has-been ex-Governor of Connecticut, were never more razzle-dazzle.

Members of the General Federation of Women's Clubs should just dig out one of those kits and read it all through again now. A second look will open any innocent's eyes.

Compare, for instance, with another such kit in gray and brown, entitled: "Briefing Session on Foreign Policy, January 28 to February 2, 1951, Washington, D. C., and New York City."

Read, compare, and ask yourself how your own ideas of the world and what's in it got that way.

Women's organizations, like men's, can do good when the members are in control of the programs, not when the programs are in control of the members.

Incidentally, packaged thinking is no special sin of women. If anything, men are worse. For as indicated by the devices and evidence above cited, at least it requires the most professional order of technique to get the ladies lined up.

But as for the men, they have been lassoed by the millions and their hides nailed on the barn doors of the Nation with no trouble at all.

Indeed, it has not even been the work of strangers. The boys have done it to themselves.

California-Arizona Water-Rights Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

[From the Pasadena Star-News of March 19, 1951]

SECRETARY OF INTERIOR CHAPMAN AGAIN LINES UP WITH ARIZONA

The California-Arizona water-rights controversy, growing from the Arizona Central Valley project bill, has, as recently remarked in this place, begun boiling in Washington, and now Interior Secretary Chapman has added fuel to the fire by renewing his endorsement of the measure.

For 3 years now Congress has been considering this fantastic reclamation project, whose primary purpose would be to rescue approximately 150,000 acres of Arizona desert land which were put under cultivation during the war-boom days of the early 1940's and to supply water for an additional 100,000 acres.

To accomplish this, authors of the plan propose to build a mighty dam on the Colorado River above Hoover Dam; to build, below Parker Dam, four pump lifts which would raise 1,200,000 acre-feet of irrigation water to a height of almost 1,000 feet; and to construct a network of aqueducts and canals for transporting this water over 315 miles across Arizona where it finally would be used to grow ordinary field crops.

Cost of this amazing project was estimated by the Bureau of Reclamation at $738,000,000 in 1948. Considering increased prices of labor and material since then, it is safe to assume original costs alone would be near $1,000,000,000. This is five times the cost of the Hoover Dam, many times the cost of the Panama Canal, much more than the cost of developing the TVA, and far more than the cost of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway.

Area to be benefited is all within the State of Arizona, and the project would directly benefit only 25,000 farmers. Interior Secretary Chapman reports there are only about 6,000 farms within the project area and that of these, 420 farms contain 55 percent of the land to be irrigated. In other words, the project would give benefits of more than $550,000 to each of these 420 large landowners, and tens of thousands to each of the other 5,600 farm owners.

If Arizona wishes to defray the entire expense of this project, doubtless it would be all right, providing its installation did not take water away from California, where a greater number of people reside. But when the entire billion-dollar cost of this project is to be borne by the taxpayers of the Nation for the benefit of a handful of land speculators in Arizona, the matter is of serious concern.

The Bureau of Reclamation insists Arizona farmers who are to receive the water can afford to pay only $4.50 per acre-foot for it. But, on the basis of the 50-year repayment period proposed, the cost of delivering the water would amount to $18 per acre-foot annually, or four times the charge estimated by the Bureau. Here again the burden of costs would fall upon the taxpayers in the other 47 States.

Former Senator Downey of California testified last year: "Central Arizona land is worth at most $300 an acre, but at $300 an acre the whole irrigated area of central Arizona, less than 600,000 acres, could be bought for $180,000,000, and the 150,000 acres at stake could be bought for $45,000,000."

The United States agricultural census for 1945 lists the total value of all farm lands and buildings in the State of Arizona at $287,000,000. The original expenditures for the proposed central Arizona project would be almost three times that figure.

No land should be reclaimed and irrigated by the Federal Government at excessive cost to produce crops which are already surplus or which can be produced more cheaply elsewhere; water should be allotted from the Colorado on the basis of the most water for the greatest number of people; California and Arizona should obtain just and proportionate shares. Logic and justice argue strongly against a billion-dollar central water project.

In the Interest of National Unity, General MacArthur Should Report in Person to the Congress of the United States on Conditions in Asia

REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a House resolution that conveys to the President of the United States that it is the sense of the House of Representatives that he, as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States, should direct General of the Army Douglas A. MacArthur to return to the United States and to report on the progress, problems, and probabilities of the Korean situation at a joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives in order that the duly elected representatives of the people may be fully informed thereon.

Mr. Speaker, the American people are split today as to our policy in global defense against Communist aggression. This condition results from the fact that we have full information as to what the conditions are in Europe as presented to Congress and the American people by General Eisenhower.

This is not true as far as Asia is concerned because we have been denied a first-hand report from Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who knows more about the Orient, the oriental mind, and our economic and military problems in Asia than any other living American.

To successfully defend ourselves against world communism, we must have a united people supporting a world policy which will not put all our military eggs in the European basket at the expense of our reputation and prestige in the Far East.

You will recall that during World War II, from the standpoint of manpower and war matériel, including $11,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease to Russia, we predominantly favored the European theater, leaving General MacArthur to achieve his miraculous victory on a shoestring. To top it off, Russia was permitted through a 9-day participation in the Pacific war to claim equal credit in this victory.

Today we have a similar situation as prevailed during World War II, with the policy of our Government favoring Europe and very little consideration being given to the Far East which without doubt holds the solution to a lasting world peace.

Let us examine the situation. It is no secret that the Chinese Reds, with the assistance of Russia, are assembling in Manchuria units of the old Japanese Kwantung Army which surrendered to the Russians, but were never repatriated. It is also known that with this added strength the Russians are not only regrouping the Chinese Red Army, but they are training, equipping, and supplying them for future campaigns.

In addition, it has been disclosed that in the deployment of this Communist-trained hard core of the Kwantung army at least a part has been quietly infiltrated to the south half of Sakhalin Island which is 40 miles north of Japan.

To strengthen the communistic Chinese Army the presence of Russian jet planes in the Canton area, manned by Chinese pilots, reveals that for the past 8 months Russian instructors have trained hundreds of the Chinese in the handling of jet planes. While this has been going on, the Chinese Reds in turn have made available to the Russians the port of Tsingtao on the China coast, and three snorkel-type Russian submarines have been sent there to be used in the training of Chinese submarine crews.

Mr. Speaker, I am not an alarmist, nor am I carrying anybody's banner. As a Member of Congress, I feel it my duty and responsibility to recognize the situation in the Far East. I feel that before we can legislate intelligently on our global defense, we must have that half of the picture which has been held from us. I repeat that only General MacArthur can give us that picture honestly and completely.

World war III, if it comes, will take every ounce of unified American effort. Therefore, every difference of opinion and division of thought among our people must be reconciled.

The answer to the problem of achieving national unity is to give equal emphasis to the problems of Asia that have been given to the problems of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, this is possible only when you and I and every Member of this Congress have heard from the lips of General MacArthur the unvarnished, uncensored, and unflavored report on conditions in the Orient.

The United States Air Force Fighter and Bomber Groups Are Hard-Bitten Veteran Outfits Which Will Go to Any Target on Earth With Atom Bombs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, the New York Herald Tribune of March 22 carried an article by Mr. Gill Robb Wilson, noted feature writer and aviation editor, with respect to the status of our fighting men of the Air Force now stationed in England. Among other interesting observations made by Mr. Wilson was one which had to do with the benefits which have accrued through basing our Air Force training on the British Isles.

In its deterrent effect—

Gill Robb Wilson wrote—

the command of General Johnson is acknowledged throughout Europe to have played a vital part in influencing the Soviet.

In commenting further with respect to this training, Mr. Wilson went on to say that—

Seven hundred and seventy crews from the United States have passed through the hands of the Third Air Division since its inception, and 1,600 crossings of the Atlantic Ocean racked up without accident.

Mr. Speaker, this article is so timely and of such informative value with respect to the splendid work which our Air Force is doing abroad that I am asking unanimous consent of my colleagues in the House to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD this article by Gill Robb Wilson, now aviation editor of the New York Herald Tribune.

Mr. Wilson's article reads as follows:

THE AIR WORLD—UNITED STATES AIRMEN IN BRITAIN—A DETERRENT TO RUSSIA

(By Gill Robb Wilson)

SCULTHORPE, England.—United States air power in the United Kingdom is organized under the title of the Third Air Division. Based on British airdromes in two general areas, East Anglia and the Midlands, its mission has been twofold.

In one case the Third Air Division is in position to supplement British retaliation against sudden aggression. In the next case its mission is to train United States strategic air groups in rotation from America. Both missions involve close coordination with the Royal Air Force and the warning system of England's defense.

In composition the American outfit involves 20,000 airmen and officers who staff a general headquarters and maintain the bases and supply depots necessary to serve the rotating bomber and fighter groups from home.

Commanding the Third Air Division from headquarters near Northhold Air Base outside London is Maj. Gen. Leon Johnson, former commander of the Fifteenth Air Force and wearer of the Medal of Honor for gallantry in leading the Ploesti raids against Romanian oil. Deputy to General Johnson is Maj. Gen. J. P. McConnell, and heading the big maintenance depot at Burtonwood and the supplemental one at Sealand is Brig. Gen. Robert Oliver.

UNDER WASHINGTON

When originally organized by General Johnson in July 1948, the Third Air Division came under control of United States Air Forces in Europe, but subsequently was placed directly under the Chief of Staff of the Air Forces at Washington. In the overall plan of reorganization for European defense, the division is once again under USAFE, commanded by Lt. Gen. Lauris Norstad.

In its deterrent effect, the command of General Johnson is acknowledged throughout Europe to have played a vital part in influencing the Soviet. The Third Air Division, usually supporting medium-bomber groups (B-29's), still has big teeth. Its bomber and fighter groups are hard-bitten veteran outfits which will go to any target on earth with atom bombs in necessity. Their training over the oceans and free lands of Europe is not exactly of the primary type. Mid-air refueling is, of course, routine procedure for both bombers and fighters.

For actual practice bombing, two ranges are available, one at Helgoland and the other off the Wash on the east coast of England. Radar bomb scoring can be practiced on any target in free Europe and the same is true of photographic simulated targeting. Air-to-air gunnery practice and escort tactics are furnished by both the Third Air Division's own fighters and those of the RAF.

During the usual 3-month period for which any one bomber or fighter group is trained under the Third Air Division, its individual crews will fly a dozen missions of an average 10-hour duration. Some of the missions may be 20 hours and others but 5 or less, but the average is about 10.

ONE THOUSAND SIX HUNDRED OCEAN CROSSINGS

Seven hundred and seventy crews from the United States have passed through the hands of the Third Air Division since its inception, and 1,600 crossings of the Atlantic have been racked up without accident. Since GCA (radar) landings are as routine in European weather as they are abnormal in Texas, the safety factor compiled by the Third Air Division's training is remarkable.

Until recently the antiaircraft defense of United States air bases in England was provided by the British Army, but now the Thirty-second AAA Brigade of the United States Army has taken over ack-ack responsibilities to secure training with the division. Gen. Thomas Handy, commanding United States Army forces in Europe, has just completed his first inspection of the Thirty-second Brigade—a vivid memory to the writer who followed the doughty general for 2 days in the deluge and mud of an English March. Col. Metticus May, commanding the Thirty-second Brigade, reports that his GI's and the Third Air Division's airmen already have been welded together in a working unit.

Presently dispersed around the east Anglican group of air bases—Mildenhall, Sculthorpe, Lakenheath, Wyton, and Bassingbourne—are the bombers of the Five Hundred and Ninth Wing of the Eighth Strategic Air Force, under Col. John Ryan. In support is the Thirty-first Fighter Wing equipped with Republic F-84E's, under Col. E. H. Dunham, and an element of the Thirty-eighth Strategic Reconnaissance Wing.

Opposition to the St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project Comes From Every Nook and Corner of the Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, it has been said without fear of contradiction that only 15 percent of our population will benefit from the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, but every American taxpayer will be called upon to foot his share of the bill for such an economic monstrosity.

From every nook and corner of this Nation the newspapers of the country are protesting the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, and the editors of these papers are speaking up for the 85 percent of us who will receive no benefits but who will have to chip in and pay the bill.

Here are just a few of the editorials from newspapers in various States who speak out against the St. Lawrence seaway project.

[From the Independence (Mo.) News of February 2, 1951]

HAPPENINGS THAT AFFECT THE FUTURE OF EVERY AMERICAN INDIVIDUAL

The country was prepared for a shock from Mr. Truman's budget message. It got a sharper one than many had bargained for.

The most striking part of the message lay in the way domestic projects were lumped with the defense effort. As a Wall Street Journal news account described it, "President Truman is putting the Fair Deal into uniform. All the old familiar ambitions; from the Brannan farm-subsidy plan and the St. Lawrence seaway project to establishment of a Fair Employment Practices Committee and Federal health insurance, were injected into the gigantic defense budget for 1951-52."

TAXES PLUS ECONOMY

The country was prepared for a shock from Mr. Truman's budget message. It got a sharper one than many had bargained for.

The most striking part of the message lay in the way domestic projects were lumped with the defense effort. As a Wall Street Journal news account described it, "President Truman is putting the Fair Deal into uniform. All the old familiar ambitions, from the Brannan farm-subsidy plan and the St. Lawrence seaway project to establishment of a Fair Employment Practices Committee and Federal health insurance, were injected into the gigantic defense budget for 1951-52."

[From the Gloucester (Mass.) Times of March 3, 1951]

SEAWAY SILLINESS

Whenever we want to write an easy editorial, we find the chance usually before us in Washington's foolish dragging out again of the St. Lawrence seaway project. The project is to the front again, and it doesn't take any more thinking than it ever has on the part of either writer or reader to condemn it as a typical political way of wasting our money.

President Truman just now tries to give some semblance of real need to the thought of deepening the St. Lawrence River and its connection with our Great Lakes so that deep-draft boats can navigate it by suggesting it will help our national defense; in particular, would allow iron ore to be carried easily from Quebec and Labrador to land-shipping points on the lakes adjacent to steel centers. All that doesn't take away the foolishness of it all. It will be years before we've really got to have those ores.

[From the Longview (Tex.) Journal of January 18, 1951]

MR. TRUMAN, YOUR "DEAL" IS SHOWING

Every man, woman, and child knows that a new dress or a new suit can lift the spirit and bring a measure of new hope even to the downcast.

President Truman knows this. Accordingly, he has dressed his Fair Deal program in a new suit—a military uniform—and has sent it on a fresh parade before Congress. The uniform is fine, Mr. Truman—only trouble is, your Deal is showing.

In your call for a $71,500,000,000 budget for the next fiscal year and stupendous new taxes, Mr. President, your cloak of military necessity has been stretched so thin that the old Fair Deal program is showing all around.

There's the old Brannan farm-subsidy plan, repudiated by the people throughout the great Midwest farm belt; there's the St. Lawrence seaway project which has previously been rejected; there's the old project to establish a Fair Employment Practices Commission; there's the same old socialistic Federal medicine program; and, among other things, another proposal to get the Federal Government deeper into the electric-power business, and national meddling with the public school system supported by the States.

[From the Kingman (Kans.) Journal of March 2, 1951]

NO END TO USELESS SPENDING

The current world crisis, which has come home with a bang to the United States, should have at least one beneficial effect and that is to discourage certain costly and highly dubious political schemes. But will it? Present indications are it will not. Instead, there are those in high places who are using this emergency to foist their schemes upon the public under the deceptive guise of national defense.

One such scheme—out of many others—is the St. Lawrence waterway, on which the Government would spend hundreds of millions of dollars for inland water transport facilities in Canada. The same thing was proposed in 1941 when we were told that it was a must and we would have to have it to win World War II. Now we are being told again it is a must and we will have to have it to win the next war.

It is claimed that the St. Lawrence project would result in cheaper transportation and power. This is true only if a large part of the cost were charged off to other purposes—only, in other words, if Government subsidized the business with the taxpayers' money similar to the bookkeeping system now used on the TVA.

[From the New Orleans (La.) States of January 30, 1951]

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Inclusion of the St. Lawrence seaway project as one item in President Truman's budget has stirred proponents here and there to dust off their pleas for the gigantic international boondoggle.

One such editorial the other day in a northern paper followed the theme of its caption, "St. Lawrence seaway—A defense must."

Maybe they're dreaming about what the seaway might do, if it worked, in world war IV. It's a cinch it would have no defense value earlier than that. Quite likely it would weaken America's defenses by pushing the Nation's financial load to the breaking point.

[From the Oklahoma City (Okla.) Oklahoman of February 8, 1951)

CHEAPENING PATRIOTISM

With a measure of presumption and considerable brass the supporters of the long-debated St. Lawrence waterways project are now out with a declaration that their pet project should be completed forthwith as a measure of national defense. Of course they are trying to make capital of a grave national emergency. They believe that Congressmen who never have looked with any degree of favor upon the St. Lawrence project will support it now if they can only be convinced that the country never will be safe again unless their project is completed.

With the St. Lawrence running exactly as it is running today the United States has won several full grown wars. And we are persuaded that the United States will remain capable of defending itself, even if the St. Lawrence Basin is never improved.

[From the New Castle (Ind.) Courier-Times of February 19, 1951]

It is difficult to comprehend how the proposed St. Lawrence waterway would be an aid to our defense efforts, but President Truman again recommended it to Congress. We won two world wars without it and engineers have estimated that its completion would require 7 years and it would be icebound for 5 months out of the year. The old argument was that the seaway would aid our farmers in shipping wheat to Liverpool which controlled the world market. Well, Liverpool controls nothing anymore and the amount of wheat which farmers can now ship abroad and the price is fixed by international agreement.

[From the Newburgh (N. Y.) News of February 24, 1951]

ARGUING FOR ST. LAWRENCE SCHEME

We are not spending money fast enough, so we must go into the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, Secretary of Defense Marshall tells us. This is the gist of what he says, even though there is a camouflage of national defense. The fallacies of arguments for this scheme have been exposed for more than a generation, but its backers seemingly never give up hope.

[From the Norfolk (Va.) Ledger-Dispatch of February 20, 1951]

ATLANTIC PORTS IN DANGER

Norfolk port interests wisely are taking steps to organize opposition to the St. Lawrence waterway project which was pressed first by President Roosevelt and now is being pressed strongly by President Truman. The opposition is based upon the fact that the development of the proposed waterway for ocean traffic into the Great Lakes would create grave danger for the Atlantic and Gulf ports. The need for action on the part of the opposition arises urgently.

[From the Pueblo (Colo.) Chieftain of January 17, 1951]

DOES PRESIDENT TRUMAN MEAN WHAT HE SAYS?

In his report on the state of the Union and again in his budget message President Truman lays great stress on the necessity of refusing appropriations on nonessential projects at this particular time, when our program of national defense and aid to our friends abroad is so important.

But in his budget message the President also demands appropriations for projects which are not a part of our defense program in any sense of the word.

For instance, Mr. Truman wants an appropriation to build the St. Lawrence tidewater canal which would cost many millions of dollars with Uncle Sam to be asked to put up about 60 percent of the cost.

[From the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer of February 4, 1951]

MR. TRUMAN AND TAXES

Whatever it takes in the way of taxes to pay for mobilization as we go should be levied. And whatever it takes in the way of cutting back domestic civilian expenditures of the Government to equalize the burden on the taxpayer should be done.

President Truman's request for $10,000,000,000 in new taxes, therefore, should be granted, because it will probably take that much more than we are already paying to meet the cost of mobilization.

* * * * *

Or, if Congress grants President Truman's request and authorizes the St. Lawrence seaway, the Government will be putting vast quantities of materials, labor, and money into postponable civilian production when they ought to be going into war production.

The Government, then, will be bidding against its own war production to carry out its postponable civilian production.

And that means more burdensome taxes for all of us.

Let us, then, pay that $10,000,000,000 in extra taxes without complaining, but let us as individual taxpayers demand that Congress hold back the other six or seven billion dollars that Mr. Truman will ask until he demonstrates that his administration is willing to make the same kind of sacrifice that he demands of us.

The Crime Probe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN V. BEAMER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. BEAMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news article from the Indianapolis Star of March 27, 1951. It pertains to the demand on the part of the people in my district to have the estimable work of the Kefauver committee continued:

KOKOMO PETITION URGES UNITED STATES CRIME PROBE CONTINUE

KOKOMO, IND.—A factory foreman's letter urging longer life for the Kefauver committee snowballed within a few hours into a petition asking Indiana Congressmen to help keep the committee's probe going.

Representative JOHN V. BEAMER announced at Washington yesterday he had received a petition signed by 60 Kokomo residents.

It asked that "you do all that is possible to keep in effect the Kefauver crime-investigating committee."

It was sent by Fred E. Parker, a Chrysler Corp. foreman, who said it was "the first time I'd ever written anybody about anything."

Before mailing it he showed it to a few friends, who immediately wanted to sign it and have their friends sign it, too. Parker said he did not solicit any signatures.

Copies of the letter also were sent to Indiana's two Senators, WILLIAM E. JENNER and HOMER E. CAPEHART.

BEAMER said it was the first formal Hoosier expression of approval of the Kefauver investigation.

To the Point of Absurdity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Reporter-Dispatch, White Plains, N. Y., for February 21, 1951:

TO THE POINT OF ABSURDITY

Although many of us abhor wire tapping and all that it connotes, the fact is being brought home more and more clearly that—under court authorization—it contains more benefits to society than fundamental harm.

We are learning that, if wire tapping can embarrass law violators without harming honest citizens, it should be used.

We are beginning to recognize that, if a wire tap can confound a traitor to our country, we should not hesitate to give preference to our country and what it stands for rather than to a person who would betray our Nation and its freedoms.

Congress right now finds itself confronted with that very choice. It is unpleasant, certainly, to think of legalizing wire tapping. Nobody would argue wire tapping is a nice thing to do. Yet nobody would hesitate to confess that catching and prosecuting criminals is not a nice business, either.

Wire tapping that has been authorized by the county court has been effective as a tool of law enforcement. It has ripped out telephone service from hundreds of places discovered to be violating the law. It has stopped what was described as an interstate gambling information service in Yonkers.

In the national picture, the Judith Coplon spy case dramatized the embarrassment that came to the prosecution because it could not use wire-tapping evidence. A higher court held the evidence thus obtained to be illegal. The court ordered a new trial, while declaring that the girl's guilt was plain.

The court suggested to Congress that legalization of limited official wire tapping would obviate such a paradox as it found itself in.

One of the primary rules for any government—particularly for our Federal Government—is not to permit itself to become a darned fool. There is no need to stymie the work of the Federal Bureau of Investigation so that the criminal gentry always have an upper hand. There is no reason for giving traitorously inclined persons an advantage over and beyond that which accrues to decent citizens.

The FBI has been entrusted to protect national security. It deserves to have the tools and the laws to enable it to do a good job.

The bill now in Congress, H. R. 479, by Representative KENNETH B. KEATING, of New York State, should become law without too much delay. It incorporates safeguards to honest citizens. We share Congressman KEATING's suggestion to Congress that our present inhibitions in trying to protect ourselves against treason are "certainly carrying the right of privacy to an absurd and ridiculous length."

We believe, as Mr. KEATING does, that "no nation can survive which does not meet problems threatening its very existence with more realism than this."

Letters From Korea

OF
HON. S. J. CRUMPACKER, JR.
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] made some remarks in regard to two letters from soldiers in Korea, which have been inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD. The first by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT] on March 13, and the second inserted by myself on April 5. The gentleman from Illinois calls attention to the almost identical language of these two letters and attributes the similarity to some deep, dark Communist plot to undermine the morale of our troops in Korea, and demands that the Army immediately conduct an investigation into the source of these letters. I wish to state first, that I had no idea at the time I inserted this letter into the RECORD that another letter containing almost identical language had previously been inserted. However, since having this called to my attention I have conducted a little research into the matter and think possibly that I have an explanation for the similarity which is a little less sinister than that suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. I find that the writers of both letters are assigned to the same unit—an Engineer detachment. One is a corporal and the other a private first class. I also learned that five men in this unit got together and composed the letter in question and then sent it to five different papers in different parts of the country.

However, it seems to me that this is not the important issue raised by these letters, irrespective of what their original source might be. I have read the reports of the propaganda campaign which the Communists are waging against our forces in Korea, much of it aimed at undermining our morale by raising the very questions posed in these two letters. One of the strange quirks of the military mind is that they sometimes seem to think that they can maintain morale within military units subject to such attacks by somehow or other insulating them from the propaganda. Such an effort is foredoomed to failure, because the enemy will always succeed in planting the seed of dissatisfaction. The only effective way to cope with such propaganda is to keep the forces in question well supplied with answers to all the questions which the enemy raises. If there are no satisfactory answers, bad morale is bound to result.

This gets me back to my original purpose for inserting the letter in the RECORD. It seems to me that the questions raised in the letter should be answered. We cannot expect to draft men and send them to fight and possibly die for us in Korea and then refuse to tell them why we are doing so and what our purpose is in fighting such a war. I inserted the letter in the RECORD because I felt that the questions raised in it should be and must be answered to the satisfaction not only of Corporal Case but of every other man in uniform in Korea. I also felt that I did not myself know any satisfactory answers to these questions, and if anyone did know it would have to be here in Washington. It was my hope that by my insertion of the letter in the RECORD it might come to the attention of some authority here in Washington who felt he knew the answers and would accept the corporal's challenge to write him and give him satisfactory explanations.

The answer certainly is not to have the Army investigate into the matter with the view that it is some sort of a Communist plot. Such investigations would usually better be described as inquisitions, generally serving only to aggravate the morale problem rather than to rectify it. We have only to remember the statement issued by a supposedly responsible military official at the Lackland Air Force Base in Texas last January, attributing the reports of overcrowding and bad organization at that base to some sort of a subversive plot.

I would like to state further that I feel that Corporal Case has every right to be dissatisfied with the way in which he has been treated by the so-called freedom-loving Nation. He was drafted at the age of 18 and taken out of high school before the completion of his high-school course, sometime about the end of World War II. After spending 3½ years in service, including a tour of duty in Germany, and after having managed to complete his high-school course via a correspondence school while in service, he was discharged from the Army with the understanding that he would go into the inactive Reserves and not be recalled except in case of a national emergency. He then attempted to further his education and entered Indiana University. After barely 1 year in the university, he was again recalled to active military service last September 13 months before the national emergency had been declared by President Truman. I say that as an American citizen and as a man in uniform against his will, he has every right to ask these questions and he likewise has every right to receive satisfactory answers.

Justice Department Enforcement of the Antimonopoly Laws Faulty and Injurious

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, everybody complains about monopoly and criticizes the laws now on the books for failure to curb the evil, but nobody ever does anything effective about it. Elaborate and expensive investigations about monopoly are conducted, usually ending in the rediscovery that a small number of corporations control a great portion of business, that over the years the number of individual proprietors has decreased, that wealth is concentrated and is growing more so, that prices are controlled and yet have risen, and so on. The investigations generally end with recommendations that something ought to be done, that bigness is bad and should be prohibited, that fines should be increased, that more money should be appropriated for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, that consent decrees should not be made, that corporations should be required to have licenses from the Federal Government, and so on. More economic books are written based on the material gathered in the investigations; more and more money is appropriated; but the evil of monopoly continues and grows. As the Subcommittee on the Study of Monopoly of this House has stated, "Investigations of monopoly have not been lacking in recent years, but inquiries in this field which have had as their aim concrete legislation have been few." (Hearings before the Subcommittee on Study of Monopoly Power, of the Committee on the Judiciary, serial No. 14, part 1, p. iii.)

I have received a letter from Mr. Harry C. Arthur, Jr., a constituent who is an independent exhibitor engaged in the motion picture theater business, describing some of the monopoly conditions in that business which he and others have had to endure for a generation or more, and calling attention to grave weaknesses and failures in enforcement of the law, manifested by the manner in which the Department is at this time failing to deal adequately with the dissolution of the motion picture trust. Mr. Arthur's letter makes clear that at this time deficiency in the antitrust laws lies largely in the Department of Justice rather than in the law itself. This inadequacy of enforcement can be easily, and should be quickly, corrected by the Department of Justice. The facts and views stated by Mr. Arthur, it seems to me, will be enlightening and of value to Members of Congress, and they clearly demand the serious, sympathetic and prompt action of officials of the Government in charge of the enforcement of the antimonopoly laws.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including Mr. Arthur's letter as follows:

FANCHON & MARCO, INC.,
Los Angeles, March 20, 1951.

Hon. CARL HINSHAW,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HINSHAW: This letter is written to bring to your attention certain improper methods of the Department of Justice in the administration of the antitrust laws, which strengthen and increase unlawful monopoly and restraint of trade; and to propose legislation for the correction and prevention of such methods.

For many years I have been engaged as an independent exhibitor in the motion-picture business, principally in St. Louis and Los Angeles, Long Beach, and nearby places in California. I will, therefore, deal specifically with the conduct of the Department of Justice relative to unlawful monopoly and restraint of trade in the motion-picture business, although I am reliably informed that the motion-picture case is by no means a rare or peculiar instance.

The several theater companies in which I am interested are among the people of whom the Supreme Court made the following statement in a recent decision about the motion-picture monopoly: "The trade victims of this conspiracy have in large measure been the small independent operators. They are the ones that have felt most keenly the discriminatory practices and predatory activities in which defendants have freely indulged. They have been the victims of the massed purchasing power of the larger units in the industry. It is largely out of the ruins of the small operators that the large empires of exhibitors have been built."

The motion-picture business is about 80 percent monopoly and 20 percent independent American competitive enterprise, the latter, however, being subjected to heavy burdens and restrictions imposed by the monopoly overlords. The motion-picture industry is probably among the first 10 or 15 largest industries in the United States, representing in proprietors and employees half a million or more people, the great majority of whom are in the independent competitive part of the business. The total income of the industry is larger but most of it accrues to and is distributed among people in the monopoly part. As of this date, about 69,000,000 people (or less) attend motion-picture theaters each week in the United States, which is a decrease of about 80,500,000 in 1946, and a very substantial falling off.

The two great and ancient evils of monopoly are impoverishment of the product and excessive prices. Today this industry is the chronic and dying victim of both diseases. As the monopoly has grown the quality of the pictures has deteriorated and the admission prices have increased. Patronage has fallen away. But the independent exhibitors desirous of retrieving the lost patronage by admission price reduction are obstructed and prevented from doing so by continuation of the monopoly dictation of high admission prices; while the monopoly theaters, though free and able to reduce prices, are unwilling and refuse.

For 10 or 15 years prior to 1938, independent motion-picture exhibitors all over the country poured into the Department of Justice a steady stream of complaints and cries for protection against the discriminatory practices and predatory activities of the large film and theater companies, referred to many years later by the Supreme Court in the quotation cited above. With minor and ineffectual exceptions, however, nothing was done by the Government under the antitrust laws, until July 1938. Meantime the monopoly had grown to enormous proportions and to virtually indestructible strength. Many independent exhibitors had been cracked on the head by the monopoly blackjack, their businesses ruined, their theaters closed up or torn down. I was forced to give up to the monopoly companies, theater interests in California, Arizona, and elsewhere. In a typical case, my business associates were compelled to transfer to the Fox combination a beautiful, modern, newly built theater in Inglewood, Calif., because of the conspiratorial refusal of the other companies to furnish pictures for use in competition with Fox. Some of the independent exhibitors sold out in whole or in part to the monopoly, and became monopoly subordinates and employees. Therein the country has suffered another of the evils of monopoly, the relegation of many independent proprietors to the subordinate status of dependents and servants of the monopoly.

In July 1938 the Government filed a suit under the antitrust laws to break up the monopoly. It charged that five great film companies had acquired practically all of the large first-run theaters in the principal cities in the country and many of the later-run houses, and had divided the country up among themselves as to exhibition; for instance, the Eastern and Southern States being assigned to Paramount, and the Western and Pacific Coast States to Fox. It charged a Nation-wide system of admission price fixing by these companies, the establishment and practice of a multifarious system of discriminations and restrictions imposed on the independent theater and film companies, and a strict and unlawful regimentation of the entire industry for the benefit of the large companies. In that suit the Government asked that the defendants be divested of the many theaters which they had acquired by the unlawful methods. Naturally, the filing of the Government suit inspired the independents with hope that this harsh and un-American system would soon be at an end.

But, having filed the suit, nothing else was done by the Government for a long time. Two years later, in November 1940, the Department of Justice and the defendants entered into a consent decree, which provided for leaving the monopoly structure organically intact, and for the application of an experimental and obviously ineffectual remedy for the restrictive practices. That pretended remedy was the establishment of a system of tribunals throughout the country, financed and controlled by the monopoly companies, which were to receive complaints of the independent exhibitors. The decree was a distinct victory for monopoly, and a sad and discouraging disappointment for the independents.

It took the Department of Justice about 4 years to discover the futility of this experiment by which monopoly was expected to cure monopoly. On August 7, 1944, more than 6 years after the institution of the suit, the Department officially stated that the consent "decree is now inadequate to perform its intended function of restraining the violations of law alleged in the complaint and conforming the operation of the decree defendants to the requirements of the Sherman Act."

The Department of Justice is the largest, the best equipped, and most expensive law office in the world; and it is hard to believe that the futility of that consent decree was not clearly obvious to it in the beginning.

The consent decree having failed, the Department of Justice brought the case on for trial, and the trial began in October 1945. The defendants were held guilty of practically all the discriminations and predatory acts charged, and those acts were prohibited. Although for many years the Department of Justice had collected and undoubtedly possessed much evidence of the unlawful methods used to eliminate independent theaters, to ruin the exhibitors and to acquire their properties and businesses, not one of the victims was called as a witness to prove this ugly and brutal phase of the case. Although the Department of Justice records must be loaded with information of such methods, no evidence at all to that effect was produced by the Government. As a result, the trial court refused to order the divestiture of any theaters.

On the refusal of divestiture by the trial court, the Department appealed the case to the Supreme Court, and on May 3, 1948, the Supreme Court handed down an opinion which amounted to a complete victory for the Government on that phase of the case. I am told that the decision of the Supreme Court is the greatest victory ever achieved by the Government with regard to dissolution of corporate monopoly, that it is a clarifying landmark case in antimonopoly law, and should be a powerful and effectual precedent for use by the Government in similar cases. Briefly stated, the rule laid down in that decision was that every acquisition made by the unlawful methods and practices by the defendants was subject to divestiture. The Supreme Court, therefore, sent the case back to the trial court with instructions to ascertain what theaters had been acquired by such methods and to require that they be disposed of.

Had that mandate been carried out, many of the theaters would have been recovered by former owners, and the rest would have come into the hands of a diversity of independent operators. By that method, without a doubt, competition would have been restored, and much of the wreckage and ruination caused by the big film companies would have been repaired.

But any such wholesome result had been forestalled by further consent decrees between the Department of Justice and the monopoly companies, which represent a surrender by the Government of at least 75 percent of the fruits of the victory in the Supreme Court. These consent decrees were made by drawing a curtain over the savage and criminal competitive methods used by the defendants, the large film companies. As the trial court to which the case had been remanded for divestiture said: "We were also directed to determine whether any 'illegal fruits' were acquired or maintained by the defendants as results of unlawful conspiracies and to divest any such fruits, irrespective of whether the monopoly had in fact been achieved. The plaintiff (the Government) has not introduced evidence to support any claim of divestiture of 'illegal fruits' and expressly reserves the presentation of such an issue for the future."

As of this time such consent decrees have been made with three of the five monopoly combinations, and according to latest reports, the fourth, dealing with the Fox combination, is to be presented to the Court early in April. The decrees already filed relate to the Paramount, Warner, and RKO combinations. As all are substantially alike, I will confine my description to the Paramount decree.

Paramount was a great combination of picture making and exhibiting corporations. It had about 1,500 of the principal theaters in the country, and was the largest aggregation of theaters in the world. It enjoyed very valuable and exclusive preferences in the use of the Paramount pictures. Considering the similar preferences and priorities with regard to the pictures of the other film companies, which the Paramount theaters also enjoyed as a result of the unlawful division of territory condemned by the Supreme Court, the mere number of theaters did not correctly reflect the dominating position of the company. Had the principle of dissolution pronounced by the Supreme Court been applied, I venture to say Paramount would have retained less than 100 theaters.

The Paramount consent decree was entered March 4, 1949. The leading feature of that decree was the separation of the theaters from the picture-making and film-renting part of the business. All of the theaters were transferred to a newly created corporation.

As that decree was originally entered, it was provided that the new theater corporation and the corporation retaining the picture-making and renting business should not have common stockholders; but already that requirement had been modified with the consent of the Department of Justice. Experience justifies the fear that future modifications will be made and in the end a complete community of interest and reunion of the companies will occur. In fact, the decree provides that the court shall retain jurisdiction for future modifications.

The second main feature of the Paramount decree was an ostensible requirement that the new theater company should dispose of some of the theaters received by it in the divorcement transaction. The maximum requirement of the decree is that the corporation shall divest about 700 theaters, which would still leave it the largest aggregation of theaters in the world, still possessing the massed purchasing power condemned by the Supreme Court. I say the requirement to dispose of theaters is merely ostensible because in this respect the decree is so heavily loaded with conditions, alternatives, choices, options, and qualifications favoring the retention of theaters by Paramount that it amounts to no real requirement at all. Moreover, those contingencies and escape devices with which the decree is loaded will give rise to so many complex factual and legal issues to be referred to and decided by the court that compliance, if it ever occurs, will be postponed for many years.

The third main feature of the decree is the express permission to Paramount to acquire many theaters. One would not expect to find such permission in a judgment whose ostensible purpose is to end monopoly and dissolve the massed purchasing power which had been used so injuriously to the public interest. In many instances exhibitors found it impossible to get a necessary supply of pictures unless they gave up an interest in their businesses to the monopoly film companies, and as a result Paramount acquired stock interests in many such companies. In such cases, the decree, instead of compelling relinquishment of the acquired interest, permits Paramount to acquire the outstanding interest. The decree of March 1949, however, placed a limit on such acquisitions. For instance, as to theaters in Texas, the permission to make such an acquisition is limited to 44 theaters. But as recently as March 1 that limitation has been modified and broken down with the consent of the Department of Justice, and by a method which seems to have been largely devised by Government lawyers.

That transaction, which was effectuated by an amendment of the decree of March 1949, also provides for the ostensible divestiture of other theaters, supposed to offset in some measure the number of theaters acquired, but, again, that provision is subject to a complexity of conditions, exceptions, options, and qualifications, which make the divestitures improbable and long delayed, and which will involve the court in the decision of numerous questions, all favoring the retention of the largest number of theaters by Paramount. The mere administration of this amendment, which is to occur over a period of 5 years or more, will undoubtedly cost the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars of the money appropriated by Congress for the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

On March 1 last the Court was asked by the Department of Justice to approve a transaction by which Paramount acquired and added to theaters already held from 95 to 171 theaters in Texas, by acquiring the Consolidated Theaters, Inc., for $12,500,000. Three Government lawyers appeared and strongly urged the Court to approve the transaction, on the specious theory that to increase the number of theaters already controlled by Paramount would promote competition in the exhibition field in Texas and elsewhere. Two short days before the hearing a statement was published in one of the trade periodicals that objections to the transaction would be permitted. Naturally, because of the extreme shortness of the time and the meager and inexact information published, few people in the industry were able to take advantage of the permission. Nevertheless, my counsel appeared and registered serious objections to the transaction. Under the circumstances, those objections were foredoomed to failure; and the Court accepted the proposal of the Department of Justice. For our pains my counsel and the people represented by him were severely criticized by the Government and Paramount counsel for making the objection.

It was, indeed, too much to expect the Court to reject such a transaction sponsored by an important department of the Government in conjunction with the $100,000,000 Paramount Co., merely upon the objection of a few small companies, however valid and correct their criticisms might be.

The manner in which this case has been handled has produced widespread lack of confidence among independent exhibitors throughout the country in the sincerity and effectiveness of the Department of Justice in the enforcement of the antitrust laws. Supreme Court Justice Jackson, and former Attorney General, is reported to have stated that antitrust cases have been brought for political reasons; and, in the light of the motion-picture consent judgments, one wonders whether they are not also settled on the same basis. The following is an excerpt from newspapers published on February 10, 1951:

"At a recent New York Bar Association dinner, Supreme Court Justice Jackson stated that for some years antitrust suits were started against business firms on a political basis.

"Jackson added that he saw no reason for not being candid about the situation. 'After all,' he said 'they had to be picked on some basis.'

"Reports of those present at the dinner reveal that Jackson and others present got a big laugh out of his admission."

The foregoing is by no means a rare and isolated case. If such maladministration of the antitrust laws is not ended, Congress ought to cease appropriating money for the enforcement of those laws. I am informed that the current appropriation is close to four million dollars, much of which, as I have shown, has been misused for the creation and protection of monopoly and restraint of trade.

Specifically, I suggest that Congress should amend the antitrust laws by enacting that no decree in any antitrust case shall be consented to by the Department of Justice and entered by the court until at least 90 days public notice shall have been given to people in the trade affected, and a full and complete opportunity has been had to register their objections and counter proposals in the court, with the right to appeal if the objections and proposals shall be disregarded. I suggest also that the appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust laws should contain a limitation to the effect that no part should be paid for services incident to the entry or modification of any consent decree providing for the retention or acquisition by any company of any property or business which has been, or may be, acquired or used by or for monopolistic methods.

If only part of what I state is true, I think you will agree with me that the powers of our great and beloved Government for enforcement of the antitrust laws have been greatly abused, and that the restrictions described above should be imposed so that the laws may be enforced against and not in favor of monopoly. All, or almost all, of the foregoing can be proven by records of the Department of Justice, including records of interviews with and evidence furnished by many independent exhibitors throughout the country.

I stand ready, also, to furnish such other information to the same effect as is available to me.

Respectfully,

Cincinnati Enquirer Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. ELSTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including an editorial from a recent issue of the Cincinnati Enquirer which centralizes the results of a poll taken by that newspaper on 10 of the most important subjects of discussion today. Since the ballots on these questions went into more than 300,000 homes in the Central Ohio Valley, the viewpoints of those who replied are of particular interest.

The editorial follows:

READERS VOTE "NO" ON "18" DRAFT, PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION, TRUMAN, ACHESON—ALSO ARMY ABROAD—UNLESS CONGRESS ACTS—"YES" ON RED INQUIRY, WAGE, STEEL'S CONTROL

(By Ollie M. James)

History is on the dead run these days. Profoundly important decisions are being reached almost amidst a millrace of moments. From the somber chambers of city council to the august assemblies at Lake Success, things are happening. The destiny of the Nation is being written with a hurried hand. The shape of tomorrow's world is being determined. Everybody, it would seem, is speaking in the name of the public.

What does John Smith think about it—and his wife Mary?

A plain wholesome curiosity about the individual viewpoint on the urgent issues of the day prompted the Enquirer to run an Enquirer Reader's Poll ballot last week end, urging the expression of individual viewpoints on 10 of the foremost topics of popular discussion.

These ballots went into more than 300,000 homes in the central Ohio Valley, concerting both the daily and Sunday subscription lists of the Enquirer. There was no expectation that the return would constitute a scientific poll, even though the base of public opinion thereby contacted was vastly broader than ordinarily is reached by the scientific pollsters. No prizes were offered, and no pressure was exerted for people to respond. The ballots merely were printed as an opportunity for individuals to register their viewpoints.

Some of the results were surprising. A straight news story would blurt them out in the lead. In this report, though, they are purposely subordinated to all this preamble of explanation to emphasize that the editors of the Enquirer are not trying to prove anything, nor did they want to prove anything, by calling on the voice of the public.

Only 1,610 voted in the reader's poll. We say "only 1,610" again merely for the sake of keeping things in proper perspective, although that was a fair sample or cross-section of readers who took the time and went to the trouble and expense of filling out the poll forms and mailing them back to the Enquirer. (Many pretentious scientific polls have based their conclusions on far fewer responses.)

Furthermore, readers were asked to vote on all 10 issues—and most did. So it was assumed that there would be some balancing-out of personal prejudices on the various issues.

This was the "sock-dolager": In response to the first question, "Were Harry Truman to run again for President of the United States, would you vote for him?" Only 93 out of 1,566 persons said "Yes." Percentagewise, the reader opinion against President Truman's reelection was equaled in only one other category. On the seventh question of the poll, "Do you believe in Government prevention of strikes during time of war and national emergency?" there was another preponderance of 94 percent—this time affirmative.

Although comments were not solicited, some readers went to special effort to emphasize how they felt on the subject of reelecting President Truman. Here are a few comments culled from the returns: "Hell, no." "A thousand times no." "We need character, ability, and thrift in Washington." "Never did vote for him." "Yes; if he is opposed to TAFT or MCCARTHY." "He should be impeached."

Eighty-eight percent of the readers responding to the poll answered "Yes" to the second question on the list, "Should the military forces of Chiang Kai-shek be used in the conflict in Korea?"

There was a notable unanimity of response to the third question on the readers' poll, "Is President Truman justified in keeping Dean Acheson as Secretary of State?" Eighty-five percent of the poll returns were marked "No" on this question.

Were the ballot markers strictly men and women opposed to administration policies? The returns provided some answer (and tended to bear out the hope that individual prejudices and biases would level off in the answering of 10 different questions) when readers voted almost 2 to 1, or 938 against 520, in favor of continuing the United Nations' offensive north of the thirty-eighth parallel.

"Shall we send four more divisions to Europe without the consent of Congress?" This question—hewing to the heart of the great debate in Washington—was answered in the negative by 80 percent of the readers.

"Is the drafting of 18-year-olds necessary and proper?" On this question there was a significant division of opinion. Forty-six percent said "Yes" and 54 percent said "No." (Of all 10 questions, the second largest number of readers avoided committing themselves on this issue.)

"Do you favor tighter control of wages as well as of prices to halt inflation?" That, the last question on the poll, encountered surprising accord. The vote was 91 percent for tighter control.

By the same precise percentage, readers expressed approval of a State-wide investigation of communism in Ohio, as recently ordered by unanimous vote of the State general assembly. Only 9 percent of the readers opposed the idea.

A local issue, phrased in this question: "If you voted for the proportional representation type of election in 1947, would you again vote for it?" yielded a striking response. The vote, as broken down into percentages, was 65 to 35 against proportional representation. The totals ran: For proportional representation, 359; against, 654; not voting, 597. (The poll ballots asked persons living outside Cincinnati to ignore the question, so the number of those not voting therefore included both nonresidents as well as previous opponents of proportional representation.)

What does it all prove? The editors of the Enquirer do not undertake to say. But they are proceeding on the assumption that it has been an interesting experiment in sampling general public opinion on the foremost issues of the day—and that it has given John Smith and his wife Mary a chance to say what they think on specific questions, apart from Election Day pressures of politics. The poll will be repeated periodically hereafter, as important issues arise.

This newspaper—and every conscientious man in public office—wants to know how America thinks.

Ballots were received from some very important personages. But the editors rested their opinion, in deciding on the worth of the readers' poll, on a note from one woman reader. It said simply:

"Thanks for the privilege of expressing my opinion."

Address of Hon. John Davis Lodge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 5, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of remarks of the Honorable John Lodge, Governor of Connecticut, before the quarterly New England Council dinner, Hartford, March 22, 1951:

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Robertson, officers and members of the New England Council, honored guests, it gives me especial pleasure to welcome you to Hartford, and to meet with so many citizens of distinction from Connecticut and from our sister New England States.

Your distinguished president, Mr. Wheeler, has accorded me what I can describe only as an overwhelming introduction. Assuredly my own modest merits deserve no such generous accolade. I can only assume that as a large, handsome man, he is accustomed to doing things in a large handsome way.

In recent weeks it has been my privilege to see Mr. Wheeler in action at close range. I noted with admiration the vigor and tenacity with which he grapples with problems close to his heart. It was never my good fortune to see him play football for the alma mater which we share in common, but knowing that he was one of the greatest tackles ever to perform for Harvard, I found myself wishing that there could be a few Walter Wheelers on Harvard's present day football squads.

This morning, attracted by the beauty of the scene, I walked part way to the office. And as I went along, I thought what a remarkable organization the New England Council is. I reflected upon all that the Council has done to promote winter sports in New England. It has given us skiing for the Christmas week end and for the New Year's week end. And now, lo and behold, it provides us with skiing for the Easter week end.

Recognizing the indomitable spirit and resourcefulness of your president, I have no doubt that that ingenious gentleman could, if he put his mind to the problem, see to it that we have skiing also for the Fourth of July.

I take great satisfaction from being with my fellow New Englanders this evening. For, both as individuals in your several communities and as a well-organized body, you represent the best in civic responsibility. Because of your devotion to this historic and beautiful region, because of your faith in yourselves, and your neighbors, you have banded together to foster, not merely the economy of the New England States, but the ideals and the traditions stamped by our stout forefathers upon the rugged hills and gracious valleys of the area.

In your more than a quarter century of service to New England, you have contributed tellingly to the development of our industries which now produce manufactures totaling more than $14,000,000,000 annually. Because of your far-sighted and constructive attitudes, you have assuredly been a compelling factor in the attainment of New England's excellent labor-management record. You have helped to make famous the agricultural products of our region. You have given impetus to the sound growth of our many colleges, universities and technical and preparatory schools.

Moreover, while on the one hand you have encouraged among us a prosperous business and industrial economy, you have also made your influence felt in the achievement of greater economy and efficiency in the conduct of State and local government affairs. In short, the New England council has been a good friend and wise counselor to the entire region. Under your guidance and tutelage you have enabled New England to fulfill more abundantly the destiny to which it is entitled through the superlative character and ability of its people.

Such thoughtful efforts have not only their long-term value. Their worth becomes dramatically apparent in times of stress. There is no doubt in my mind that we in New England have been enabled by the program of the council to make a notably more effective contribution to the national defense effort than would otherwise have been possible.

At the opening of the Connecticut General Assembly, I said, "We in Connecticut must, as we have done in the past, throw into the scale of our national defense all the creative energy and all the productive increase of which our 2,000,000 citizens are capable. Connecticut is a famous arsenal of the Nation" and has been since Eli Whitney at an abandoned sawmill in Hamden developed the methods of mass production to provide rifles for Washington's army. During the last war Connecticut had the highest per capita production of war goods of all the States. Springfield, Vt., achieved the same honor for communities. Many of the things which can be said for each of the New England States can be recited with equal accuracy for all New England. We in New England must, as we have done in the past, throw into the scale of our national defense all the creative energy and all the productive increase of which our 9,333,000 citizens are capable.

One of the reasons for the creation and for the continued existence of the New England Council is to provide a medium whereby the business leaders of New England can express their opinions concerning public affairs and help guide the actions of government. The existence of the organization as such a medium seems, however, to have led some business leaders to believe that there is no need for them to be vocal individually.

Inasmuch as the business leader is almost invariably a person of superior initiative and sense of responsibility, and since in many instances he is able to express his views forcefully and cogently, it is to be hoped that you who play leading roles in our economy will be willing individually, as well as collectively, to demonstrate your belief in our economic, social, and governmental systems by expressing your opinions freely and in public.

The currency of the businessman is dollars. We who hold public office are concerned with another kind of currency—the currency called public support. May I be so bold as to suggest that if our business leaders are to be truly influential in public affairs, they must be as courageous in terms of their own currency as they would like their public servants to be when those public servants are placed under pressure by certain segments of the electorate.

At the suggestion of the six New England governors, the New England Council was brought into being a little more than a quarter of a century ago. The succeeding governors have continued to cooperate with each other in the furtherance of projects of value to all New England.

As we become more and more concerned with the same problems we shall need further to implement the New England Governors' Conference by some kind of informal machinery to develop material for consideration by the governors at their meeting and for carrying out the policies determined by them.

Each of the States has a commission on intergovernmental cooperation. I am suggesting to Gov. Sherman Adams, of New Hampshire, chairman of the Governors' Conference, that those commissions be utilized to do the staff work.

I attended earlier this month in Washington the New England Economic and Defense Conference sponsored by the New England congressional delegation and the New England Council. To me it did not seem that the Federal procurement agencies have set up at this time adequate machinery to keep small business informed on contract and subcontract opportunities. The New England people might well work out more practical methods. I have designated the Connecticut Development Commission as the official State agency to assist small business in this matter. That agency will be glad to work together with similar offices in the other New England States and with your council.

The New England States have for many years cooperated with one another in the conservation and development of our natural resources through the medium of interstate compacts.

All the States except Vermont are partners in the Atlantic States Marine Fisheries Compact. All have joined the compact for mutual assistance in fighting forest fires. Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut are members of the New England Interstate Water Pollution Control Compact. It seems likely that Vermont and New Hampshire and possibly Maine will join this year. The Federal New England-New York Inter-Agency Committee a week ago gave the States a green light for going ahead with action on interstate compacts concerned with control of floods in the Connecticut and Merrimack River Valleys.

Currently, the New England States are working on a compact for mutual assistance for civil defense. Massachusetts and New Hampshire have already ratified a civil defense agreement. I understand that the civil defense authorities of the area are to meet in Boston on April 3 to devise an agreement for all the New England States which can be submitted to Congress for approval as a compact. As a further safeguard for the lives and homes of our people, and in protection of the New England industries so vital to national defense, I trust that this compact will shortly come into being.

Of considerable interest to everyone in New England is the 4-year study of our natural resources and those of New York State by a committee of six Federal agencies created by Presidential directive.

I might say, parenthetically, that of all the water flowing in Connecticut's 8,500 miles of rivers and brooks, 70 percent comes into Connecticut from outside the State. The Connecticut River at the Massachusetts-Connecticut State line represents approximately two-thirds of our inland water resources. We are naturally keenly interested in working with the up-river States in water management problems.

I am very much pleased that the Inter-Agency Committee last Friday, in response to my urging, gave the four States in the Connecticut River Valley full clearance to ratify the Connecticut River flood control compact as drafted by the duly authorized representatives of the States. That action lends much weight to the statements of the interagency committee that it wishes to cooperate with the State governments in resources management programs. Failure to have given New England a green light in this matter and on the New England interstate water pollution control compact would have constituted a serious setback to State participation in the work of the committee.

We can also all approve the action of the interagency committee last Friday during its meeting here in Hartford, giving the Army engineers and the Federal Power Commission clearance to take such action as they see fit, without waiting for further study by the committee, relative to the proposed construction of a hydroelectric dam in the Connecticut River at Enfield Rapids.

This constitutes a favorable precedent for leaving the way open for the development of other desirable power projects in New England and New York without waiting for the conclusions of the interagency committee in June of 1954.

But your program tomorrow morning includes a discussion of the interagency committee's work and I will refrain from further comment concerning it, other than to express the opinion that the States seem to be more than pulling their weight in the boat. It is to be hoped that the results of the 4 years of study will be such that all New England can support it.

I am sure you will understand if I take some family pride in the Federal Rivers and Harbors and Flood Control Act of 1950. Section 205 of that act, as most of you know, resulted from the introduction in the Congress of the so-called Lodge-Furcolo amendment, a bipartisan measure sponsored by my brother, Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, and Congressman FURCOLO, of Springfield, Mass. That amendment was the inception of the program being carried out by the New England-New York Inter-Agency Committee.

I am still at a loss to understand why this section, which had the general approval of both Houses of the Congress, should have been so severely criticized by the President and why it should have been necessary for him to resort to a Presidential directive to achieve the same general objective. But this is not the time to debate that question.

At a meeting of the New England Governors in Boston last January, I asked whether the study authorized by the Congress was to be forgotten and whether there would be duplication of expenditure or manpower to cover the same field under both congressional and Presidential directives.

I have been assured by Col. F. F. Frech, chairman of the committee, that this matter has been given continuing and serious consideration and that every effort is being made to avoid such duplication.

When the interagency committee completes its study in 1954 the New England States should continue their interstate cooperation in the development of plans, programs, and projects for the continued management of natural resources in those ways which will best satisfy the needs and desires of our people.

Those needs and desires will increase and change from time to time and those changes will always make it possible to undertake new plans. We must be sure that interest in our soil, forest, mineral, wildlife, and water resources is not permitted to diminish with the ending of the study.

When I first accepted the invitation to speak at this meeting I hoped to be able to make a definite statement concerning the proposal to build a steel mill in New England. Unfortunately, it is not possible to do so tonight. In connection with the discussion of whether a steel mill should be built in Connecticut or in New England, it is of interest to note that the first successful iron mill in America was in Massachusetts and that the first steel made in America was produced in Simsbury, Conn.

As you know, the New England Steel Development Corp. established by your organization, to promote the construction of a steel mill in New England, engaged a firm of consulting engineers to determine the potential market which could be supplied competitively by a steel mill in Waterford, Conn., and also to prepare estimates of the cost of construction and of operation for such a mill and to determine whether it would be a sound business venture. Governor Bowles appointed a Governor's steel advisory committee to advise Connecticut as to the feasibility of constructing such a mill in this State.

The report of the engineers was submitted 2 weeks ago and was immediately withdrawn. Your steel development corporation is now awaiting a revised report. Until it is received and can be studied neither your corporation nor our committee can state definitely whether the mill can be expected to operate as a private enterprise project. The Governor's steel advisory committee has reported to me that it cannot make a recommendation as to the desirability or feasibility of the project.

Your corporation obtained from the Federal Government a certificate of necessity under the internal revenue law which would permit the steel mill to depreciate three-fourths of its investment at 20 percent per year instead of the normal 3½ percent. This certificate expires in 7 weeks.

A number of such certificates have been issued to encourage expansion of steel production capacity of the country as a defense measure. The Federal agencies have indicated that additional certificates will not be issued. We have not yet learned definitely whether the certificate for the New England mill can be renewed.

The Connecticut General Assembly has before it a proposal that the State grant power of eminent domain to acquire the site in Waterford, Conn., selected by your corporation, for the mill. There is understandable reluctance however, about taking such a drastic step until there is sufficient guaranty that the proposed mill will be economically feasible and will provide the hoped-for benefits to New England's and Connecticut's economy.

I have appointed a community adjustment committee to define the type of collateral problems which might develop in eastern Connecticut as a result of the construction of the proposed steel mill and to suggest what steps should be taken to meet those problems.

It seems likely that the reports of the consulting engineers, the New England Steel Development Corp., the governor's steel advisory committee and the committee on community adjustment problems will shortly be available for consideration.

Despite the fact that New England is a well-knit entity in many respects there still is less community interest throughout the area than was once the case. The New England Council has done much to better this situation, but there remains room for improvement.

We in Connecticut have too little knowledge of what goes on in the northern New England States, partly because the news from there which reaches Connecticut papers through various news services is to a considerable degree the sensational type. Similarly, the newspapers of the Northern States carry too little news of what is happening in Connecticut.

For example, we in New England are very much interested in hydroelectric power, but there are few people in southern New England who know that a power dam was finished on the Connecticut River in New Hampshire and Vermont last year and that another is proposed for construction in the near future. Residents of northern New England have little knowledge of the proposal to construct a power dam on the Connecticut River in Connecticut.

New England's consumption of power is growing by leaps and bounds. During the war a number of power generators scheduled for installation here were diverted by the Federal Government to other parts of the United States and to Russia. Since the war, much new generating capacity has been installed. We have managed to meet all demands and at the same time keep on hand a larger margin of emergency reserve than any other region in the country. Power consumption will continue to grow at a rapid rate. Consummation of present plans will keep us ahead of the demand.

New England is a high-cost area for making power as it is a high-cost area for making other things. We have high wage scales and must import raw materials. In the scurry to see that we always have adequate facilities for making all the power we can use, we must not forget to keep a sharp pencil at work on the cost of power. It is not enough to simply make sure that rates are equitable as between producer and consumer. Keeping the rates just is one thing. Keeping them as low as possible is even more important.

The proposals for the St. Lawrence seaway, and the development of hydroelectric power at the International Rapids and projected redevelopment of Niagara Falls for additional hydroelectric power are of more than academic interest to the people of New England. For many years there has been a belief in New England that development of the St. Lawrence seaway from the ocean to the Great Lakes would have adverse effects on New England's harbors and on the waterway and railway transportation systems of the area.

Recommendations by General Marshall and Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Defense Mobilizer, that the St. Lawrence seaway should be built promptly, indicate the importance ascribed to this project as a defense measure. We in New England should make every effort to determine the adverse effects which this development might bring about in New England and to take steps to compensate for them.

New England, which provides such a relatively large portion of the Federal tax dollar, should obtain dependable assurance that the proposed seaway, which would cost the citizens of this area so much money, must at least not hurt the citizens of the area. Moreover, those parts of New England which, geographically, are in a position to benefit from the projected new hydroelectric power development should seek to establish that such benefit is to be forthcoming.

For many years there has been an exchange of some power between New England and New York State. We should determine the plans of New York State for integrating the power developed at the St. Lawrence and at Niagara Falls through existing transmission and distribution systems of New York State and the surrounding States, particularly New England.

The St. Lawrence and Niagara power is largely base power and there is a likelihood that peak power developed at proposed hydroelectric sites in New England can be exchanged with New York.

In the best interests of New England we should work with the New York State people in the furtherance of their program.

Possessed of relatively meager natural resources, New England has evolved from a wilderness into a densely populated and heavily industralized region with unusually high per capita income and standards of living. Ingenuity and a willingness to work together have been welded by a traditional independence of spirit into a winning formula.

Our spiritual, educational, and cultural standards do not lag behind our material attainments.

It is interesting to reflect that three-fourths of New England's land area is covered by forest growth. In no other region of the United States is the proportion of forest land as great as it is in New England.

Early in the twentieth century New England took the lead in the United States in working for the purchase of mountain lands for national forests. The two national forests in New England have a significant role in the New England forestry picture, but they are small in relation to the total forest area of the six States. New England's forestry problem is primarily a problem of management of privately owned lands.

In thickly populated and heavily industrialized Massachusetts and Connecticut, forests occupy two-thirds and three-fifths of the land areas. Population is concentrated and cropland is scarce. Agriculture, like population, is concentrated in the most suitable areas and like industry is highly specialized. New England counties in Maine, Massachusetts, and Connecticut rank high among 2,500 competing counties in the United States in the value of farm products.

We cannot, as you of the New England council so well recognize, rest on our oars. Other areas, until recently, relatively undeveloped, with more abundant natural resources and with new-found devices are building fast on the industrial and commercial foundations on which our forefathers struggled laboriously. We must not be content to keep abreast of the stream of civilization which forever flows at an increasing speed. We must continue to pioneer—not against the obstacles of a new country, but to surmount the higher and higher hurdles which are natural developments in an old region. Our job is one of rebuilding and redevelopment.

I had opportunity the other day to read the attractive and tastefully compiled booklet recently issued by the New England council. I was particularly struck by its compelling title "The Rising Tide Lifts All the Boats."

"The rising tide lifts all the boats." How aptly that phrase describes the meaning which underlies the work of the council. For your efforts are not channeled into a narrow field. You do not concern yourselves solely with greater volume of business or larger output of production, useful though such progress is to the development of our region. You have enlarged your concepts to the circle of your duties. In a large-spirited way you have directed your very great talents and energies to the whole problem of making New England a better and still better area in which to live, to work, and to bring up the children whose endeavors will be built upon our own. This is an intelligent and modern-minded approach.

We who have been entrusted with public office in New England must look increasingly to you of the New England council for informed opinion and for help in the shaping and execution of the policies which we hold vital to the well-being of our communities, our States, and the entire section.

New England has a unique flavor. Around the very words, "New England" have accreted a store of legend and tradition. It is a flavor compounded of our salty ways and our fabled independence of spirit. Its essence clings to our picturesque hills and nestles around the centuries old homesteads of our quiet valleys.

When we think of New England, what pictures come to the mind: Magnificent stretches of white sea beach, brooks, and streams turbulent as the course of our history, wide rivers, and majestic lakes. New England is the laconic twang of the Yankee farmer; it is the skilled fingers of the artisan; it is the deep snow of Maine winters; it is the diverse arts and crafts of a hundred hardy racial stocks; it is the clang of 20,000 busy factories; it is the immemorial shade of campus elms.

But for all New England's scenic charm, for all its quaint lore, for all its mighty tradition, this region of ours owes its real greatness to another factor, and that factor is the human growth and progress which have been made in our six States for more than 300 years. Roll back that long chronicle and you will observe that the core of New England is the courage, the hardihood, and the dynanism of her people. Those are the qualities that have made us a great region, and that will keep us a great region.

I salute you gentlemen of the New England council for your determination that these priceless attributes of New England character and talent shall be given their fullest encouragement to flower and to spread. For what God has given us in New England let us offer thanks not alone with our tongues but with enduring creative enterprise of hand and heart and mind to the end that this region which we love and serve shall become a land teeming with productive increase, and shall prosper in all its ways.

Voice of America and Charles M. Hulten

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED E. BUSBEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, during debate yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY] read into the RECORD a portion of the committee hearings which pertained to the Voice of America program where he was interrogating Mr. Charles M. Hulten, general manager, International Information and Education Exchange Program. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY] left the impression that he does not believe Mr. Hulten is qualified to be general manager of this tremendous operation, and particularly the Voice of America program. I concur in the opinion of my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY].

There seems to be a discrepancy between his evaluation of Mr. Hulten and the profile of Mr. Hulten which appears on page 10 of the March 21, 1951, edition of the U. S. A. Life Air Bulletin, for use by press and radio. The profile of Mr. Hulten which appears in this bulletin reads as follows:

CHARLES M. HULTEN, GENERAL MANAGER, INTERNATIONAL INFORMATION AND EDUCATION EXCHANGE PROGRAM

(In Burma an agriculturalist tells a farmer how to improve his crops. In Indonesia a musician reads a review of a New York concert. In Chile a classroom of children watch an educational film. In Poland a woman turns a radio dial to hear how the United Nations is fighting Communist aggression. These and countless similar incidents are the end result of America's information and educational exchange program, which every day sends the voice of democracy sounding around the world.)

In January 1950 the United States Department of State decided that this program, which is the Nation's most effective method of combating Kremlin propaganda, needed a general manager. The decision was made so that Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, could be freed of the day-to-day problems of the expanding program to devote more of his time to high-level policy matters.

There was one logical person to fill the position of general manager for the program: the dynamic, square-jawed man who was then serving as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Administration—Charles M. Hulten. Mr. Hulten had had wide experience as a newspaperman and university professor. He had held executive positions in the Government for almost 10 years. His abilities in the fields of administration and information had won him the respect and admiration of all who had worked with him.

As general manager of the program, Mr. Hulten has charge of the Office of International Information and the Office of Educational Exchange. Under the Information Office the Voice of America radio programs are broadcast to countries all over the world, including Russia and the iron-curtain countries, and news reels, film strips, press features, and other material are sent to nations that have a free flow of information.

The Educational Exchange Office arranges for the exchange of students, teachers, journalists, and labor leaders between the United States and other countries. This program also includes the setting up and maintaining of more than 130 free libraries in countries all over the world.

Mr. Hulten was well qualified to take over the demanding task of managing these two programs. He was graduated from the University of Wisconsin's School of Journalism in 1929 and received his master of arts degree there 2 years later. During his college course he worked as a staff member of the Wisconsin State Journal in Madison. For 4 years he worked on several other Midwestern newspapers, both as a reporter and editor.

In 1934 he joined the faculty of the University of Oregon as associate professor of journalism. It was there that he met Margaret Britts Reid, a charming young writer, and they were married in 1936. In 1939 Mr. Hulten took a leave of absence from the University of Oregon to spend a year at Stanford University as acting assistant professor of journalism.

A few months after the United States entered World War II, he was brought to Washington as a consultant to the United States Bureau of the Budget. He continued with the Budget Bureau as senior management analyst for a year and a half. Mr. Hulten then transferred to the Office of War Information, where he became Assistant Director for Management. It was there that he met Edward W. Barrett, the Assistant Director for Overseas Operations. The two men built up a sound working cooperation in those days that continues in their present close association.

After the war ended, Mr. Hulten joined the Department of State as a top executive in the information program, and the following year was appointed deputy to WILLIAM BENTON, then Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs. Mr. Hulten took over many of the operational duties of the Public Affairs program and represented Mr. BENTON on committees and in policy conferences.

A man of great force and personal magnetism, Mr. Hulten was named in February 1947 as deputy to John E. Peurifoy, Assistant Secretary of State for Administration. In that important post he was closely associated with the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). He was a United States delegate to the UNESCO general conference in Mexico City in 1947 and in Beirut in 1948. In 1948 and 1949 he was the United States representative of the UNESCO Advisory Panel on Finance and Administration in Paris.

Since he became general manager of the information and educational exchange program, Mr. Hulten has traveled in South America, Europe, and the Near East to see at first hand the field operations of his program.

Mr. Hulten, whose grandparents came to America from Sweden, was born in Athens, Wis., on June 10, 1909. He is proud of his Swedish inheritance and of being brought up in the midwestern region of the country, which he considers the heart of America. He and Mrs. Hulten live in Washington, D. C., with their 9-year-old son, Charles. Mrs. Hulten has given up her writing career and now devotes her time to her family and community activities.

Mr. Speaker, this reminds me of the way Members of Congress are asked to write up their own biography for insertion in the Congressional Directory. In all probability this profile was edited, if not actually written by Mr. Hulten. It states, and I quote:

Mr. Hulten was well qualified to take over the demanding task of managing these two programs.

Is it not strange that out of the millions of men in the United States that, and I quote again from the profile, "There was one logical person to fill the position of general manager for the program: the dynamic, square-jawed man who was then serving as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Administration—Charles M. Hulten."

I cannot help but wonder if Mr. Hulten's wide experience could be the few years he spent as a young man working for newspapers.

Again, the author of the profile of Mr. Hulten, which evidently was meant to be beamed over the ether waves of the Voice of America did not spare himself when he states:

A man of great force and personal magnetism, Mr. Hulten was named in February 1947 as deputy to John E. Peurifoy, Assistant Secretary of State for Administration.

Mr. Speaker, it is natural to assume that the people who know Mr. Hulten will be in the best position to judge who is right, Mr. ROONEY or the author of the profile. From Mr. Hulten's performance with the Voice of America I reiterate that I concur in Mr. ROONEY'S opinion that Mr. Hulten is not qualified to be general manager of this tremendous operation.

The Nation's Predicament

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDGAR A. JONAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial, entitled "The Nation's Predicament," which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald on Monday, April 9, 1951:

THE NATION'S PREDICAMENT

General MacArthur's letter to Representative JOE MARTIN has touched off a new tirade against the general in Washington and London.

Let there be no mistake about it. The American people have no quarrel with General MacArthur. They do not resent the advice he has offered and much less do they resent the fact that he has offered it.

The American people know that 9,000 American boys have been killed in the Korean War, but do not know what purpose this sacrifice is supposed to serve or how it is to be ended. They want to hear anything General MacArthur may have to say on either point and they don't care a hoot if Mr. Truman's feelings are hurt or the feelings of the British Foreign Office are hurt.

Mr. Truman, the addle-brained gift to the Nation of the Prendergast mobsters, put the United States into the Korean War without the advice of Congress and in violation of the constitutional provision that only Congress may declare war. He still doesn't know what the war is about. He doesn't know how to win it and resents the advice on this point offered by General MacArthur. Mr. Truman isn't supporting the war to the available limit, for he intends to send four divisions to Europe where there is no war instead of Korea where there is one.

Instead of heeding MacArthur, Mr. Truman leans on Acheson, the Anglo-Canadian friend of a traitor; on the Pentagon brass who have sold out for foreign decorations; on civilians whose main concern in life is gaining social recognition abroad; on international bankers and industrial profiteers.

The only hope for the country lies in Congress. We believe there is enough intelligence and devotion there to work out an honorable escape from the predicament which the addlehead has brought about. But if a majority of the Members of Congress betray their country, we are, indeed, lost.

The Editor Visits Front in Korea—Paul C. Smith Says MacArthur Can Win if He Is Given Freedom to Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention of the Members to the following newspaper account of an interview of Mr. Paul C. Smith, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, by Earnest Hoberecht of the United Press. Mr. Smith is one of California's most widely known editors, and is a gentleman whose attainments cause his carefully considered statements to be of considerable importance.

The article follows:

THE EDITOR VISITS FRONT IN KOREA—PAUL C. SMITH SAYS MACARTHUR CAN WIN IF HE IS GIVEN FREEDOM TO FIGHT

(By Earnest Hoberecht)

TOKYO, April 4.—Paul C. Smith, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, said today (Wednesday) in an interview that the United Nations forces in Korea can win the war if permitted to attack across the Yalu River into China.

"I think the present forces in Korea can win the war against the Chinese armies in Korea if they are permitted to liquidate the present military handicaps which result from those directives which prevent them from operating on the other side of the Yalu River," said Smith, who visited North Korea with Gen. Douglas MacArthur Tuesday.

Smith gave his views on the Korean situation after he returned from Korea, where he flew Tuesday with MacArthur. He jeeped 15 miles into North Korea on the east coast with the United Nations commander in chief.

WAR EXPERIENCE

In World War II, Smith served in both the Marines and the Navy. He was a commander in the Navy at the time of the Japanese surrender.

"With our forces in the Orient," he said, "all we need is freedom to conduct a sound military operation."

He explained that this means that "when and if necessary, we knock out the supply lines of the Communist sources of power in Korea by air and sea."

"This means a sea blockade of China and air attacks where required," he pointed out.

"I admit," he said, "there is a calculated risk involved with the possibility of yet another intervention by Russia, but in view of China's repeatedly stated determination to drive us from Korea, it seems to me that anything short of acceptance of that risk will just result in no net gain for the anti-Communist forces of the world.

"FREEDOM TO FIGHT

"These anti-Communist forces, of which the UN units in Korea are both the spearhead and the main body, must be given freedom to fight as sound military leadership would normally fight or they are being sent to die for a lip-service cause with their hands tied behind them."

Smith said he was deeply impressed with General MacArthur, whom he had never met previously.

"General MacArthur suffers only from two things," said Smith. He listed these as "his fair weather friends and his very petty detractors."

Smith said MacArthur suffered less at the hands of his petty detractors "because they really can't touch him much."

Smith said General MacArthur possesses one of the "greatest vocabularies that I have ever encountered."

"And," said Smith, "he impresses me as having even the greater distinction of knowing what every word means."

He expressed complete confidence in MacArthur's leadership.

He paid tribute to the field forces serving under MacArthur.

Smith said that in view of what MacArthur and his fighting men in the field have had to work with, "the American people can be grateful as hell to this leader and his men."

Smith said after studying the situation and seeing considerable background material on the situation he was convinced that there has never been at any time a retreat.

TOUGH TERRAIN

He said that sometimes the United Nations forces were outnumbered as high as 20 to 1 and had to fight their way out, but they were only fighting in a different direction, as Marine Maj. Gen. O. P. Smith had stated.

"The terrain in Korea is as rotten and rough as I have ever seen," the San Francisco editor said.

He said he was greatly impressed with the evidence of complete unification of the Armed Forces under General MacArthur. He said he had observed this at both the top level and the working level.

"The services work well together and understand each other's problems," he said. Every unit has done a hell of a job.

Smith said he "was convinced that the only thing General MacArthur needs—and which he should have fast—is clarification of the mission in Korea as well as Asia as a whole.

"If our mission is unification of Korea, then the thirty-eighth parallel is not a proper political question and it is a tactically improper military line."

Smith said, "One of the main jobs of the American people" who are 7,000 to 10,000 miles from the scene of the show-down, is to see that the outfits here, from MacArthur to the newest recruit have the whole-hearted support of the Nation and those allied with them in the United Nations.

"It is difficult for anybody to keep his eye on the enemy at the front if he has to spend most of his time and energy pulling political stilettos out of his back,' Smith said.

He said he fully understood that there are political questions which can be decided only at the highest levels in the United Nations.

He said he was convinced that this point is well understood by General MacArthur.

But he said he was not convinced that some of those in high political quarters understand the urgency of General MacArthur's position as a field commander.

"As a field commander," Smith said, "he has every right to point up the urgency of the situation and to meet the situation on the strength of his own resources when there is pussyfooting or quibbling and his overall directives are inadequate or confusing."

Smith said he has been interested here in running down some of the so-called expert criticism of General MacArthur and his staff members.

For example, he said, he had been interested in the charges that some of MacArthur's staff had been with him too long.

On the basis of his experience here, he said, he found this criticism completely invalid.

"I have been impressed with the exceptional competence of MacArthur's staff," Smith said. "This exceptional competence stems from the fact that they have been working together through thick and thin for a decade.

"Any idea that such experience and understanding within a top staff is bad rather than good is to me contrary to practical sense."

The Price of Inaction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Commonweal of April 6, 1951:

THE PRICE OF INACTION

India is thousands of miles away. Its masses are chronically poverty-stricken. The peoples of the East have ever been subject to drought, flood, and famine. That is one way some balance is maintained between powers of sustenance and population. Besides India's threatened famine is largely due to her own chauvinism, from failure to purchase surplus grain from Moslem Pakistan. And why should India be deserving of special American consideration? Have not Mr. Nehru, Sir Benegal Rau, and others opposed this country's proposals about North Korea and Communist China when the chips were down in the UN? Too many other items deserve precedence at a time when we are girding strenuously for our own self-defense.

Some such sentiments are believed to account for the failure of Congress to take action on Mr. Truman's formal request for surplus grain for India of over 6 weeks ago. Meanwhile Indian conditions have grown considerably worse. Pakistan no longer has an exportable grain surplus. Continued drought in Bihar has meant the failure of the winter crop and some forty millions there are in immediate peril. Will this in itself have any appreciable effect on men who subscribe to the sentiments outlined above—to those who would make a sharp distinction between "playing Santa Claus" and carrying on what they hold to be the only proper functions of a government, the pursuance of a policy of strictly national interest, come what may?

But in the interim other things have also been taking place. Communist China has agreed to ship in 50,000 tons of rice and more than a quarter of it has already arrived, although negotiations with China were instituted some time after American negotiations were begun on the same subject. Soviet Russia likewise has offered a barter arrangement of 50,000 tons of wheat—an agreement similar, it is true, to what was effected between the two nations last year. But no American grain, aside from that procured here by straight purchase, is en route or even in prospect at this most critical hour.

Perhaps the moment has arrived to reconsider. Leave the humanitarian argument out of it, put it all on cold-war terms. Think of our potential support in India and throughout all non-Communist Asia. How will that be affected by our refusal to avert a major famine by shipping some of our grain surpluses at the very time both Communist China and Soviet Russia are sending in grain (if in far from adequate amounts)? That puts a different complexion on the matter.

When Congress reconvenes after its Easter recess, it should consider the editorial reaction of an Indian weekly newspaper, the Naya Sabera, of Lucknow, on continued American inaction and the first grain shipments from Communist China. It is "quite clear who has genuine concern for the welfare of the Indian people." There is only one possible answer to that.

What Should Be Our International Economic Policy in a Period of Rearmament

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 6, 1951

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, on March 26 last Mr. George A. Sloan, chairman of the International Chamber of Commerce, made a splendid contribution to the subject of our international economic policy in a very able address before the Economic Club of Detroit at Detroit, Mich. Mr. Sloan, in addition to occupying the important position of chairman of this group, is a man of broad knowledge and ability. His utterances are usually worthwhile. His address before the Detroit group was no exception.

With the thought that Mr. Sloan's thinking may be of value to our people generally, and in order that it might have a broader circulation, which it deserves, I submit it herewith.

Mr. Sloan's address is as follows:

It is indeed an honor to appear before this distinguished group and to explore with you some of today's economic problems with particular reference to international trade and policy in a period of rearmament.

Looking over the list of your past speakers I find the names of many friends who have addressed you. It is with a sense of humility that I come to the Economic Club of Detroit in the footsteps of such outstanding industrial and financial leaders as Thomas J. Watson, Sr., Phil Reed, Randy Burgess, Irving Olds, Paul Hoffman, John Hancock, and Warren Lee Pierson.

The subject assigned to me is an exceedingly difficult one, too often obscured because of the constant changes in the international field from month to month. It would be presumptuous of any businessman to undertake to explain specifically where business stands or should stand in the present confused state of world conditions. And yet I have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that a sound solution of pressing economic problems, of international nature, is imperative if we are to maintain a healthy political and social America.

In the United States Council of the International Chamber of Commerce are businessmen from all walks of industrial and corporate life. For many years these businessmen, many of them colleagues of yours, have worked actively on our study groups and devoted many hours of careful thought to possible solutions to international economic problems. Often we have succeeded; other times not.

Because of frequent exchange of views with these businessmen and also with businessmen of other free nations who are actively engaged in the International Chamber of Commerce, I am willing to expose myself to you in the hope that we might clarify our mutual thinking.

The free world is faced with a grave crisis and perhaps its greatest challenge to survival. We must develop—and we have made a good beginning—the strength of the free nations to counteract the aggressive moves of communism.

A foreign economic policy, by definition, should be the true reflector of the world we live in. Let us for a moment, therefore, examine the world at midcentury.

The paramount objective of our foreign policy should be the establishment and maintenance of a just and lasting peace. It should include friendly cultural intercourse among nations as well as mutually advantageous trade among nations.

What many of us knew for many years has been brought out into the open with the invasion of Korea by the Communist hordes. But Korea has carried us nearer to facing reality: Our lives are threatened by an aggressive force that has shown its intentions to eliminate from its well-planned path of imperialistic advances the obstacle represented by the freedom of the individual.

Today, more than ever before, we Americans are called upon for an expression of national unity, for a sense of purpose, and for a decisive spirit. Unity must start at home in our foreign dealings, especially our international economic relations.

Nearly 6 years ago the United States was at its prime of strength as a world power. No one doubted this strength. Today there are doubts about our leadership and policy in many capitals of the free world, in London, in Paris, in Rome. Actually, the power of the United States has not diminished to warrant such doubts.

The Soviets have made two major gains. They have swung China into their orbit and they are said to have the atom bomb. On the other hand, the United States has made tremendous gains. Since Korea there is more of a spirit of unity. Production, economic growth have been our determining factors. Korea has awakened many of those who did not previously visualize the antagonism in the Soviet system.

The Western World, especially Western Europe, is better off today than in any period since the end of World War II. Western Europe has turned from an area disorganized by the effects of war into a smoother-flowing economic and political community. While not completely recovered from devastations and dislocations the most difficult part of the Western European reconstruction task has been achieved.

The established centers of freedom have survived. They have withstood two attacks by German militarism. Where free institutions are maintained, men have continued to make advances in material wealth, in understanding of fellow men, in science, in tolerance, and in decency.

Still, the world today has no peace. There are large masses of people—good, intelligent, industrious people—who are being led to slaughter by political leaders and are denied the right to the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The world continues to consist of the "haves" and the "have nots." You may ask, "Have or have not what?" And my answer is have or have not freedom of access to the world's raw materials (as promised in the Atlantic Charter to victor and vanquished alike); have or have not the freedom to own, to use, and to risk the mechanical means of production; have or have not the right to the just rewards of their honest labor; have or have not the right to determine and to control their own destiny as freemen; because they are denied their rightful opportunity to utilize nature's endless bounty for their own well-being and individual happiness.

Human misery in the Western World is certainly much smaller now than it was in the nineteenth century. That this was possible in spite of two world wars is sufficient answer to those who claim Western civilization is in decay. Notwithstanding the postwar poverty of Europe and the rest of the world, the West as a whole is richer in kind and in spirit than ever. But the situation in many friendly countries still presents a challenge to the United States if the spread of communism is to be held in check.

The twentieth century has witnessed the United States coming of age as a world power. "The leadership to which the United States has succeeded," said the renowned London Economist recently, "has turned out to be that not of a gloriously expanding world economy but of a half-world on the defensive, therefore imposing more in responsibilities than it provides in privileges. America has accepted these responsibilities with doubt and hesitation and now and then with inconsistencies. But on the whole," concludes the Economist, "the performance has been one * * * of remarkable foresight and energy."

The present world situation requires an expression of utmost responsibility and leadership from the United States, from American businessmen. In the past, many of us have been most reluctant to accept this responsibility. We can offer as alibi the fact that we survived the early years of our Republic only by avoiding entangling alliances. World leadership has been thrust upon us so rapidly in the last decade or so that we appear to be inexperienced and in fact we are inexperienced. When we are faced with international problems we are frequently, if not mostly, indecisive because we have few precedents on which to base our policy.

A transformation so swift as that of the last 10 years cannot be experienced by a relatively young nation without mistakes in action and without moments of doubt. It should be most reassuring to all of us who believe in the freedom of the individual that our system of democracy always induces self-doubt. The current congressional debate on foreign policy is a true indicator of this.

Surely, America's future depends on how widely and how wisely it carries out the responsibilities of leadership. The central point must be the unification of the free world in the face of aggression and threats of aggression. Each member of the free world acting alone is too weak to counteract these threats or to resist attack. Not even the United States standing alone can be powerful enough for self-defense. Acting together, the free nations by moral standards and productive achievements will bring about the currently lacking balance of power. In all these endeavors our basic aim must always remain the same: The maintenance of peace but without sacrifice of freedom.

The fear of what the next moves of the Soviets and their satellites will be is inherent in the policies and the thinking of free peoples everywhere. Hearings before congressional committees, debates before the House of Commons, discussions in the French Parliament—all are influenced by the foremost consideration of what the next moves of the Soviets may be.

With the free world in a twilight of war (which we hope will brighten rather than darken in due course by our own actions) the challenge is even greater. We have to superimpose a military economy on a civilian economy in the hope that the least amount of belt-tightening will be necessary. This situation brings with it an inflationary tendency.

Actually, the foremost enemy of the Western World, at the present, is inflation. We must stop putting fuel on the flame, while, at the same time, feebly trying to put out inflation's flame with a sprinkling can. Either we all—and I mean all—make the necessary sacrifices now to stop inflation or we will be faced later with the reality of making much bigger, if not total, sacrifices.

If you want any substantiation of this, study the inflation experiences in Germany, in China, in France, in Italy. The aftereffects of inflation in Germany helped in producing Hitler; it gave China Mao Tse-tung; to Italy Mussolini, and to France an unhappy parade of cabinets that require a score card to keep track of. But more than this, inflation destroyed confidence everywhere in these countries. And even here in America, it has and is steadily undermining the confidence of our people.

Inflation is Stalin's best ally. Next to Soviet imperialism this is the most difficult problem facing America and our friends abroad.

This then is a bird's-eye view of the world we live in. It is the setting on which we must apply our foreign economic policy.

The first question that now arises is: What should be our short-range, our immediate, international economic policy?

Development of strength at a rapid pace to offset the military power of the nations in the Soviet orbit is, I should think, objective No. 1. The plans are becoming better defined. They are being carried out by the Office of Defense Mobilization in Washington on the American level and the Defense Production Board under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Businessmen are and should be the prime policy movers of these efforts. And, industrial operations, as can be witnessed so well in Detroit, are carrying the production effort.

I am confident that rapid rearmament of the non-Soviet world will—within a short period—create superiority of political, economic, and military strength on our part. Such a state of conditions would make the Kremlin stop, look, and listen before embarking on other diversionary invasion movements. The Western World must concentrate its efforts for the next 2 or 3 years on harnessing its resources for defense.

In the process of rearmament, some distortions in production, prices, and trade already have become apparent. Resources that would otherwise be available to civil consumption and investment in the promotion of freer trade and raising standards of living have been transferred to military needs.

The businessman (wherever he lives in the free world) is committed to do all in his power to assist his country in utilizing the productive facilities for the rearmament of the Western World. In our defense efforts we will undoubtedly have to endure mental and physical strain for an indefinite period if we are to maintain our freedom and economic liberties. Without freedoms the heart will have been removed from our defense.

The free world cannot go on focusing exclusively on being strong enough to wipe out aggression before it actually occurs. At some point, whenever the Kremlin will decide, there has to come a break in the international tension. At some point the success of the free world will be measured not by self-preservation efforts, but by our ability to expand economic capacity to such an extent that we can offer to both our own people and the people in the underdeveloped areas increased standards, both material and moral, that dictatorships of any kind are in no position to provide.

In the knowledge of this important factor, it stands to reason that the free world must move forward to expand its productive facilities, its economic strength, its scientific knowledge. So we therefore come to objective No. 2:

We cannot withdraw behind a protective curtain of isolation because for many vital commodities the United States is dependent on external resources. Of the 15 basic minerals, the United States is relatively self-sufficient in only 6—coal, petroleum, iron, sulfur, phosphate, and potash. In the case of iron, various ferro-alloys must be imported before steel can be made. The automobile industry in Detroit is well aware of the fact that 100 percent of tin, chrome, and cordage fibers are imported. Ninety-two percent of our manganese and cobalt, 73 percent of tungsten, and 34 percent of our yearly requirements for lead are mined outside of the United States. Our foreign economic policy must be based on a full realization of these facts. In order to make their economies most productive, the countries of the Western World need an adequate and equitable supply of required raw materials, together with a flow of essential consumer goods.

To assure an adequate supply of strategic raw materials for all countries in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), and the other non-Soviet nations, it is necessary to have in permanent operation joint allocation boards, eliminating thereby the inflationary effects of free-market competition for scarce material. The price effects of such an uncontrolled rush for materials is imposing severe strains on the economy of some countries, including our own.

It is gratifying to know that a start in the direction of international allocation and procurement of materials is now being made. The current sessions of the raw-material commodity groups in Washington are one way of controlling this weakness. It is essential, however, that private channels be assigned, wherever possible, the responsibility to carry out this raw-material goal. Also, an international arrangement like this should be maintained only for the period of the emergency. Then it is imperative that free-market competition must be reinstituted.

There is still a puzzle as to who in Washington is responsible for our own international allocation-procurement activities. About 10 agencies and departments are in the picture, despite the fact that the first order issued by Mr. Charles E. Wilson, as Defense Mobilizer, created an interdepartmental Committee on Foreign Supplies and Requirements, under the chairmanship of ECA Administrator William C. Foster.

The United States Government should immediately clarify the raw-material situation so that there will be an end to the kind of vacuum that seems to persist in Washington. Instead of the many overlapping agencies in the field now, there should be one Government agency—possibly ECA—in sole charge of the temporary allocation and procurement of raw materials.

One of the most crying needs of the moment is the elimination of the inconsistent performance by a host of administrative agencies—some 23 of them—that have a governmental finger in the international economic pie, with resultant confusion to all concerned.

Three notable and informed sources lately have proposed that the proper exercise of our foreign economic policy demands the consolidation of all the scattered efforts within a single governmental agency. Headed by a man of outstanding ability with public acceptance, this agency should have the equivalent of Cabinet status.

First, there was the Gordon Gray report, rather outdated at this time because it was originally conceived before Korea. Then, the speeches and writings of our own United States Council executive committee member Paul Hoffman (who certainly knows this problem first-hand and can speak with feeling about administrative foul-ups in the Government). And finally, we are confronted with the recent report of Nelson Rockefeller's International Development Advisory Board. (This report, though its other recommendations require careful study before we can determine whether businessmen should endorse them is unqualifiedly correct on the demand for a single agency.)

The Hoover Commission in many other fields has pointed out the waste and inefficiency and stupid duplication of much of our administrative structure in Washington and abroad. Here, in the field of foreign economic policy, is a situation ripe for a Hoover Commission approach.

These then are some factors that make up our short-range foreign economic policy.

It behooves businessmen to look beyond this period of emergency, the period when we have reached a balance of power, with rearmament complete so that no nation would dare attack us. What will we do then, I might ask, with the resources in materials and manpower that have been increased. Will we have to cut back and expose ourselves to the fear of depression and unemployment? I think that every businessman in the United States should look ahead to that future date and ponder over the possibility of formulating a program that would assist in furthering economic growth and apply the gains made to the common good. This would enable us to minimize unemployment and to utilize the expanded resources in such a way that they will be available to more and more people.

At the forthcoming Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce, which will be held in Lisbon, Portugal, from June 10 through 16, the world business community, including the American representatives, will discuss aspects of such a program for action by the world business community. We hope that the Detroit business group will be most helpful in looking ahead along these lines when the United States Council, together with some of your outstanding groups here in Detroit, will have a meeting in your city on May 3. And of course, we sincerely hope that Detroit will be represented in Lisbon. It seems to us that these meetings provide a tremendous challenge to the businessmen to preserve a competitive enterprise system which otherwise might falter.

If the free nations of the world do not succeed in avoiding economic maladjustments—if they fail to establish an environment in which communities can advance materially and spiritually—there is always the danger that the people will be driven into communism. Only by our performance can we hope to contain the advances of communism. Take the example of the Chinese. The Chinese farmer who has accepted or even welcomed communism as relief from the misery, oppression, and corruption of his lot will learn in time that the promises of the Communists are hollow. Collectivism will soon take back the land made available to him. The cancellation of debts, which was made possible through liquidation of the money lender, will be replaced by oppressive taxes. Communism will soon become a yoke.

But communism has never yet been eliminated in any country where a Communist regime obtained power. We must act, therefore, before the cancerous growth of communism can spread.

An economic strategy for peace should certainly include a drive to reform traditional modes of production and distribution and increase sharply the productivity of men and machines. This is one way to meet threats of foreign aggression and international collapse. One of the major steps in that direction is to demonstrate the adaptability and flexibility of the American productive system to our European friends. Fortune magazine, in its February 1951 issue, made quite an essential point in this respect. "United States business is the best-qualified group in all the world for getting the American idea across to European top management. It is hardly necessary," said Fortune, "to suggest the means: there could be seminars and international conventions—organizations such as the International Chamber of Commerce are ready-made for this—trips and private exchanges of all sorts."

American capitalism—as exemplified in particular by industry in Detroit—has learned that the secret of national prosperity is to eliminate the idea that the many cannot have what the few enjoy. American capitalism of 50 years ago can hardly be recognized when compared with American capitalism of today. Unhappily, the same cannot be said for European capitalism. One of the gravest weaknesses in the armor of the Western World's economic policy is the persisting, time-worn attitude of European capitalism.

In the United States the living standards and working conditions of the average citizen have shown constant and remarkable improvement. In Europe this has not been true. There are many reasons for this, including the trend to socialism and the emphasis which European capitalism places on an outmoded cartel system. Many European businessmen dislike competition. I think there is great danger in this state of mind. We must distinguish between capitalism which works for the few and capitalism which works for the many. The trend of European capitalism has been away from a sense of responsibility to the community. I am sure the morale of people of Europe would rise if they could identify European capitalism with a positive rather than a negative policy.

Today many ardent anti-Communists abroad are suspicious of the motives of American capitalism. By explaining the true contribution of American capitalism to the world in terms of the gains of the individual working men and women here in Detroit and in other great industrial centers, I am sure we as businessmen will develop our most successful weapon against Soviet propaganda. This should be a major component of our foreign economic policy.

We must win people as well as diplomatic and military battles if we hope to stop communism. Communism has been making progress in other countries under oppression and poverty. Our long-range international economic policy must keep in mind that a removal of these conditions is an obligation. The Communists have imagination, boldness, and courage—all couched in a fanatical devotion to a cause. We can reply with far more effective boldness and courage.

It is significant that I am speaking to you on the same day that in Washington the Foreign Ministers of the 21 American Republics are opening their deliberations on, among other things, how the raw material and productive resources of the Western Hemisphere can be stepped up.

Point 3 on the agenda of the sessions is the following:

"Emergency economic cooperation: (a) Production and distribution for defense purposes; and (b) production and distribution of products in short supply and utilization of necessary services to meet requirements of the American Republics and measures to facilitate insofar as possible the carrying out of programs of economic development."

As we understand it, the Latin-American countries are asking such questions as: Can a reasonable market be guaranteed after the emergency for expanded Latin-American production? Will we (Latin Americans) be able to obtain sufficient technological know-how from the United States to expand production and increase standards of living? The question of additional American capital investment will also be on the minds of our friends from below our southern borders.

We are asking the Latin Americans to expand raw material production for the current defense program. And the Latin Americans are determined, as we understand it, to bargain for a position where the gains made during the emergency would be of benefit after the emergency is over.

As part of our long-range foreign economic policy, there should be an expansion in the investment of private companies abroad. Many American companies that have invested in subsidiaries and affiliates abroad have had satisfactory experience with the exception of transferring earnings to the United States. Naturally, we must do all in our power to convince the Government that the obstacles to foreign investments, such as double taxation, lack of convertibility, and other similar controls, be corrected so that American business will have incentives to take its dollars abroad.

Private investment going abroad is a desirable way to fortify the economies and raise the standards of living of foreign countries. It is a most effective countermove to the conditions that breed poverty and oppression. Private foreign investment would also relieve the taxpayer of the burden of providing through his government direct assistance and grants to other nations. When private capital goes abroad it brings with it American know-how and managerial skill and thus directly contributes to the welfare of the recipient nations.

But we must be realistic. Congress should provide much of the necessary encouragement by passing legislation deferring taxation of earnings on foreign activities of American companies until they are brought home. At the same time bilateral treaties must be concluded to assure the transfer of earnings to corporations in capital exporting countries and to eliminate double taxation.

You will hear more about such programs from the International Chamber of Commerce and the United States Council. Our foreign-investment committee is at work now to offer specific recommendations to governments and business looking to increased flow of capital across boundaries.

In summary, our foreign economic policy, both short range and long range, should embrace the following:

1. Establishment and maintenance of just and lasting peace as our paramount objective.

2. All-out drive to stop inflation in every part of the free world.

3. Increase of efforts to develop, procure, and allocate raw materials internationally—to be maintained for period of emergency only.

4. Development of non-Soviet world's strength at rapid rate.

5. Administration of all United States aid efforts under a single agency.

6. Enlightened and active United States world economic leadership.

7. Planning by business today beyond emergency period.

8. Fulfillment of business' role with enlightened cooperation by governments in making possible an extensive flow of foreign investment abroad.

These ideas reflect the discussions at the International Chamber of Commerce and the United States Council; they also reflect discussions with government leaders in many parts of the world.

In the past the United States has followed a short-sighted course in our foreign economic relations. We sought and rejoiced in the expansion of our foreign trade. But we were reluctant to accept the fact that it lacked a healthy balance and that it was being sustained by loans and grants that in the end would be too great a burden on foreign debtors, not to mention our own taxpayers.

We claimed repayment of war debts which prejudiced prospects of solvency of private industrial development which we ourselves were encouraging.

It is a challenge to the American business community to learn from our mistakes and to act accordingly.

We would be right in risking much on the faith that economic improvement and development, widely shared and achieved by cooperative efforts, will make it more likely that the free nations will stand together. The ultimate result would be that at some day in the future the Soviets will realize the futility of their efforts in undermining the free nations and suspend their struggle for world domination. We must be ready to work in this direction and to rise above the problems of the day and plan as business statesmen.

The Senator and the General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, the following column by Mr. Walter Lippmann, which appeared in the Washington Post this morning, merits careful scrutiny and study by every person who is interested in understanding the true issues involved in the current foreign policy debate, which is attracting such wide attention:

THE SENATOR AND THE GENERAL

(By Walter Lippmann)

Senator TAFT is talking about Korea and Formosa in a wey which sounds as if he had not understood General MacArthur.

The Senator seems to think that there are 800,000 anti-Communist Chinese troops on Formosa who—if only we permitted it and gave them arms—would march onto the transports, would sail across the Formosa Straits, would land on the mainland, would invade Red China, and take the pressure off our boys fighting in Korea.

To the Senator it is, therefore, tragic and ridiculous not to use this gigantic military asset. Here we are hard pressed in Korea; there in Formosa is a huge army, an army bigger, he thinks, than all the armies on both sides now fighting in Korea. All that this huge army lacks, he thinks, is arms and President Truman's permission to invade China and some United States naval and air assistance involving, the Senator thinks, no American infantry.

But who told Senator TAFT about this army on Formosa, and about how big it is, and about what arms it could use, and what it would take to have it invade China? Not General MacArthur in his many public pronouncements. The general has not said that Chiang and his troops on Formosa are able to decide the struggle in our favor. The general has not said, as Senator TAFT and Representative MARTIN seem to think, that if Chiang's men were helped to fight more, we would have to fight less.

What General MacArthur is arguing for is not less fighting by Americans in the Far East but much more fighting by Americans in the Far East. He wants, as he wrote to Mr. MARTIN, to "follow the conventional pattern of meeting force with maximum counterforce." He wants to wage an all-out war against China instead of the localized war he is now waging in Korea. The general does not say—and obviously he does not believe—that this would be the camparatively easy little war, fought largely with Chiang's infantry, which Senator TAFT is dreaming about. The war which the general is advocating is the great war which, he contends, would decide the world-wide conflict. He wants the third world war now and he wants to fight it in the Far East.

But what the Senator wants is not to get us deeper into a bigger war. He wants a way out of the war which is already too big for him—which, as a matter of fact, was already too big for him on the 25th of June. Because he wants less war, especially less war involving the infantry, the Senator has allowed himself to believe that Chiang's army can take over and be a substitute for our ground troops.

There is a great difference—in fact, all the difference in the world—between Senator TAFT's idea that Chiang could "take the pressure off our boys fighting in Korea" and General MacArthur's idea that this is the time and that the Far East is the place to join the issue with the Communist powers and seek a military decision.

Senator TAFT ought to know, though apparently he does not, that Chiang's policy is not to invade China in order to relieve us in Korea. Chiang's policy is to get us into a general war with China in order to make certain that he can stay in Formosa and in the hope that General MacArthur would eventually put him back into power in China.

The argument about Chiang and his army is not at all, as Senator TAFT seems to think, about whether to accept or to refuse the assistance of an important military ally. If Chiang were an important military ally, nobody in his senses would refuse his assistance. But the fact of the matter is that there is serious doubt as to whether Chiang's army could even be relied upon to hold Formosa, and I do not believe that there is a responsible military man in the world who thinks it could invade China.

The argument about Chiang is an argument about whether to enlarge the Korean War into a general war. Those who believe in a general war with China know perfectly well that if Chiang's army were able to invade China it would be only because there was an American Army in front of it.

Coordinated Recreation Program Needed by Federal Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of a letter which I have presented to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MURRAY], as chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, requesting consideration of H. R. 2766, a bill to create a Federal corporation which would provide a nearly self-supporting coordinated recreation program for Federal employees, which I introduced on February 19.

I am also including as a part of my remarks the text of the bill, in the belief that it will be of interest to hundreds of organizations.

The letter follows:

APRIL 9, 1951.

Hon. TOM MURRAY,
Chairman, House Post Office and Civil Service Committee,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: While we gather our energies to meet the threat of foreign aggression which endangers our Nation we must not lose that fight by ill-considered manpower policies at home. I recently introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the main body of an article titled "Don't Send Your Daughter to Washington." This article was based on the evidence and facts gathering dust in the files of Community Chest agencies, Federal Government offices, and elsewhere, and well on the way to being entirely forgotten. Yet if we are to avoid the disastrous mistakes of World War II we must become concerned in the present emergency with the lessons we should have learned but seem too willing to forget or ignore.

The Liberty magazine article by the able writer of the Washington Post, Sam Stavisky, points out:

"It's an ugly fact that the tremendous influx of 'G-girls' into Washington during World War II, together with wartime conditions and tensions there, combined to make Washington the Nation's No. 1 boom town for unwed mothers in 1944.

"The records of the National Office of Vital Statistics give evidence that the Nation's Capital has held on to that unenviable record ever since.

"In 1945, Washington's illegitimate babies numbered 105 out of every 1,000 live births; in 1946, there were 98 out of 1,000; in 1947, there were 94 out of 1,000. In every one of those years, Washington's illegitimacy ratio has been more than double the national average. The Federal statistics don't go beyond 1947, but the local statistics for the first half of 1950, as collected by the District of Columbia Health Department, indicate that the unmarried mother boom is hitting an all-time high.

"Even as the boom expands, approximately 100,000 more 'G-girls' will be herded into Washington—as the mobilization effort intensifies through 1951—to pound the endless rows of typewriters and to cultivate the endless columns of files in ever-burgeoning defense agencies.

"These recruits are trooping into a city short of decent housing and short of adequate recreational facilities. They are crowding into a city in which—according to a 1947 Census Bureau survey of metropolitan Washington—there are five women for every four men 14 to 44 years of age, four women to three men in the 20-to-24-age bracket. The combined shortages—housing, recreational facilities, eligible men—provide a fertile ground for giving another spurt to the boom in unwed mothers.

"The same combination of shortages was discovered in Washington by 'G-girls' of World War II, who flocked to the Nation's Capital to do their part. Poor, sometimes vile housing, insufficient recreational outlets, and desperate competition for the available men broke down the unstable girls, mentally and emotionally. Some got in trouble through unwed pregnancy; some with venereal diseases. (Oh, yes; the Nation's Capital also has a thriving boom in VD.)

"What's in store for Washington—unless corrective measures are taken—can be glimpsed in the report of the Committee on Unmarried Parenthood, District of Columbia Council of Social Agencies, made late in 1944. It read in part:

" 'Individual agencies all reported an increase in the number of unmarried mothers coming to them, particularly the young pregnant girl. One agency which had in 1938 accepted for care 16 unmarried mothers and pregnant girls in 1943 accepted 128. * * * This increase does not allow for those cases which might have been accepted if there had been adequate staff and facilities to meet all requests.

" 'Most agencies have been experiencing an increase in applications among unmarried mothers who are new settlers in the community, many of these being young Government employees who plan to resume work in the District of Columbia after the birth of their babies and prefer not to return to the place of their legal residence.'

"The report pointed out that the local agencies, already overburdened with the requests for help from legally resident unwed mothers, were generally unable to assume responsibility for the newcomers. As a result, some of the unwed mothers had to be thrust, along with their illegitimate offspring, back into the community from which they came—and into social ostracism. Because of the legal red tape, lack of funds by the municipal government, indifference, and apathy of the Federal Government, the nonresident unmarried mother—the report observed—'is frequently cut adrift from all normal human relationships through which she might receive help. * * *'

"The situation hasn't changed much since that report was read. The municipal and local community chest agencies are still understaffed, overworked, and lacking in funds. And Uncle Sam is still pretty much indifferent to the problem.

"Along with illegitimacy, the venereal disease rate also boomed during the war and postwar years in Washington. By 1948, VD was claiming six times as many victims in the District of Columbia as in 1941, with 13,000 cases reported, and 25,000 more cases unreported but suspected by health officials. By 1948, Washington's gonorrhea rate was five and one-half times the national average, with three to four times the number of cases than in cities of comparable population—such as Baltimore, Cleveland, and St. Louis.

"Back in 1941 the local health department reported that 93 percent of the VD infected soldiers at Fort Belvoir, Va., and 43 percent of the infected draftees at Fort Meade, Md., blamed Washington girls for their trouble.

"Two years later—in 1943—Washington was accused by the Army of infecting twice as many soldiers with VD as any other city.

"Now who do you suppose was blamed for this situation? Streetwalkers? Camp followers? Prostitutes? Not at all. Washington police did a commendable job in cleaning up and eliminating the Capital's bawdy houses.

"But the police found themselves helpless in attempting to cope with the 'victory girls,' with the 'cuddle bunnies.'

"Efforts at controlling the amateur boom in illicit sexual relations made little headway. In 1945, the last year of the war, more than 65 percent of GI's infected with VD could blame their disease on 'amateur' carriers. Twenty-four cases of GI gonorrhea were traced to one 'nice' girl, whose promiscuity made her as dangerous to our troops as a full battalion of enemy soldiers on the front line.

"The Washington Federation of Churches investigated the problem during the war and came up with the conclusion that 80 percent of infections among GI's were attributable to the young, 'innocent' type of girl. The local Criminal Justice Association found that the sharp increase in juvenile delinquency was due to the 'uniform-happy' girls who feel they can't say no to a soldier.

"Several times during the Second World War, congressional committees took a hurried glance into the shameful conditions but did little or nothing about it. Testimony before these committees, however, demonstrated that Uncle Sam was largely to blame.

"Testimony before congressional committees, presented by Dr. Winfred Overholser, Superintendent of famed St. Elizabeths mental hospital, made it clear that Uncle Sam's indiscriminate hiring program during World War II brought hundreds of mentally and emotionally unstable girls into Washington at a time when the economic and social tensions were at their worst.

" 'Too many of the girls brought here were young adolescents not very well adjusted, who found the excitement of wartime Washington conducive to recklessness,' observes Miss Patricia Morse, license officer of the District Public Welfare Department.

"Instead of glamour, the girls discovered Washington was a place where the abnormally high cost of living nullified what looked to them like high salaries. Decent quarters were hard to obtain and even poor quarters were expensive. The files of the Community Chest agencies and municipal welfare units abound with instances of a half dozen or more Government girls being jammed into a single cellar or attic room at $25 or more a month for each girl. * * *

"Of course, it is true that good housing, adequate recreational facilities, and the opportunity to meet single men won't stop girls from getting into trouble. But as Capt Rhoda Milliken, of the Women's Bureau, points out, these three things will help prevent a number of individual tradegies. * * *

"Recently, Ray Everett, of the Social Hygiene Society, issued a strong statement warning the Federal agencies that their recruiting drives were duplicating the ballyhoo and repeating the take-one, take-all mistakes of World War II. 'There were too many needless home-front casualties,' he said."

This is part of the Liberty magazine article which I introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Now the District of Columbia Armed Services Hospitality Committee, whose seventy-odd members are appointed by the District's Commissioners, has recently, as a result of the facts set forth in this article, set up a subcommittee "to foster recreation activities for women in uniform, young Government employees, and wives of service personnel." But is this enough? Do the District Commissioners fully meet their responsibilities by the appointment of a public committee which has no funds? Will this new committee be able to adequately meet a situation that the Community Chest, the District Public Welfare Department, the churches, and other agencies of Washington's municipal government was unable to meet during World War II, and afterward?

What does the Federal Government propose to do about this problem? Will it continue to evade its responsibilities during this national emergency as it did all through World War II?

I for one am not content to wait for the next thrilling installment, while the Government recruiting drive suffers from the Capital's reputation for evil.

On February 19 I introduced in the Eighty-second Congress H. R. 2766, a bill to create a Federal corporation for an organized recreation program for Federal employees with special attention to metropolitan areas. The same or similar bills were introduced at the same time by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RHODES], and in the Senate by Senators LANGER, MURRAY, DOUGLAS, and MORSE.

It took little persuasion to convince me of the merit—nay, the necessity—of such legislation. Not even the busy day of a Member of Congress is impervious to the parade of human tragedies running through the daily newspapers of Washington, and of other large cities with heavy concentrations of Federal employees, such as my own city of New York.

So far as I am concerned, I believe I am fully aware of the valid criticisms of such a program, and in the balance I find the arguments in its favor far, far outweigh those against.

The bill which I have introduced, H. R. 2766, has been referred to the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service of which you are chairman. In deference to you and to my other friends on the committee I wish to explain that the bill I have introduced is, as far as I am concerned, little more than a legislative draft. It may well be that any bill reported by the committee will be much changed in language.

However, I am convinced that the fundamental idea is sound, and that the time is long overdue for the Congress and the Federal Government to recognize its responsibilities as an employer of young people whom it is recruiting from all over the Nation, and its responsibilities to their families.

The National Industrial Conference Board, a management-research agency, in its study, Employee Recreation Activities—Studies in Personnel Policy No. 102, has made a definitive report on the welfare and recreation policies of some 250 of America's major industries and shown that they invest up to a median annual expenditure per employee of $10, with a median annual total expenditure for recreation per employee (company and employee contributions and payments from other sources) of $14.60. These companies know that such programs pay off in increased loyalty, efficiency, morale, and health terms for their employees. My bill, which is before your committee, is based on the experience of American industry over the past 50 years or more.

The bill is in a very real sense a wartime measure. There is no reason, however, why the program, once established, could not continue on in peacetime after the termination of the national emergency, since Federal employees will contribute half of its funds probably.

I urge you, therefore, to request reports on my bill from the appropriate Federal departments and agencies, and that you grant hearings on it as soon as these reports are in, with leading representatives of industrial recreation programs invited to testify, as well as spokesmen for social welfare, social hygiene, mental health, and other interested agencies.

Respectfully,

ARTHUR G. KLEIN,
Member of Congress, Ninetcenth District, New York.

H. R. 2766

A bill to create a Federal corporation to improve the efficiency, morale, health, and general welfare of Federal employees, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That, in order to establish and maintain a recreation program among Federal employees for the improvement of their efficiency, morale, health, and general welfare, and to establish and maintain in the District of Columbia and in other areas of substantial Federal employment, recreation centers primarily for the service and benefit of employees of the Government, there is hereby created as an agency and instrumentality of the United States a body corporate, to be known as the Federal Employees' Recreation Corporation, hereinafter referred to as the "Corporation." In its capacity as sole owner of the Corporation, the United States shall be represented by the President, or the head of such Government agency as may be designated by him, hereinafter referred to as the "supervisory official."

SEC. 2. The Corporation shall have its principal office in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. The management of the Corporation shall be vested in a board of 25 directors who shall be appointed by the supervisory official. Nineteen of these directors shall be selected from the several departments and agencies of the Federal Government, not more than one being selected from any one department or agency. The remaining six directors shall be selected from nominees designated by national labor organizations with which associations of Federal Government employees are affiliated, not more than two being selected from nominees designated by any one labor organization. One director shall be designated by the supervisory official as chairman of the board. The board shall meet at least quarterly. Directors shall serve without pay, but shall receive their actual and necessary travel and other expenses in connection with their attendance at directors' meetings without regard to the Travel Expense Act of 1949 or the Standardized Government Travel Regulations. A majority of the directors shall constitute a quorum of the board, and action shall be taken only by a majority vote of those present. The board shall confine itself to over-all policy making, directive, and general supervisory functions. Directors shall serve for a term of 1 year.

SEC. 4. The Corporation shall be administered by and under the direction of a President to be appointed by the board of directors and responsible to such board in the discharge of the duties of his office.

SEC. 5. To the extent necessary to enable it to carry out the authority conferred upon it by this act the Corporation shall have the following powers:

(a) To have succession until dissolved by act of Congress.

(b) To adopt, amend, and repeal bylaws governing the conduct of its general business, and the performance of the powers and duties granted to or imposed upon it by law.

(c) To adopt, alter, and use a seal which shall be judicially noticed.

(d) To sue and be sued in its corporate name.

(e) To determine the character of and necessity for its obligations and expenditures and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, subject to laws specifically applicable to Government corporations.

(f) To acquire, in any lawful manner, any property—real, personal, mixed—tangible or intangible; to hold, maintain, use, and operate the same; and to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the same.

(g) To appoint and prescribe the duties of such officers, attorneys, agents, and employees as may be necessary to carry out its functions, to fix and pay such compensation to them for their services as the Corporation may determine, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended.

(h) To enter into contracts and to execute all instruments necessary or appropriate consistent with the powers and duties granted to or imposed upon it by law.

(i) To use the United States mails in the same manner and under the same conditions as the executive departments of the Federal Government.

(j) To accept gifts or donations of services, or of property—real, personal, or mixed—tangible or intangible, in aid of any of the purposes herein authorized.

(k) To take such action as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the powers herein specifically conferred upon it.

SEC. 6. In fulfillment of its objects, the Corporation is authorized—

(a) to organize and sponsor recreation programs for all employees of the Government, including theatrical and musical productions, drama groups and little-theater activities, choruses, symphony orchestras, bands, ballet, all performing arts, visual arts, lectures, folk arts, and handicrafts, including folk dancing, athletics of all kinds, including outdoor and indoor sports, travel tours, swimming, vacationing, and all other forms of accepted recreational activities;

(b) to arrange for and secure the fullest use of all public land, including Federal park land, for such activities;

(c) to arrange for and secure the participation of all Federal Government employees who are competent as teachers or interested as employees in participating in such activities;

(d) to arrange for and secure the use of any Government buildings suitable for any of such activities;

(e) to lease or build and maintain buildings and other facilities in the District of Columbia and in other areas of substantial Federal employment for use in carrying on such activities, including, as appropriate dining facilities, lodging for transients, lounge facilities, reading rooms, space for social functions and amusements, libraries, and auditoriums;

(f) to organize a National Advisory Committee of outstanding national leaders in such activities. The National Advisory Committee and the individual members thereof shall advise the board of directors in planning, judging, and setting standards of performance, and assist in such other ways as will generally serve to advance the purposes of this act.

SEC. 7. In carrying out the provisions of this act the Corporation shall authorize the establishment of reasonable charges wherever practicable, the proceeds therefrom to be utilized in defraying the general expenses of the Corporation.

SEC. 8. The Corporation shall pay the cost of all services, supplies, utilities, maintenance, and repairs furnished or performed by any Government agency for the benefit of the Corporation, but shall not be required to pay rent on space occupied by it for any purpose in any Government building, public park, or other public land.

SEC. 9. The Corporation, including its franchise, capital, reserves and surplus, and its income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.

SEC. 10. As used in this act, the terms "Government building" and "public land" mean any building or portion thereof or any land (including improvements thereon) owned or controlled by the United States or any agency thereof, but do not include the Capitol or the Senate or House Office Buildings.

SEC. 11. Section 101 of the Government Corporation Control Act is amended by inserting after "Panama Railroad Company" a semicolon and the following: "Federal Employees' Recreation Corporation."

SEC. 12. Such sums as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this act are hereby authorized to be appropriated.

SEC. 13. This act shall become effective 60 days after the date of its enactment.

SEC. 14. This act may be cited as the "Federal Employees' Recreation Act."

"National Calamity Would Ensue Were We To Reach the Peak of Our Productivity and Find Ourselves Financially a Broken Nation; Because of This Fact We Must Successfully Combat Inflation in Order To Become the Mightiest of All Nations."—Charles E. Wilson

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is time for this body to ascertain and with definite certainty the actual conditions that face this country not alone with respect to our foreign problems but with the problems that confront us right here on our home front.

The existent war situation has now forced new shortages of materials and new controls upon wages, labor, prices, and other segments of our economy, to the end that it becomes difficult to assess day by day what particular business or enterprise will next be adversely affected in this fight to control inflation and keep our arms production booming.

Americans everywhere feel secure in knowing that there is no man with greater capabilities to handle the stupendous job than Mr. Charles E. Wilson, whom the President recently called to Washington to take over the colossal task of running the Office of Defense Mobilization.

Mr. Speaker, already the Nation has been made immeasurably safer against aggression due to the leadership of Mr. Charles Wilson—and that much has been accomplished with respect to the stabilization program is even now reflected in the suspension of increased tax rates—in credits, savings, prices, wages, and rents.

Mr. Speaker, I intend within a short time to address the House and recite in detail the wonderful accomplishments that have been already thus far effected through the Office of the Defense Mobilization, but I now want to direct the attention of my colleagues to an interview with the Director of Defense Mobilization, as carried in the United States News and World Report.

I can think of no other man in these United States who could have boiled down into so few words every fundamental and economic facet of our economy as well as did our good friend, Charlie Wilson; and it is because of the fact that this interview in the United States News and World Report is so terse, short, factual, and informative that I ask the unanimous consent to spread it, black on white, on the records of this day's proceedings, in order that businessmen everywhere may learn how well the affairs of this Nation are being cared for under the capable leadership of one of America's greatest business executives.

Interview in the United States News and World Report with the Honorable Charles E. Wilson reads as follows:

WE'LL BE MIGHTY WITHIN 3 YEARS—AN INTERVIEW WITH CHARLES E. WILSON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION

(EDITOR'S NOTE: New controls and new shortages have been forced by the war situation now facing United States. What can manufacturers, businessmen, workers, and consumers expect in the months ahead? Who will be affected next as regulation follows regulation in the fight to control inflation and keep arms production booming?

(To answer these questions, United States News and World Report invited to its conference rooms the man who knows most about the defense effort, Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization. The interview follows.)

Question. Do you look upon this program, Mr. Wilson, with any feeling that it will last 1 year, 2 years, 5 years? Are you planning for this emergency period with a definite duration in mind?

Answer. We hope it will be short but intend to achieve great potential military strength over about a 3-year period.

Question. You mean that within that 3-year period the bulk of your organization of the defense effort will have been completed?

Answer. Not only the organizational phase of it, but I believe that over that 3-year period our production of defense material and building of Armed Forces will have brought our country both to a point of real military strength and to an even greater military potential.

Question. Do you believe that the civilian needs and the military needs will tend to complement one another in about 3 years?

Answer. Our belief is that if we can go on with a civilian production of approximately $275,000,000,000 income figure, and superimpose on that a defense-material production of about $50,000,000,000, at the end of calendar 1951, we ought to be able to take care of our military requirements and the training of our vastly increased Army, Navy, and Air Force. We should also have considerable equipment for fighting a considerably greater engagement than we now have in Korea, if an enemy should make it necessary.

In 1952, if we can get approximately $50,000,000,000 worth of defense material produced, we think we would be in a position at the end of that year to fight a pretty substantial war with materials in existence. And, God willing, if there is no all-out war, at the end of the third year it seems to us that we will have a really mighty array of weapons ready, and facilities available to increase military production very rapidly, if necessary.

Question. When do you look for the peak of this current program to be reached?

Answer. In the third year. By that time it is our belief that we would be able to fight an all-out war from the production lines of the country.

Question. Can we assume that your program is based upon stockpiling immediately the things that you would use in war and also on the building up of plant capacity?

Answer. We are building plant capacity. It is not only for weapons. We are increasing plant capacity for those items of raw materials, steel, aluminum, and so on, that are in scarce supply now. About the only reason we have to cut back civilian production is because we just can't afford the full use of those items for civilian production and meet our requirements of defense material at the same time.

But in the third year, as the program of steel expansion and aluminum expansion and other items come through, we ought to be able actually to expand our output of civilian goods and, at the same time, meet our requirements of defense material.

Question. If international tension eases, do you think it will have an impact on your program?

Answer. It hasn't to date because I don't think it has caused the legislators to refuse needed appropriations to go ahead with the very large programs. Of course, if the world tensions eased tremendously, the problem would be different. It would depend on how much they eased, and how much people believe tension had really eased.

Question. Do you think there will be run-away inflation?

Answer. No. I don't think there will be run-away inflation. I think it is one of the most serious enemies we have, however. It is one that we've got to combat if we're going to become mighty. America must be mighty. It would be a terrible price to pay, however, if when we reached that mighty position we were a broken nation financially.

Question. Do you feel yourself getting hold of inflation?

Answer. After all, remember I've been here 3 months. I think my associates have made some progress and I think there is need for a great deal more progress. We're going to give it everything we have.

Question. In all fields—in finance and direct controls?

Answer. Absolutely. We've been criticized a great deal, you know, for inadequacy of our efforts at price control and wage control, so far. I have no doubt we deserved the criticism. At least we've established some ceilings. The situation leaves room for lots of improvement. We've begun to establish controls of various kinds. All in all, I think there are some signs of progress.

Question. There are lots of complaints that goods aren't flowing as rapidly as they might—but industry hasn't had orders very long, has it?

Answer. That's right. But that will come.

RISING OUTPUT IN 3-YEAR PERIOD

Question. On the matter of armament production, do you visualize a gradual rise over a 3-year period, or hitting a $50,000,000,000 plateau and staying there for 3 years?

Answer. Production of defense goods will go up on a rising scale for the 3-year period. Suppose we place orders at the rate of forty-some-billion dollars this year. Goods won't come off the production line at that rate this year. Next year production will rise much more rapidly, and in the third year it will be coming out at the rate of $50,000,000,000 or more.

Question. And then do you expect weapons production to fall off, or will that rise?

Answer. I don't know what the world condition will be. Our policy depends on the world tensions. It depends on whether we obsolete the things we are making this year, and you know how fast we obsolete, especially big airplanes. In the last war, before we got the last runs of them they were obsolete or we thought they were. So things go in America.

Question. The armament business, then, is going to be a large business for some time to come, isn't it?

Answer. My guess is that it will continue for quite a while.

Question. Are controls here to stay?

Answer. I will say this—one of the real jobs we have this year is to keep our economy in balance. That is, to keep a proper balance between plant expansion for future raw-material production and future weapons production on the one hand, and the output of end items this year on the other. If we were willing to forego all plant expansion, we could increase the end-item production this year. We are striving for proper balance.

CAPACITY: DOUBLE 1940

Question. There has been a tremendous increase in plant capacity in the last 5 years since the war, hasn't there?

Answer. Yes, there has been. It has been variously estimated, but in some categories I believe it is a 100-percent increase over our production capacity of 1940. It has been 50 percent in many categories since the end of World War II.

Question. Has that been accomplished by many companies through a plowing back of their profits?

Answer. Plowing back their profits, greatly expanding their plants and improving their existing facilities.

Question. And a new expansion program is under way now?

Answer. That's right. The one under way now is running into many billions of dollars.

Question. Do you have any estimate about how many billions?

Answer. No. I know what the figure is of Government loans and Government amortization. Somebody contrasted it with the iceberg—only about one-eighth shows and the other seven-eights is under water. That's a good deal like the situation with regard to the expansion of plants by private organizations. They have been spending a great deal of money on expansion, and not many people seem to know about it.

Question. What will happen when we are able to meet the military needs and the civilian needs? Will we get a terrific depression at that time?

Answer. Well, we certainly won't get the kind of depression or set-back we would have gotten had we tried to meet this defense-material production problem by going straight up in, let's say, 2 years. You would have had terrific dislocation. I hate to think what would have happened to us.

Question. Have you a fixed understanding as to the size of the military budget for the next 3 years?

Answer. We have an understanding with the military that if we can go through with approximately $50,000,000,000 a year for the next 3 years for defense materials——

Question. That $50,000,000,000 is on material alone, not on services?

Answer. That's on the soft and hard goods for the military. If we do that, we will meet their requirements. We have fully approved the military program.

Question. How is industry adjusting itself to this situation as you see the picture?

Answer. I think it is adjusting itself very well. The Defense Department has actually contracted with industry in the last 2 months over $10,000,000,000 and industry has absorbed it very well.

Question. Do you think many industries will be able to do what you said in your speech the automobile industry was going to do, that is, put out a 1948-size production and still fill your defense orders in 1951?

Answer. Raw material is the only limiting factor that I know of now.

Question. Because the capacity exists, apparently, to do the military job and still give us what we got in 1948—only 3 years ago?

Answer. The capacity is unlimited. That's what we really have—capacity unlimited.

Question. Seems to be a terrific country——

Answer. It's wonderful—and I believe the country can absorb the impact of defense cost.

Question. What about raw materials?

Answer. Of course, that is one of our difficulties at the moment. In steel and aluminum we are hoping to meet the shortages with a greatly expanded program already agreed to. But we have other problems. Copper offers some problems in getting enough, but I think we can do it.

SOLVING LABOR SHORTAGE

Question. Are you going to have enough workers for these great productive machines? Isn't there going to be a shortage of manpower?

Answer. There may be. We haven't the unemployed that we had at the beginnnig of the last war to draw on. I don't think we will need as many workers for defense work as we needed before.

Question. You will have a drain from the military, too, on workers, won't you?

Answer. Yes; but women will take defense jobs, and, of course, there are a million new workers becoming of working age every year. We are working only 40 hours a week now, and we can work overtime. After all, a 44-hour week would give us 10 percent more hours. Ten percent more production would be quite a little on a $300,000,000,000 annual output. It would be $30,000,000,000 of the fifty billion of defense goods right there alone.

Question. Are we going to get any unemployment in this interim?

Answer. It hasn't shown up. I think that shows what a good job Bill Harrison and his group in the National Production Authority have done. While there have been curtailments in use of material, yet defense-material production to beginning to pick up any slack that may come about as nondefense production may decline. I think there will be more dislocations. I am quite sure there will be, especially as we cut back the automotive industry, as one illustration. I think we are bound to get dislocations of labor and of other groups, which are unpleasant to contemplate.

Question. Will it last long?

Answer. No; I don't believe it will. Many of the new jobs are opening up. For example, the automotive industry is pretty fast at lining up the new productive facilities and they'll swing the workers over pretty quickly. I don't think we are facing very serious dislocations of labor there.

Question. Are civilians going to face very much cut-back on what they can have?

Answer. We have cut back raw materials to automobile and refrigerator manufacturers, as one instance. I think by the third quarter there may be a 20-percent reduction in certain consumer goods. But that's from a very, very high level.

Question. Are you contemplating, when you begin these cuts, any such thing as rationing?

Answer. We may have to come to it in some places and under certain conditions. But so far our plans don't contemplate rationing.

RATIONING MAY NOT BE NECESSARY

Question. Then you're depending upon our privately operated distribution system to do its own allocating of what's left after the Government takes its share?

Answer. That's right. And I think the reason that that is sound is that, if we can keep the civilian economy at something like $275,000,000,000, rationing may not be necessary.

Question. But some form of controlled materials plan may be necessary?

Answer. We will undoubtedly have a controlled materials plan in operation by the middle of the year.

Question. To what will that apply?

Answer. We know now that it will have to apply to steel, aluminum, and copper. Those are the principal commodities. There are many other shortages, however—cobalt, nickel, other metals. But it's a strange thing how industry works out. It finds a way to eliminate the need for some of those scarce materials. Take the electronics industry. They have very adroitly, I think, minimized the use of scarce materials—cobalt, for example.

Question. Could you give us some estimate of when the supply of consumer durables is likely to loosen up again?

Answer. Well, it is pretty loose now. It's going to get a little tighter.

Question. It is getting tighter now, but when is it going to start the other way?

Answer. Oh, it will be well over a year—I would say at least 18 months from now.

Question. Sometime during the latter part of 1952?

Answer. Yes, somewhere in there.

Question. Would we begin to get more new cars?

Answer. Yes; we may be down considerably by that time from our current high production rate—perhaps 30 or 40 percent down.

Question. But even that's not a very low rate for producing automobiles, is it?

Answer. No; if you stop to think, it's more than we produced in 1948—or about what we produced in 1948—and that wasn't too bad. We got along. When you see the roads and the parking lots jammed with shiny new cars—I think maybe we can stand a slowing down.

NEED FOR MANPOWER COMMITTEE

Question. What is there to the reports that come bobbing up every now and then about some plan or idea of conscripting labor—what is there to that?

Answer. I don't know what there is to it. All I would say is that there is absolutely no substance to it. I know of no one—and I mean no one—in the Office of Defense Mobilization who has ever for a moment considered the necessity of conscription of labor in this situation.

Question. You've never thought of the situation in manpower being that tight?

Answer. That's right. How silly it would be with defense production only about 20 percent of our total requirements to think of conscription of labor.

Question. Will you have some drain, however, through the draft on key executives and key people, skilled workers?

Answer. We will have, I'm sure.

Question. How are you going to deal with that problem?

Answer. It's one of the reasons that we have a manpower committee that will have to deal with those problems. We have established a committee with representatives of the Departments of Defense and Commerce and Agriculture and Labor and headed by a man from our own office, Arthur Flemming.

Question. Do you think you will need manpower controls—such as those we had during World War II?

Answer. If we have an all-out war.

Question. But in this 3-year period?

Answer. I am hoping we will not need compulsory manpower controls.

NEUTRAL BODY FOR LABOR CONTROL

Question. Do you visualize the selection and allocation of manpower as a job that has to be done by so-called neutrals who are not identified with the various contending groups?

Answer. I don't think you can use for that purpose any agency that is at the same time a claimant for manpower. It can't be a claimant and a judge. The Labor Department, for instance, is a claimant. It operates the United States Employment Service as one of its many jobs.

Question. Isn't that true of Agriculture, which will want to keep men on the farms?

Answer. That's right, and that's why we've got to come to a neutral body. At least, that's my belief.

Question. The Labor Department would, however, continue its present operations?

Answer. There would be no change in its operations at all. This is only policy making and the laying down of fundamental principles. That's all—no changes in administrative responsibilities.

Question. No directives—nothing to get excited about?

Answer. I think not. The Manpower Policy Committee is a policy-making group. I don't anticipate any difficulty in getting unanimous decisions from its members. Incidentally, they would also deal with the problem of colleges—whether boys with 3 years behind them, say, should be taken out immediately—all that sort of thing.

Question. Would the Labor Department still be in charge of getting manpower for industrial plants?

Answer. Absolutely—no function they now have would be taken away at all. None whatever.

Question. Isn't that the phase that the unions are worried about?

Answer. I said that in my interview in Florida and I've been criticized for saying it. They say that isn't what's bothering them at all. We had had meetings with labor officials and I listened to a great many speeches on that subject. I thought from what they said that it was worrying them.

Question. What is worrying them?

Answer. There are a lot of things worrying them, of course. The decisions we made on wage ceilings, as an example.

Question. They were generous, weren't they?

Answer. That's a matter of opinion, I'm afraid.

Question. What were the other things?

Answer. Well, they think that the price control hasn't been as effective as it should be. And I guess we have to admit that—it's far from perfect. But I don't know whether you could expect to get it working perfectly in such a short time. I think it will take a little longer, and we will need understanding and cooperation.

WAGE LEVELS VERSUS LIVING COSTS

Question. It's a question of which comes first—the chicken or the egg, isn't it?

Answer. That's right. This business of stemming inflation, I am beginning to find out, has many, many facets to it. Here we are sitting as a Nation now with greatly increased wage levels. Then we have numerous labor contracts, the cost of living, the improvement factor, the incentive factor—really what is being asked over all, is the sixth wage-increase round—at the moment when all are being asked to make sacrifices. I don't think there is any question about it. Now that inevitably would make the cost of living go up.

Question. A vicious circle?

Answer. Yes—because wage increases affect parity prices and drive up the cost of food. Therefore, the cost of living goes up again, and then the cost-of-living allowance in wages goes up again, so "round and round she goes and where she stops, nobody knows."

Question. Aren't you really describing the difficulties democracy has with a planned economy?

Answer. Of course.

Question. In your set-up, are you trying to work out your problems with different economic groups? For example, are you looking at this picture as necessitating cooperation with agriculture, with transportation, with business, and with labor?

Answer. That's right.

Question. And do you see these various economic groups as cooperating in your future program?

Answer. I'm certainly hoping they will. And as a matter of fact, I'm going one step further with it. In addition to having the advisory committee of labor, I'm hoping shortly to establish an agricultural group to advise on the problems of defense mobilization. And, of course, a similar group of businessmen, to go the next step. As great questions arise—maybe controversial questions—where what is done for one group has considerable impact on the other groups, I hope to bring them all together and consider the problem over all.

Question. Some sort of over-all advisory group?

Answer. That's right. I just don't believe that you can settle separately some of these questions with respect to inflation and wage control. You can't settle the wage-control problem unless at the same time you look at the impact of that settlement on, say, parity prices in agriculture.

HOW BUSINESSMEN COOPERATE

Question. Where are you going to get the personnel for those advisory commissions, and so on? Are they to be people who are going to detach themselves from their businesses and their vocations?

Answer. No. The advisory groups will remain in their own businesses, but give us such counsel as we need.

Question. But in the top-level group such as your own will you have people devoting their time wholly to Government?

Answer. Oh, yes.

Question. That's in the Government service?

Answer. That's right.

Question. Do you think people in that category should divorce themselves from their businesses while on the job for the Government?

Answer. I think so; certainly while actually on the job.

Question. You've done that yourself?

Answer. I have. I quit industry completely this time, as I did in 1942.

Question. Are you going back this time?

Answer. I think not.

Question. Devote yourself to public service, perhaps?

Answer. I don't know. I don't know whether I should live so long as to even think about it, the way things are going.

Question. Haven't you been under a good deal of a strain?

Answer. Slightly.

Question. Did you have a nice time in Key West?

Answer. Yes, I had a nice day in Key West with the President. I spent about 3 hours down there. It was the first time I had been down there in years. When I went down there before it was for fishing. This time I wasn't fishing for anything. But I spent a good deal of time with the President going over the program.

Question. Did you get the green light?

Answer. Oh, yes. Especially on this debt-control business that I have been working on.

Question. What do you mean by debt control?

Answer. Interest rate, credit control.

Question. What do you see in the way of any revision, or perhaps suspension, of our current laws during this period of emergency? Do you see any need for suspending or revising the antitrust laws or Taft-Hartley law?

Answer. No, I don't. I know of no good reason to do it.

Question. Do you think we need a no-strike pledge from labor now? Are we having any trouble with strikes?

Answer. We have had some serious trouble in the woolen industry. It's a very, very serious thing. We have been unable to get the woolens that we need for the uniforms.

Question. Would a no-strike pledge help that kind of situation?

Answer. Yes, I think a no-strike pledge—if you could get it—would help.

Question. Is there any talk about asking for a no-strike pledge in connection with a labor disputes board?

Answer. If we have a disputes board that will probably be one of the considerations. But we haven't decided on a disputes board.

Question. We've seen in the papers a good deal about the complaints made by labor. Have you received any complaints from other groups? For instance, has business felt that sometimes you weren't doing what they wanted done, too?

Answer. Oh, yes. To some degree on amortization of new plants.

Question. Distribution of materials?

Answer. Yes—cutting them back—but mainly on the amortization program. I just don't happen to believe in complete amortization of plants at taxpayers' expense.

Question. So you've had some differences with industry on that?

Answer. Oh, yes.

Question. They haven't, however, made vocal their complaints, perhaps, have they?

Answer. No, they haven't been as vitriolic about it and they haven't gone on the radio about it every night as some groups are doing.

DEFENSE ROLE OF INDUSTRY LEADERS

Question. What is your thought as to the comment which has been made that big business is really in control of the defense program?

Answer. Of course that has been aired. I haven't seen any sign of it. I'm the fellow who has been shot at principally on it. I might say that I feel that my associates need no defense because I've never seen any sign of prejudice on their part. You know, I've been perfectly amazed at the way men from big business, medium business, any kind of business, come into the organization. They just become Government employees without any regard for their former status. And, as far as hours of work is concerned, usually I leave the office at 7:30 or 8 o'clock, and when I go down the halls there are those men at their desks—and their secretaries. That's one of the eye-openers to me—everybody working until all hours. It amazes me that men will come in from their normal vocations and undertake conscientiously work of this kind and then find themselves damned for being big business. Patriotism cuts across all economic lines. I believe that.

Question. Do you think that, when these men take positions as representatives of the Government of the United States, they feel a sense of responsibility to the Government rather than to any other interest?

Answer. I do. The only reason that most of them are down here is that when the President said we were in a very, very severe crisis, they believed him. They're willing to sacrifice themselves and their jobs. They entirely forget their own interests. I've never seen any sign of class partisanship among my associates at all.

TRUST BUSTER TO BUREAUCRAT

Question. In choosing your lieutenants, you haven't selected them entirely from "big-business," have you? Isn't your general counsel, Herbert Bergson, the former trust buster of the Department of Justice?

Answer. That's right. The very fellow who has just prosecuted me in any number of cases.

Question. And you made him your general counsel?

Answer. Sure, because I knew he was able to forget the past and just become a Government employee as I was. I quit the General Electric Co. and became a bureaucrat, and I had no doubt that he would be able to do the same thing—meanwhile, he had gone into private law practice. He has been a wonderful adjunct to our office.

Question. If you should succeed with this program of getting this enormous output in 3 years, and if you do it by voluntary means, will it not be a rather exceptional feat? Is not this the first time such a program has been attempted in this country in what you might call a near-war period?

Answer. Yes. It will be a huge production. I believe that voluntary means is the only way we can achieve it.

Question. We have heard much talk about whether you can justify 120,000,000 tons of steel or near that in anything but a war period. What's going to happen afterward?

Answer. That's a question that doesn't bother me one bit. If you believe that this is a mature economy and that we are going to have 18,000,000 more tons of steel to use in a static civilian economy, you've got something to worry about. But I don't believe it's a mature economy. I think we're still in the pioneering stage in the United States. I think that 10 years from now, if we have peace—and God knows I hope we have it—you will be talking about more production, not less, for the civilian economy.

Question. What do you think of Jesse Jones' idea that you take over the RFC, too?

Answer. I think Jesse is kidding me.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN R. DAVIS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on last Friday evening I had the pleasure of talking to an enthusiastic group of young Republicans at Madison, Wis. These young people gathered there from the universities of the Middle West which comprise the Big Ten conference. On Friday afternoon they listened to a fine keynote address by His Excellency, Walter Kohler, Jr., Governor of Wisconsin. The remainder of the 3-day conference time was spent in committee work and plenary conference sessions.

The meeting at Madison was the second annual Big Ten Conference of Young Republicans. The first was held at Ann Arbor, Mich., in 1950 with the University of Michigan Young Republicans as hosts, just as the University of Wisconsin Young Republicans were hosts at Madison. At their first conference, the delegates were privileged to hear Gov. Harold Stassen and our able and hard-working colleague from Michigan, JERRY FORD.

I was glad to join the distinguished company of Walter Kohler, Harold Stassen, and Jerry Ford by talking to the fine group of young men and women who attended the conference at Madison.

As a part of the record of this successful conference, I include here the text of my remarks:

ADDRESS BY REPRESENTATIVE GLENN R. DAVIS, OF WISCONSIN'S SECOND DISTRICT, AT LORAINE HOTEL BANQUET OF THE SECOND ANNUAL BIG TEN CONFERENCE OF YOUNG REPUBLICANS, FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1951

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, and fellow young Republicans, all of you have been welcomed here both officially and unofficially so that it is not necessary for me to welcome you to the Second Congressional District of Wisconsin. His Excellency Governor Kohler, our State chairman, Wayne Hood, and your conference chairman, Roland Veith, have put that welcome in words, and I'm sure that the young Republicans here at the University of Wisconsin have put that welcome in many actions during the course of the day. On the other hand, it is indeed a welcome sight and a source of real inspiration and encouragement to look upon this fine gathering of middle western young Republicans. All of us here speak the same kind of Republican language and I'm sure that we shall have no difficulty in understanding each other here tonight, and that all of you will be able to understand each other in the course of your discussions here at this conference.

I mention the importance of our understanding in the light of the experience of a foreign-born plumber here in Madison who had some difficulty with the English language, who used hydrochloric acid to clean a clogged drain. The success was so immediate that he wrote to the Bureau of Standards in Washington to explain his success. In due time he received a letter from an official in the Bureau of Standards which read as follows: "The efficacy of hydrochloric acid is indisputable but the corrosive residue is incompatible with metallic permanence." The plumber wrote back that he was glad the Bureau of Standards agreed with him.

Sometime later the plumber received a subsequent letter from the Bureau of Standards which said: "We cannot assume responsibility for the production of toxic and noxious residue with hydrochloric acid and suggest you use an alternate procedure." The plumber again wrote he was happy that the Bureau agreed. Finally someone in the Bureau caught on to the fact that the plumber didn't understand the fancy and technical language and so he wrote: "Don't use hydrochloric acid. It eats hell out of the pipes."

It does help to understand each other. In your discussions here in your committees in this conference I hope that you will be able to reach real Republican understanding.

It was here in the Middle West that the Republican Party was born and cradled. Its birth at Ripon, Wis., was followed by its baptism at Jackson, Mich. Illinois claims the man whose leadership brought our party to national strength and ascendancy. It was Indiana which raised that man to manhood before he moved to Illinois. Even today, the Middle West is our party's greatest source of strength. The heartland of our Nation is also the heartland of our party.

I feel very much at home here in this company tonight, not only because this happens to be in the district which it is my honor to represent in Congress, but also because I can talk to you as a middle western young Republican to middle western young Republicans. We young Republicans, the youthful leaders of our party, are here without boasting, but in a sincere determination to recognize and face up to the importance of our position. It is clear to us that our Nation needs a strong Republican Party and that the Republican Party needs us young Republicans.

I'm happy to point out that here in Wisconsin youth has a dominant position in the councils of our party. In the Badger State we have a lieutenant governor, two members of the House of Representatives, and the State chairman of our party who are under 40; and we have a governor, a United States Senator, and two other members in the House of Representatives who are in their forties. This youthful Republican vigor cannot be discounted in explaining that we have all Republican State officers, two Republican United States Senators, 9 out of 10 Republican United States Representatives, and three-fourths of the membership of our State legislature who are Republicans. We Wisconsin young Republicans intend to keep it that way. The people of Wisconsin, as in most of the States of the Middle West, know that the letters GOP stand for economy, efficiency, and honesty in government.

In your organization and discussion programs of today, tomorrow, and Sunday I trust that you will lay the foundation for new future hopes and aspirations. It has ever been the habit of youth to look forward instead of backward, to the future instead of to the past. As young men and women of high ideals of citizenship, we need to recognize that our ideals can be realized only through the practical application of our rights and privileges of citizens—in other words, through practical politics. We need to realize that every good citizen is a politician, for politics, while not an exact science, is nevertheless the science of government. In this republican form of government every citizen ought to be a student of that science. Let us recognize frankly that politics is to be the aim and the objective and the practice of young Republicans. Our job is to sell practical politics to other young people as a part of their responsibility of citizenship and to interest youth in working within the framework of the Republican Party. To be successful in this, we must offer not only a year-round program of activity, we must be able to demonstrate that the hopes and ideals of young people are best expressed in the principles and programs of our party. While thus serving as a rallying point for youth, we can well serve our party, for we must not overlook the fact that we, as individual young Republicans, are also members of the Republican Party.

We have a dual membership in our party just as we have a dual citizenship in our State and Nation. It has never been intended that young Republicans shall serve as apprentices before active participation in party and governmental affairs. It has never been intended that young Republican meetings shall be polite debating societies for the discussion of academic or moot questions. Young people seek action, and I suggest that young Republicans are admirably fitted for the following fourfold task:

First, we can have a lasting effect on our party and its program by taking leadership in a year-round program of political education and discussion. Youth can best sustain necessary party activity in the period after one election is over and before another election is hard upon us again. A youthful group of Republican workers with the initiative and the public-spiritedness to make theirs a year-round program will soon find that they are the leaders of their party and that their party has become the leading party in their community. By knowing more, by doing more, we can give meaning to our viewpoints. Knowledge will forever govern ignorance, and by year-round discussion programs in our local communities we can achieve the knowledge and know-how to be effective in politics and effective in Government.

Second, we must make ourselves heard in party councils. Success as young Republicans will not be measured alone by the size of membership rolls or the existence of live, working organizations. It must be measured also by the number of young Republicans who are members of county Republican committees, are precinct committeemen or committeewomen, and are in attendance and take active parts in county, district or State Republican conventions. Again I repeat—we are an integral part of the Republican organization. Our identity as young Republicans is significant as a meeting ground and as a training school for our work in the senior councils of the party.

Third, we young Republicans must be active in Government. It is not enough that we shall demonstrate our effectiveness as practical political workers in behalf of Republican candidates, we must furnish some of the candidates of the Republican Party at local, State, and National levels. All of us canont be officeholders, but many of us who could be competent Republican servants of our Government have never offered ourselves for public service.

Political campaigning and political office holding is hard lot, discouraging at times and often unappreciated, but they are functions that young people are admirably fitted by youth, energy, and spirit to perform. I know from experience, from having worked with them, that some of the outstanding present and future leaders of the House of Representatives are to be found in the ranks of the young Republicans. The names of JERRY FORD and CHARLIE POTTER, of Michigan; BILL AYRES, of Ohio; BILL SPRINGER and TIM SHEEHAN, of Illinois; ROSS ADAIR, SHEP CRUMPACKER and CHUCK BROWNSON, of Indiana; and JOHN BYRNES, of Wisconsin; are certainly to be found in the category of young Republican leaders of the House.

To them politics, public service, is a career. Robert Louis Stevenson once said that politics is perhaps the only profession for which no preparation is thought necessary. Robert Louis Stevenson, of course, was strictly a writer of fiction. It may be true that few people think preparation is necessary, but that too is fiction.

At the National Republican Convention at Philadelphia in 1948, former President Hoover told the delegates: "If you follow the counsel of those who believe that politics is only a game to be played for personal advantage, you are wasting your time and effort."

Young Republicans must stand ready for active responsible stewardship in Government.

Fourthly and finally, young Republicans—and youth has always furnished the idealism of all generations—must instill within our party a fundamental honesty in political principle and political practice. We must be the conscience of our party as well as the guardian of its principles. Some of our older brethren, who have watched our opponents win elections through misrepresentation and vilification, may well express wonder as to whether a conscience pays off in practical politics. As young Republicans we must prove to them and to the American people that honesty and forthrightness are as important in politics as in any field of endeavor and that there is still enough respect for those virtues in this America to eventually bring down scorn and repudiation upon the heads of those who believe and practice otherwise. Sooner or later the time will come when the American people will repudiate those who seek to maintain or obtain the control of Government on the basis of misrepresentation, half-truths, vilification, trick phrases, favoritism, and influence. We must be sure that we stand clean and ready when that time arrives.

Surely the moral fiber of the American people is much higher than the morality of the present national administration would indicate. Given the leadership of young men and women with clean hands and clear hearts, the American people will repudiate those who have at least tolerated, if not encouraged, reprehensible standards of loyalty and trust. Grover Cleveland, who certainly would not recognize his current Democratic successors, often repeated the statement: "A public office is a public trust," and he governed himself and his administration accordingly. Under the Truman administration code, basic integrity has been replaced by technical legality. People in high appointed places of influence no longer ask "Is it right?" Rather they ask, "Can I get by without being prosecuted?" This attitude has been evident in Washington for too long a time. In recent weeks, it has become evident to the American people everywhere.

For instance, the American people now know the name of the White House stenographer who received a $9,500 natural pastel mink—"one of the better coats"—from a friend of her influential husband.

The American people now know the name of that husband of the White House stenographer who, until his wife became secretary to Senator Harry S. Truman, was a clerk in a chain store, a dairy worker, a restaurant worker, a garage man. Then when his wife came to Washington he did, too, and before World War II worked in a bureau at not more than $1,800 a year. Following the war (in the meantime his wife had moved to the White House with her boss) he rose rapidly in the RFC to $7,500 a year. He became the man to see when White House influence was wanted. He became an insurance counselor, he had acquired parts of oil wells, a brewery, and other business enterprises. He bought a $52,000 home in Washington. His income rose to $60,000 annually. There is where the Fulbright committee found him and burst his balloon, but his wife continues to work as a White House secretary. It might be mentioned that she quit wearing the mink coat before spring came to Washington.

The American people now know that before the site for the H-bomb plant in South Carolina was publicly announced friends of people in high places quietly bought up thousands of acres of land in the immediate vicinity.

The American people now know that Mississippi Senators and Members of the House publicly complained that Federal jobs were sold in their State by Mississippi Democrats friendly to the administration. The payment was in cash, never by check.

The American people now know that Gen. Harry Vaughan, exposed as the friend of the fixer and perjurer John Maragon, and as the employer of an Australian lady friend brought to this country under special legislation, continues as military adviser to the President.

The American people know of these and many more like them. President Truman knows about them, too, but faced with this kind of a record of imposition on himself and on the American people, did the President ask any sort of an explanation from his "friends"? He did not. Did he dismiss any of them? He did not. When confronted by a reporter who asked what he proposed to do about these scandals the President's reply was, "My people are all honorable—all of them are. * * * My house is always clean."

The editor of the widely read U. S. News and World Report summarizes the President's attitude this way: "Mr. Truman is to ignore the storm over influence business in Washington. The President won't fire anybody, won't believe that anything is wrong. RFC, if abolished by Congress, will be saved by Presidential veto. Influence business, very big business, will continue to thrive. It is not viewed with disfavor by the White House. It greases political wheels."

We all admire loyalty to friends. It's a fine gesture to refrain from turning your back on a friend. That is one thing—it is quite another for the President to turn his back on the rest of the American people.

This obvious cloak of immorality which enshrouds this administration is there for all to see. For about a score of years now there has been another cloak less visible, yet less revealing, just as immoral, just as conscienceless. This lack of conscience will be paid for by our children and grandchildren, and other generations to come. It is the immoral and destructive habit of repeated deficits in our Federal finance.

If any man shall keep his family in luxury while he is alive, meantime saddling himself and that family with debts that can mean only hardship or bankruptcy in the future—would anyone here say that that was not immoral? What then shall we say about the leaders of the Democratic administration which has conducted the financial affairs of our country in such a manner?

In our House Appropriations Committee now we are wrestling with the President's budget requests totaling more than $94,000,000,000—$71,000,000,000 to be spent in the coming fiscal year. The balance to be authorizations for spending in the years to come.

That amount can be and must be reduced. Budget cutting always is difficult and always painful but that does not detract from its necessity. The people are looking to the Republicans in Congress, with help from moderate Democrats, to cut the fat from this spending program. Federal programs which might be classed as justifiable conveniences in normal times, become unjustifiable luxuries in times like these.

Early this year, in his message to Congress, the President stressed the necessity for defense and soft-pedaled his habitually expensive so-called welfare program. But his voice was evidently softened simply to lessen the vigilance of the American people. For neatly tucked away in convenient corners of the budget tent, near flaps through which two familiar characters with long ears and humped backs named "Charles" and "Oscar" could get their noses—near those flaps were additional appropriations for the unauthorized and repudiated Brannan strait-Jacket, give-away farm plan, and the Ewing compulsory free-doctor-nurse-and-pill plan. There were other such programs which the President included in his budget in the guise of defense necessity. They spell out the measure of the insincerity—yes the cynicism, the fiscal irresponsibility of this administration. In the daylight of peace, in a darkness of war, in the twilight of emergency, the practices of political patronage are never set aside; the lust for power is ever present; their habits of spending have not been reformed. It is inescapable that these habits and these practices would not only continue the depletion of the Treasury, but that they move in the direction of debauching—destroying the moral fiber—of the electorate. By this method, through Government hand-outs, grants, subsidies, and aid programs, has the traditional republican form of government, the government of Jefferson and of Lincoln, been weakened and transformed. The normal relationship of the levels of government has been reversed. Their proper relationship, it seems to me, can be illustrated by a triangle, the broad base which represents our local units of government, the government units which are closest to the people, most responsible to the people, and can in most cases most effectively deal with their problems. As the triangle narrows from the broad base we reach the legitimate area af the operation of the State government. This area of problems includes those which cannot be adequately handled at the local levels. Then as we approach the apex we reach the legitimate area of the operation of the Federal Government in dealing with our domestic problems.

In the last score of years, the Democrats have, however, completely reversed this traditional relationship. Under the current practices, the broad base of the triangle now represents the enveloping field of activities of the Federal Government.

The triangle then narrows into the area of the State government with a closely confined area of local responsibility in the region adjacent to the apex. Our tax moneys are being poured in at the top of this inverted triangle, the largest portion taken by the Federal Government, and then what is left trickles down into the area of the State and local governments. Thus have the legitimate areas of taxation of the State and local governments been usurped. Thus has the Federal Government made it impossible for these units of Government to meet the responsibilities which are rightfully theirs. I think we can attribute no small portion of the lack of civic responsibility and civic morale to the fact that State and local governments have been placed in a completely dependent and subservient position with relation to the Government in Washington.

By way of summation let me restate what I consider to be the four particular functions of Young Republicans and young Republican organizations. First, a sponsorship and participation in a year-round program of political education and discussion. Second, effective participation in the councils of the Republican Party. Third, active participation in and responsible stewardship in government. Fourth and finally, the championship and guardianship of the conscience, the forthrightness, the sound traditional principles of our party and our government.

I hope, fellow young Republicans, that you will leave this conference with the inspiration and the determination to do all that which needs to be done between now and November of 1952. Other young people must be brought into the Republican fold. The leadership for which the American people are crying must be developed, a leadership which is worthy of the confidence of the American people, a leadership which will stand for fiscal responsibility, for honesty, for decency, for respect for the republican form of government.

Our cause is not only the cause of young Republicanism. We are to be but the instrument for righteousness, and the beneficiaries of a change in government only insofar as those benefits are to be distributed to all the people of America. We Republicans must fight for and accept the responsibilities of the leadership of the Nation in 1952. Much of the work that must be done, much of the leadership that must be furnished, must come from Young Republicans like ourselves. A Republican victory in 1952 will be a victory for decency, a victory for all America, a victory for freemen everywhere.

I hope that in your work here tomorrow and Sunday and in your work between now and November of 1952, your realization of the importance of your task as young Republicans will gladden your heart and give speed and lightness to your hands.

Congress Should Keep Faith With Heroes Who Have Given Their Lives and Fought Valiantly for Their Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, in every war America has called on our citizens without regard to race. In Korea today history is being written and the heroic deeds of men of many races are daily brought to our attention. Congress should keep faith with these heroes. It can do it by refusing to write into the universal service and military training bill now under consideration requirements for segregation.

The articles which I include herewith appeared in the Nation's newspapers recently. I could fill the RECORD with hundreds such stories.

[From the Pittsburgh Courier of March 3, 1951]

PFC JONES WREAKS HAVOC IN KOREA—ANOTHER HERO FOR MEMPHIS

ON THE HAN RIVER, KOREA.—Pfc Aaron Jones, 21-year-old native of Memphis, is in line for the Silver Star Medal, third-ranking United States combat decoration, for his heroic action sparking an attack upon some 200 Chinese Red troops here recently.

The outstanding feature of Jones' action was the fact that he is a Browning automatic rifleman, but used unfamiliar weapons, such as hand grenades, a captured rifle, and an abandoned machine gun to wreak havoc upon the enemy.

GUN JAMMED

The only Negro in his nine-man squad, Jones and his comrades were part of a force assigned to take a hill on which the Chinese Red troops were dug in. Just as the signal for the charge came his gun jammed.

Not wanting to be left out of the excitement, he grabbed up some hand grenades and closed in with the rest of the outfit. Halfway up the slope, the hand grenades came in handy. A burp gun, firing from above, pinned down the American attackers.

Jones, with complete disregard for his life, jumped to his feet and hurled a grenade up the hill. There was an explosion, then silence, and the attack again rolled forward.

GRABBED NEW WEAPON

Reaching the top, the American troops locked in hand-to-hand struggle with the enemy, Jones grabbed up a rifle, a Japanese single-shot rifle, with no bullets, and scurried around quickly to pick up some ammunition. When he had gotten some he downed two of the enemy as they were running.

The following day, in another hill attack, he spotted a Red force advancing up the other side of the slope. The regular machine gunners were eating at the time, so he took over one of the spray guns and downed 11 of the advancing enemy on the first burst.

EX-BOY SCOUT

Pfc Jones' parents are Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Jones, of 959 Porter Street. He attended Booker T. Washington High School and was a member of Boy Scout Troop 166, sponsored by the LeMoyne Gardens Tenant Association. He has several brothers and sisters.

A few weeks ago another Memphis soldier, Pvt. Edward O. Cleaborn, was posthumously awarded the Distinguished Service Cross for exceptional gallantry in action in Korea, giving his life to save his comrades.

[From the Washington Evening Star of January 25, 1951]

DSC AWARDED NEGRO PRIVATE WHO GAVE LIFE TO SAVE OUTFIT

TOKYO, January 25.—A Tennessee private has been awarded posthumously the Distinguished Service Cross for giving his life so his platoon could evade a Communist flanking action near Nuri in Korea.

The citation praised Pvt. Edward O. Cleaborn, Jr., of Memphis for extraordinary heroism in action.

The colored private single-handedly wiped out Red machine-gun crews threatening his unit.

In awarding him the Nation's second highest military award, Far East command headquarters said that on August 15 Cleaborn's unit, Company A, Thirty-fourth Infantry Regiment, "attacked a ridge where the enemy was occupying positions with excellent observation and fields of fire.

"Some of the enemy had infiltrated and flanking action had occurred and his platoon was pinned down almost immediately by machine-gun fire from the rear.

"Despite the extreme hazard of interlacing machine-gun fire Cleaborn gained the ridge and killed the machine-gun crews to the front. From the continuous firing of his weapon Cleaborn's hands were severely burned.

"Disregarding his burned hands, when his platoon began a withdrawal he remained on the ridge to cover withdrawal of his comrades and to permit evacuation of the wounded. He continued firing from this position, thus denying the enemy access to adjacent high ground.

"While furnishing protective fire, Private Cleaborn was mortally wounded. His heroic self-sacrifice permitted the withdrawal of his platoon to new positions."

HERO COULDN'T FIND JOB, SO HE JOINED THE ARMY

MEMPHIS, TENN., January 25.—Pvt. Edward O. Cleaborn joined the Army because he couldn't find a job.

The heroic youngster was one of nine children of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Cleaborn, Sr. He was a native of Merigold, Miss.

In his last letter home, Private Cleaborn told his mother he had been "in a tight spot but came out all right, thank the Lord."

Maj. William R. Oliver, Organized Reserve Corps instructor here, said the award will be presented either by Lt. Gen. John R. Hodge, commander of the Third Army in Atlanta, or by a general on his staff.

Major Oliver said Cleaborn's mother said she preferred to have the ceremony held in a church. They live in a slum section.

[From the Washington Post of March 31, 1951]

SOLDIER'S IS POSTHUMOUS—NAVY FLIER, INDIAN CORPORAL AWARDED MEDALS OF HONOR

(By John G. Norris)

Two stories of extraordinary heroism involving a white Navy pilot from Massachusetts, a Negro flier from Mississippi, and an American Indian from Wisconsin fighting Chinese Communists in North Korea were told yesterday by the Department of Defense.

Lt. (jg) Thomas J. Hudner, Fall River, Mass., the Pentagon announced, was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor for risking his life in a vain attempt to save the life of a squadron mate, Ensign Jesse Leroy Brown, Hattiesburg, Miss. Brown was the first American Negro naval officer to lose his life in combat and the Navy's first Negro aviator.

Corp. Mitchell Red Cloud, Jr., Friendship, Wis., who died saving his Army company from a fanatical Chinese attack, was awarded the Medal of Honor posthumously at the same time.

Navy pilots Hudner and Brown, both of the aircraft carrier Leyte, were flying close support for marines fighting near the Cangjin Reservoir December 5, when Brown's plane was hit by Chinese ack-ack fire and crashed.

"Quickly maneuvering to circle the downed pilot and protect him from enemy troops infesting the area," said the citation of yesterday's award, "Lieutenant Hudner risked his life to save the injured flier who was trapped alive in the burning wreckage.

"Fully aware of the extreme danger in landing in the rough mountainous terrain and the scant hope of escape or survival in subzero temperature, he put his plane down skillfully in a deliberate wheels-up landing in the presence of enemy troops.

"With his bare hands, he packed the fuselage with snow to keep the flames away from the pilot and struggled to free him. Unsuccessful in this, he * * * radioed other airborne planes, requesting that a helicopter be dispatched with an ax and fire extinguisher."

When the 'copter arrived, rescue attempts were renewed, but failed.

President Truman will personally present the Nation's highest military award to Hudner at a White House ceremony April 13. He will be the first Navy man to receive the Medal of Honor for Korean service.

"Corporal Red Cloud was with his outfit, Company E, Nineteenth Infantry of the Twenty-fourth Division, near Chongyon, North Korea, at dawn, last November 5, when the enemy attacked without warning. He opened fire with his automatic rifle without waiting to take cover.

Badly hit by a burst from an enemy "burp" gun, the Winnebago Indian wrapped his arm around a tree to keep from falling and continued to fire until he fell mortally wounded.

"This heroic act," said Red Cloud's citation, "stopped the enemy from overrunning his company's position and gained time for reorganization and evacuation of the wounded.

"Corporal Red Cloud's dauntless courage and gallant self-sacrifice reflects the highest credit upon himself and upholds the esteemed traditions of the Army of the United States."

Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, will present the Medal of Honor to the deceased soldier's mother, Mrs. Nellie Red Cloud, at a Pentagon ceremony Tuesday. Red Cloud, a World War II marine, was the son of Mitchell Red Cloud, Sr., a former White House guard, who died in 1946.

Deferment of Some College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from a recent issue of the Boston Pilot:

NO DODGE FROM THE DRAFT

The President's plan which allows the deferment of some college students has been the occasion for more than the usual quota of scatter-brained reactions. Some people who are quite incapable of seeing the more subtle issues arising in the problems of our national life found here something they could really put their teeth into; in too many cases, however, having reached the dental area, this was as close as the matter came to the brain. To them it appeared to be nothing more than a defiance of all the democratic traditions, to be in fact discriminatory; it is a poor politician or public figure who does not know what stand to take on these subjects. The results then have made up in vigor and passion for what they lacked in rationality and reflection.

If a man limited his reading on this subject to the large literature of its objectors, he would be under the impression that the President of the United States had suddenly exempted from the necessity of military service a certain portion of the community whose numbers were to be decided by their relatively high I. Q. This would indeed be the creation of an intellectual elite and those first to complain should be the Armed Forces themselves who, by this means, would become a vast mass of unlettered or at least less educated men. The process too would be undemocratic since the norm for exemption would be restricted to one single quality—intellectual ability—and not the most important one at that. The results would be catastrophic from every point of view—military, political, scientific, cultural, and not the least of all, that of public morale.

Fortunately for all concerned the situation we face is not at all like this one envisioned by some of our more easily alarmed citizens. There is no question at all of grounds for exemption; there is quite a different matter under discussion, that of deferment. Here the question is not, "Who can best serve his country?" but rather, "Among those who can best serve the country when are college students most valuable in the service of that country?" It is not an attempt to remove those who go to college from the necessity of serving in the Armed Forces of the Nation; it is a practical program designed to take them into that service when they are most valuable to it and generally most valuable to the Nation as a whole. It would be the height of folly to exclude college students from the draft; they are the strong citizens of tomorrow and they have a most significant contribution to make to the Armed Forces as to society itself. At the same time wisdom as well as prudence suggest that we use this significant group in an economy which will produce the most effective results. This way of acting is in keeping with our policies in other areas of our population. The farmer, the man in industry, the scientist, the clergyman, the father of a family—all of these are absorbed into the service of the country in a manner which will insure the best possible contribution to the war effort and the general health of the community as well. To be just as rational about the college student is not to display favoritism but simple common sense.

Nor is it, as some maintain, merely a question of providing in the future enough scientists to carry on the researches necessary for the progress of our mechanical civilization. There are values which when weighed beside this one make it shrink into insignificance. Our colleges have as their principal work the task of producing not merely scholars or scientists but mature men; in times of crisis like this one it would be foolhardy indeed to cut off the supply of this rarest of all commodities. The college and the university must not be sacrificed to the god of war; its facilities and its extraordinary powers for good must however be directed toward the saving of our civilization.

Training the American Boy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Cy Snyder:

What we have a right to expect of every American boy is that he shall turn out to be a good American man. Not $4, not $40, but over $400,000,000 was spent across the retail counters of America in 1950 for what—cap pistols, toy machine guns, cowboy hats, pants, shirts, vests, shoes, boots, belts, badges, saddles, cereals, tooth brushes, and a mile-long list of cowboy merchandise for our American boys.

It was purchased by American women because our primary education is controlled by women, our manners are dictated by women, and 90 percent of our earnings are spent by women. In face of all this, the real old-time cowboys have changed their trade name titles to ranchers, like the baby sitters have changed their profession to child monitors for fear someone in the clothing industry will start to promote outfits for them with guns and knives to kill the kidnapers.

Every little boy likes to play with a hammer, saw, wrench, and rule. Every little boy likes to dabble in red, white, and blue paint. Every little boy likes to build his scooter for the soap box derby. All you have to do is give a boy a tool and he won't want a gun.

Parents all over the Nation are stirred by this social menace, and everywhere are asking for an answer to this problem. I have no desire to start a local, State, and National movement. I only wish that we could go to Hopalong Cassidy, Roy Rogers, and Gene Autry, since they have become the idols of our American boys, and ask them if they will start to show the boys over television and radio what can be done with tools rather than guns. I wish that some one could go to Hollywood and show them that interesting things can be done with tools to entertain the minds of our youth constructively rather than destructively.

I realize that we live in and under a capitalistic system of government in which profit is the selfish motive of all things. But I wish that we could go to the manufacturers who sponsor six-gun this and six-gun that radio and television shows, and ask them to please make it six-tools for this and six-tools for that. I realize that it is too late now to help those of our youth whose crimes are being committed daily, in which we read in our papers such headlines as appeared a few days ago: "Boy, 8, kills mother and father." But it is not too late to start today teaching and showing our children the use of tools for entertainment and knowledge.

The strong influence among youth is to look like, and act like, their idols in their dream world. But suppose for a moment that these idols of screen and television would change to good American clothes with a dash of buttons, carpenter aprons to replace holsters for tools, I will assure you that the fad of cowboy outfits would begin to diminish overnight, along with crime magazines.

However, where there is life there is hope. Let us be thankful for the work of the 4-H Clubs of America which are keeping our farm children busy building the constructive things of life. Thanks for the Boy and Girl Scouts of America and their great leaders.

It always makes my heart thrill in listening over the radio to Horace Heidt's program when he says, "It's better to build boys than to mend men." Let us start to dramatize the life of Jesus, the great Carpenter of Nazareth, down through the ages of our great builders of the universe. These men's lives can be dramatized on the screen, radio, and television so great and powerful that they too can become the idols of our American boys. They, too, were given tools, for they did not want guns.

And now as my contribution to American youth may I start a slogan here in your county that will echo throughout the Nation: "Give a boy a tool and he won't want a gun."

Barred From Ride but Not Silver Star Medal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Boston Pilot, Saturday, April 7, 1951:

HE WAS BARRED FROM RIDE TO SCHOOL BUT NOT FROM WINNING HERO'S MEDAL

OLYMPIA, WASH., April 5.—They wouldn't let him ride a school bus here because he went to a Catholic school. But there is no embargo on Silver Star Medals for bravery when any fighting man in Korea shows the courage in action that merits one—and young Francis Normoyle has won his.

The parents of the 22-year-old United States Naval hospitalman, Mr. and Mrs. George J. Normoyle, have been notified that Maj. Gen. Oliver P. Smith, commander of the First Marines, has pinned the Silver Star on him in Korea.

Serving as a corpsman with the Marines, young Normoyle went out under heavy fire to bring in three wounded Marines, the last of whom he rescued although he himself was wounded in the meantime.

His father, asked for a picture of the young high-school football and track star, brought it to the offices of the Catholic Northwest Progress, diocesan paper of Seattle. He was asked what school young Normoyle had attended.

HARD AND EVIL THING

"Well," he replied, "Francis went to St. Michael's School in Olympia until they made that rule about not letting Catholic school pupils ride on the school buses. After that he had to go to Tumwater School; we live 8 miles out of Olympia."

And then Mr. Normoyle, a kind and gentle man, added:

"It is a hard and evil thing, that rule."

Francis' Silver Star citation read:

"For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity in action against the enemy while serving with a Marine infantry company in Korea on 25th September 1950." Hospitalman Normoyle was acting as a corpsman when his platoon was engaged in a heavy fire fight with a well-entrenched and concealed enemy.

Justice for Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a radio address, recently delivered by Prof. Louis F. Budenz, on the Justice for Poland radio series sponsored by the western Massachusetts branch of the Polish-American Congress, together with the introductory remarks by Attorney Paul P. Flak:

INTRODUCTION BY ATTORNEY PAUL P. FLAK

Munich in 1938 and Yalta in 1945 are two black pages of recent history. The appeasement of Hitler brought on World War II, while the appeasement of Stalin confronts us with world war III.

Western democracies under Chamberlain betrayed Czechoslovakia, while under Churchill and Roosevelt Poland and other countries were betrayed and Communist chains riveted on their lands and souls.

Both Munich and Yalta violated international morality and exposed ugly indifference and cynicism of western leaders who, in place of honesty employed temporary expediency.

At Yalta Roosevelt threw aside the opportunity to rebuild the world on justice, preferring materialistic instead of Christian code of ethics. The world has lost faith in our leaders and respect for our democracy, for while we proclaim loudly the merits of freedom and independence, we have thrown our friends into Communist slavery.

We are paying now for our folly at Yalta through the expenditure of billions of dollars and sacrifice of the lives of our men in Korea.

Appeasement of tyrants is indeed a black page in our history and in order to erase this moral crime we must repudiate Yalta and wipe out the curse of the United States.

Our speaker today is a man who startled the world by his candid exposure of secret Communist activities in the United States. As editor of the Daily Worker he had an opportunity to know and study the workings of communism. Resigning the editorship in 1945 he returned to Catholicism and is at present assistant professor of economics at Fordham University. It gives me pleasure to introduce Louis F. Budenz.

TRANSCRIPTION OF RADIO TALK BY LOUIS BUDENZ FOR THE POLISH-AMERICAN CONGRESS

Poland is a name which brings warmth to the hearts of every lover of freedom throughout the world. Our United States owes a special debt of honor to the Polish people—they whose heroism has kept alive so long the light of freedom in eastern Europe. It is Poland which was made the reason for the opening of World War II. It is Poland which, ironically enough, we find nevetheless today in the toils of Soviet tyranny and slavery.

How has this event occurred? In order to answer it, in order to meet this challenge, in order to plead for freedom and justice to Poland, I am indeed honored in speaking these few words to you today. Particularly do I consider it of the most importance that this be done, since the Polish people, in addition to their great love for their native liberty, have ever cherished a devotion to the mother of God, the Blessed Virgin Mary. Their great national shrine is dedicated to her, and around that shrine there still rise the hopes of those people who have encouraged all Europe and the entire world to hope that sometime we could write down in the annals of mankind the end of totalitarianism and of Soviet tyranny.

Let us review for a moment what has occurred in regard to these Polish people, 95 percent anticommunistic in sentiment. When I was a member of the Communist conspiracy I was advised that the Communist Party of Poland was particularly weak. They received criticism from Moscow because they did not win the adherence of more than 2 percent of the Polish people. It is this conspiracy, this small band of brigands, which today imposes its bloody hand upon 95 percent of the Polish people. We Americans cannot wash our hands of what has transpired. Our security is bound up in the fact that there is a Red Poland today. One is bound up in the fact that we, in a certain sense, so shamelessly acquiesced in permitting Soviet Russia to achieve its conquest of that nation.

In 1944 the Red armies were advancing toward Warsaw, the capital of these people. They were only a short distance away—some few miles—when Molotov, then the "mouthpiece" of Soviet Russia, called for the Poles to rise. They did so under General Boer—250,000 of them—and were made the victims of Nazi artillery and superior mechanized warfare. All through the ferments of their struggle the Red armies remained the same distance away from Warsaw. Let us not forget that, although we very soon did so in the months that were to follow.

Then, beyond all this, the United States asked Stalin to grant permission for a shuttle, an air shuttle, across Warsaw in order to drop into that city supplies—that is, of food and military equipment—to help the Poles in their battle against the Nazis. This was essential in order that the shuttle could reach Soviet soil at the other end from Great Britain. Permission was denied the American soldiery and Air Force to undertake any such shuttle adventure; and, indeed, finally only the smallest shuttle was permitted—inadequate, thoroughly inadequate, to meet the great emergency.

That meant that Stalin decreed, by keeping his army so far away from Poland, that Warsaw should be destroyed.

In the face of this we find that at Yalta, under the guidance of Alger Hiss, we acquiesced in giving Stalin control of the destiny of Poland. We instituted the idea of so-called free and unfettered elections, but these free and unfettered elections were to be supervised practically and realistically by Joseph Stalin and his agents in Poland. This has been brought to our attention so eloquently by our Ambassador in that country at the time, Arthur Bliss Lane, that I need dwell upon it no longer.

America thereby made itself a party, at least in part, to what transpired in Poland. It put the seal of approval in reality upon the achievement of a Red Poland. Incidentally, I do know, as a Communist leader in the United States at this time, that it was the great desire of the Kremlin that there be achieved during that immediate period after World War II, a Red Poland and a Red China. This Red Poland was to insure the conquest of Europe.

Poland's coal, second only to that of Russia's herself or perhaps even superior to it on the continent of Europe, was to be added to that of Russia and to such coal as could be bought by Soviet control in Germany as a means of a dynamic material upon which to base the coming conquest in Europe.

In a like manner, Red China was to assure the conquest of Japan, the Philippines, Hawaii, the Pacific, and the driving of America completely from the Pacific and all adjoining lands. It was this dual attack upon the United States from Europe and from Asia which the Kremlin decided upon before World War II had terminated and which I, incidentally, called to the attention of the American people upon leaving the Communist Party in the fall of 1945. I stated then that there would be a creeping blitzkrieg across the continents of Europe and of Asia, designed to attack the United States, but first submerging certain nations beginning with Poland on the one hand and China on the other hand. We can see then that Poland was very essential to the security of the United States, and we can observe that the failure to protect Poland and to protect Polish liberty has had a very adverse effect upon the fortunes of the United States so far as its own security is concerned. We can say, of course, without wishing to oversimplify the matter, that the 40,000 casualties in Korea tonight are in part due to the lack of appreciation by America as a whole of the importance of Poland, as it is likewise due to the lack of appreciation by America of the value of China to the United States, as a defense against Soviet aggregation. Beyond all this, the United States does have a special responsibility to the Polish people in that out of the betrayal of Poland in which we acquiesced, that is, to a large measure, there has come the betrayal of the Hungarian people, the conquest of Bulgaria and Yugoslavia. Many of those nations have been involved in what has occurred. Out of it, fear transpired in Poland. This was totally unnecessary; it was absolutely criminal. There can be no excuse whatsoever that today a Red Poland sits in the United Nations. It is my furthered hope—I hope it will be your furthered prayer, all of you listening to this radio audience—that the United States will be able to understand its moral responsibility to the Polish people and insist that a Red Poland be driven out of the council of the nations.

I say that the first measure in regard to the justice of Poland should be the expulsion of the Red Polish representatives from the United Nations and that the motion should be made by the delegation of the United States.

We are today branding Red China as the aggressor. We must, if we are to be logical, brand Soviet Russia as the aggressor in Poland. We cannot from any viewpoint appease that state of affairs which imposes a small coterie of armed brigands upon a people which is totally anti-Communist and which is out of sympathy completely with the Communist regime.

One of our best allies in the coming struggle with Soviet Russia (for this struggle will be intensified due to Soviet Russia's intent to dominate and conquer the world) will be those Polish patriots who have so long made their mark upon the pages of the struggle for liberty throughout the world.

Let us hope and pray that each one of us in our own community will be able to do our part to make America conscious of its duty to Poland to win, in the years that are to come, genuine justice to the Polish people.

Prosegregation Provision in Military Service and Training Bill Should Be Defeated

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, the prosegregation section of the legislation we are now considering in the House on military service and training should be stricken from the bill. I will offer an amendment tomorrow to accomplish the defeat of this unfair and unwise provision. The Defense Establishment supports my position.

Let the following editorials give the Members of the House some idea of the evils of such ill-conceived legislation.

[From the Norfolk Journal and Guide of March 31, 1951]

A LESSON IN HOW TO WIN VOTES—AND LOSE A WAR

Under a directive of the President, who is also Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, the various military services have for some time been working toward equality of opportunity (widely called integration) in the military services. Notable progress has been made.

The Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives recently had under consideration legislation dealing with military manpower. Amendments designed to defeat the program of integration were presented by southern Congressmen.

Voting against them were able Chairman CARL VINSON, of Georgia, and two other southern Members; among those voting for the crippling amendments was Representative PORTER HARDY, of Virginia's Second District, embracing Norfolk and Portsmouth and contiguous territory.

As so often happens, some Republicans not from the South joined with the southern bloc of Democrats in supporting the measure, some of them, no doubt, for purely political reasons—to embarrass the majority party and the Democratic administration.

The merits of military equality of opportunity, both as a democratic step and as a proper utilization of our manpower, have been reviewed too often in these columns to make necessary a restatement of them at this time. What strikes us as nearly treasonable while we are fighting a bloody shooting war in Asia and a losing propaganda war—is that any American could so embarrass our Military Establishment under the circumstances.

The Army particularly has moved most cautiously, if not reluctantly, in carrying out the integration program. Those who would seek to force it now to upset its training procedures in order to enforce harsh and wasteful and dangerous segregation and discrimination, would place a nearly intolerable burden on the Army.

This is tragic. We may very well, and soon, be fighting for our actual existence as a free Nation. Millions of men and billions of dollars are needed to build up a defense force insuring our safety.

To achieve the objectives will require near miracles. To turn back the clock, as would the dissident element in Congress, could easily undermine the training of service men and drastically reduce the efficiency of the fighting forces. The Army should be trusted to do what is best for the Nation.

Under Russia's prodding we are fighting hordes of nonwhite soldiers now. Half of Korea and the hundreds of millions in China are against us. India with its teeming millions is hearing constantly that racial intolerance is the earmark of America. The Communists are telling the populations of other Asiatic countries that we seek to dominate the world and enslave the darker races.

If we fight in the name of democracy, freedom, and equality and, in our own Armed Forces, deny that by our actions, then we hand our enemies a great weapon on a silver platter.

[From the Cleveland Call and Post of March 24, 1951]

DEFEAT THIS INSULT

With the fearful shadow of equality in the Armed Forces of this Nation staring them in the face, a group of unreconstructed rebels, led this time by Representative WINSTEAD, of Mississippi, is desperately seeking to write into the Military Training Act a vicious and insulting amendment that would permit their equally unreconstructed sons to refuse to serve in units with members of the Negro race.

When will we ever learn?

In addition to hurling an insult into the faces of the gallant Negro men who are presently bleeding and dying in Korea for the so-called preservation of a nebulous thing called democracy, these bigoted southerners continue in the most effective way to provide grist for the Russian propaganda mill. The end result is the prolongation of the cold war that is uncomfortably hot these days, and a further deflection away from American ideals by the millions of nonwhites throughout the world.

Even Committee Chairman VINSON, who hails from Georgia, was in opposition to this latest Dixiecrat whimsey. VINSON not only realizes its adverse effect on American diplomacy in these critical times, but even more realistically pointed out that the stupid amendment won't work even if enacted into law.

Significantly the Republicans are again guilty of aiding and abetting their southern colleagues in this attempt to evade the fulfillment of real democracy in our Armed Forces. They evidently consider it a small price to pay for southern support later on more important legislation they desire.

The NAACP has notified all of its branches to shower their Representatives in the Congress with protests against this amendment urging them to vote against it.

We urge readers of this newspaper to add their protests today.

[From the Pittsburgh Courier of April 7, 1951]

FUNNY BUSINESS WITH UMT

Last week Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers, CIO, protested that "antiviolence and anti-Jim Crow amendments" had been eliminated from the universal training and service bill which is still in the House Armed Services Committee, and pointed out that the "Winstead pro-segregation amendment" has been approved by the committee.

There seems to be little doubt that certain elements in Congress and the country at large are bent on using UMT as a means of fastening Negro segregation and discrimination more firmly on the armed services.

They hope that the current war hysteria will enable them to stampede this bill through Congress, with all of its undesirable amendments intact.

It is doubtful in our minds whether universal military training is desirable or necessary, and there is justifiable fear that it may be used not only to fasten Jim Crowism to military training but will give our fascistic brass hats too much control over the young workers of this Nation. That would be another blow to democracy.

[From the Chicago Defender of March 31, 1951]

CUNNING LITTLE BLOCKHEADS

The crafty fighters for white supremacy do not always show their hand in public, but it is not difficult to find evidence of their handiwork. Last week the House Armed Services Committee held a closed-door meeting on the draft bill, and when it was over a Jim Crow provision was attached to the measure. By a 20–11 secret vote, the committee was sucked in by Congressman ARTHUR WINSTEAD, of Mississippi, who engineered the segregation deal.

Reporter Robert S. Allen revealed that 12 Republicans joined the Dixiecrats in approving the Jim Crow rider although 3 southern Congressmen refused to go along. The chairman of the committee, CARL VINSON, of Georgia, voted against the Jim Crow rider because he said the military leaders did not want it in the bill and had warned him against it.

The boys on the side of white supremacy, however, do not care what happens to the United States military machine as long as they keep dear old Jim Crow. The Yankee Republicans, who should know better, seem to be unusually willing to oblige their Dixiecrat friends.

This shocking action taken in secret by the House Armed Services Committee will destroy the new program for integration if the rider is allowed to stand. Every effort must be made to alert the entire Congress on this issue. The cunning little blockheads who put their prejudices above the best interests of their country have got to be defeated. They are playing Stalin's game whether they know it or not.

The Italian Peace Treaty of 1947

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

SPEECH

OF

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, for many weeks the question as to whether or not American troops should be sent to Europe to help defend the nations of Western Europe was debated before the American people. None of us minimize the importance of this issue. All of us were aware of the great impact it had on the American home. For, resolving this issue in the affirmative meant that once more boys in American uniform would be going to foreign soil prepared to defend the principles of democracy.

As one who has great faith in, and esteem for General Eisenhower, I am thoroughly in accord with his conclusions that the free nations of the world must band together or else freedom perishes. However, I believe it significant too, to point out that considerable emphasis was made of the fact that these nations of Europe should not lie down, that the job could not be done and would not be done by us alone—but, that the nations of Europe must have the will to resist and defend themselves. In his report to the people, upon his return from Europe, General Eisenhower indicated that the people of Europe were eager to do their share—and, had already taken steps to build up their own defenses—that everywhere the will to resist was evident.

It is inconceivable to me, therefore, that we continue to recognize the validity of treaties which impose restrictions on some of these nations of Europe to arm in their own defense. It is anomalous that we can expect a nation such as Italy to defend herself and her friends in Western Europe, while we continue to give assent to the terms of the Italian Peace Treaty of 1947. This treaty, a product of postwar hatred and revenge, was engineered, in a great measure, by Russia. It was deliberately designed to reduce Italy to a condition of helplessness; to render her militarily and economically weak. Under the terms of this Italian Peace Treaty of 1947, Italy has been limited to a 185,000-man army. This is the same country which during World War II raised an army of 8,000,000 men and contributed, in the latter years of the war, very much toward the victory over Germany.

General Eisenhower has said, and every available report will show, that Italy has always indicated her willingness and her eagerness to resist any Russian aggression and to fight on the side of the free world. She has indicated her eagerness to raise a substantial army, and to do her part as a party to the Mutual Assistance Pact.

However, because of the restrictions placed on the size of her army, Italy cannot take such steps. And, while Italy is rendered militarily weak, Russia, the principal author of the harsh terms of the Italian Treaty, will also be the principal benefactor, for she will be gaining in strength.

The Italian Government has warned the West that Russia's Balkan satilites are rearming and she has appealed for a revision of this treaty. However, nothing has been done. And, as a result, it is impossible for Italy to contribute her fullest potential to the defense of her friends and neighbors in Western Europe.

Mr. Speaker, this Italian peace treaty is totally inconsistent with the principles of the Atlantic Charter, Marshall Plan, mutual defense assistance programs, and our North Atlantic Treaty. How can we possibly stand in the anomalous position of urging this nation to defend itself, when we recognize the validity of a treaty which makes it impossible for her to do so.

I am fully confident that the people of Italy who, as recent as 1948 successfully threw off the yoke of Communism, will not be found wanting in their will to resist any Communist aggression, providing they are permitted to properly defend themselves. And, that which is basic and which we cannot lose sight of, is that if we permit Italy to increase her armed forces, it will not be necessary for as many American boys to go abroad and defend the Europeans.

The question, therefore, is not only whether the Italian Peace Treaty should be declared invalid, but, how best can we permit the nations of Europe, with whom we are banded, to increase their armed forces to defend themselves in case of aggression. I think we can expect the fullest participation from a nation such as Italy in the implementation of the North Atlantic Pact, if we declare the Italian Peace Treaty of 1947 invalid.

For this reason, I have today introduced a Joint Resolution to relieve the Government of Italy of its obligations to the United States under the Treaty of Peace with Italy and which requests the President to join with other signatories as may accept, in negotiating a new peace treaty.

Public Morality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an editorial from the Pittsburgh Catholic on the subject of public morality. Since there appears to be so much agitation for improvement of the ethics and morality of public officials, it might be well to give consideration to these qualities in our people generally. I commend this article to the attention of the Members:

PUBLIC MORALITY

In the midst of the congressional committee hearings and investigations that have become one of the most important elements in American life today, a United States Senator comes forward with a suggestion for a study of ethical standards in public affairs by a commission of eminent private citizens. This seems to revive a notion expressed quite often that there is a particular sort of morality that applies to public life and that it is different from the ordinary type of morality.

From this talk about public morality, one might conclude either that the person in public office enjoys certain exemptions from the moral code imposed upon the private citizen, or that he is held to a stricter code. The one attitude claims that allowances must be made for the heavy responsibilities borne by the public officials, that he can't be bothered with too many fine distinctions of right and wrong, and should be judged only by the general results of his conduct in office; the other view would transfer to the public official the blame for any and all wrongdoing on the part of his subordinates.

The fact is, of course, that there is not, and cannot be, any distinction between public and private morality; if the standard of morality respected by the private citizens is low, it is idle to expect that public morality will be high. Every individual has the obligation to obey the moral code as it applies to his particular state in life; this means that he must obey the natural law and the Commandments of God, without exception; that he must comply with the Constitution and with the duly enacted statutes of the country of which he is a citizen; that if he is elected or appointed to public office he must conscientiously fulfill all the duties of that office. The citizen has an obligation to support the law just as binding as is the public official's obligation to enforce it; violation and evasion on the one hand are just as reprehensible as favoritism and malfeasance on the other.

ON THE SCREEN

The Kefauver committee television hearings have put graphically before the country a lot of shocking evidence about the prevalence of organized crime in this country, and of the grip it has established on public officials in many places. None of this was new; the committee had all its facts carefully assembled, and merely called its witnesses to tell their stories personally so that people everywhere could get a better idea of what it all meant.

And what has been the reaction? A wave of indignation demanding reform? Some deep searching of consciences on the part of the members of the television audiences as to whether or not they are to blame in part for the shocking conditions uncovered? Or just a sort of surprised enjoyment of the whole thing as a strikingly different show, with some admiration for the skill and efficiency of the investigators who built up the cases and perhaps some near-sympathy for the racketeers who showed themselves skilled and efficient, too, in carrying out their greedy, ruthless objectives?

It is a foregone conclusion that this unprecedented 1951 crime study will bring no improvement to the moral climate of the Nation unless it stirs the people to action. This action must take place on the local community level, in demands that police departments and other law-enforcement agencies do the work entrusted to them, in checking the records of candidates for public office, in refusal to be quieted by spasmodic clean-ups that leave the basic evils untouched. Here in Pittsburgh we have had many newspaper exposés of crime and racketeering in the past. How long was public interest, or the interest of the crusading newspapers, maintained?

ONLY ONE CURE

Reform is necessary; exposés are necessary; clean-ups are necessary. But there can be no hope of getting the country out of the clutches of the present crime ring, or of a new crime ring that will spring up the day after the present one is eliminated, unless and until there is a resurgence of true morality among the people of this country.

For our moral standards are low; we tolerate and practice all sorts of evasions of the natural law and the commandments, as well as of the civil law. Some of our colleges teach our young men that getting ahead is more important than adhering to truth and justice; there are whole sections of the learned legal profession that study the law for loopholes and never bring the moral code to the attention of their clients; there is a new profession of psychiatry, some of the practioners of which give their patients comforting and immoral assurance about adultery and other transgressions of the commandments; we have a business code that practically means grab all you can.

To build up all these false values, we have had a whole generation exposed to newspapers and magazines and motion pictures that sensationalized and glamorized crime, that made heroes and heroines of Hollywood figures of low character; we have had these agencies of public information belittling the commandments and preaching the doctrine of secularism. (They are not so bad today, but it is a belated and inadequate change that has come over them.) They bear a heavy responsibility for the terrifying increase in divorces, for the prevalence of juvenile delinquency, for the lapse of respect for the Lord's Day.

So it is in the face of powerfully debasing influences, and against a tradition that accepts too many violations of justice and decency, that right moral standards must be established among the people, and thereby established in public life. This is precisely the mission of the church in society; this is serving the cause of God. It will be difficult, but to say that it is impossible is to deny our faith. Step by step, zeal and holiness can lift men out of the swamp of materialism and immorality that has brought such disorder and unhappiness upon us.

Celler Reapportionment Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD the text of a statement I have submitted to the House Judiciary Committee regarding the Celler reapportionment bill—H. R. 2648—which the committee now has under consideration. I wholeheartedly support this legislation because I consider it an important step in the direction of eliminating abuses to which I refer in my statement.

My statement is as follows:

STATEMENT ON REAPPORTIONMENT (THE CELLER BILL, H. R. 2648)

The Celler bill, on which public hearings are now being held, goes to the very heart of representative government. Because of its deep significance I am happy to be permitted to present my views to the committee at this time.

When the United States Constitution was adopted, provision was made for representation in the Congress through two United States Senators representing States, embracing the total population of their respective States. It was also provided that the people in all the States shall have representation through their Representatives on the basis of equality of population.

James Madison, who played such a prominent role in the drafting of the Constitution, insisted that the legislatures of the States ought not to have the uncontrolled right of regulating the time, places, and manner of holding elections. This philosophy of fair and equal representation is indeed a foundation stone of representative government under our Constitution. In the constitutional debates it was clearly the view of the framers that each constituent should have equal voice with others throughout the land in the election of their representatives. It was equally stated that each representative should have as nearly as practicable an equal number of persons whom he represented.

Through the failure of Congress to establish standards for the States to follow in the election of the Members of the House of Representatives, some State legislatures have abused their power in carving out congressional districts within their States. Flagrant abuses have crept into our system of electing Representatives.

For instance, it was never intended that Members of the House should represent the whole population of a State except, of course, where a State does not have adequate population entitling it to more than one representative. As early as 1842 (in the Apportionment Act of that date) the Congress specifically spelled out this idea that representatives should be elected from specific districts and not at large. But we still have today examples of this abuse. A representative is elected at large in the State of Ohio, representing the total population of that State—approximately 8,000,000 persons. In that same State the Representative from the Fifth District has only 166,932 constituents. This makes a farce of representative government. In a lesser degree the same thing is true in Connecticut where one Representative is elected at large representing the entire State having a population of almost 2,000,000 persons in 1950. One congressional district (the Fifth) in this same State had in 1950 only 273,584 persons.

But the greatest abuse of all lies in the discrepancy in the size of population between districts within some of the States where no Representative is elected at large. Here are some examples from the 1950 census: For instance, in Ohio, the Twenty-second Congressional District contains a population of approximately 908,000, while the Fifth District contains approximately 167,000. In Texas, the Eighth District has a population of 802,000, while the Seventeenth District has only 226,000. California presents a similar picture with a spread of almost half a million population between the most populous and the smallest districts. Frankly, these are the most flagrant cases, but such inequality prevails in very many of the 48 States.

It is clear that such reapportionment made by the State legislatures, unregulated by the Congress, has led to a gross departure from the fundamental principle of representative government in our democracy. The framers of the Constitution would have viewed this existing situation with dismay. How far the State legislatures have wandered away from the ideal is further seen in the gerrymandering process in many States. Political parties which dominate the State legislatures indulge in the nefarious practice of so dividing up the States into congressional districts as to preserve their partisan political advantage; and, of course, to the disadvantage of the minority party. In this practice, no fair consideration is given to the people who reside in the districts affected.

To fully appreciate how gerrymandering is practiced, one has to study the maps to see the strange contours and shapes of the districts after they are carved out in the gerrymandering process.

As I read the Celler bill, H. R. 2648, I am persuaded that its provisions will go a long way toward eliminating the abuses to which I have referred. My understanding is that the bill does not take away from the State the function of carving out the congressional districts. The bill does, however, set up congressional standards to which the State must conform. The standards are those which it was always intended that the States themselves would use but have failed to do so. The Celler bill, for the first time, implies that the House, being the judge of its own Members, will use sanctions against any State that fails to conform to the standards set up in the bill.

I shall not enter into a discussion of the constitutionality of this proposed measure. The Honorable EMANUEL CELLER, chairman of this learned committee, has expressed his positive belief that the bill is constitutional and has cited court decisions to support his view.

Editorials, as well as the writings of nationally known columnists clearly reflect a public opinion favorable to the objectives of the Celler bill. I should like to cite a few examples:

One of the country's outstanding, if not the outstanding, newspaper, the New York Times, had this to say:

"In a recent message to Congress, President Truman rightly declared that 'it is fundamental to the whole structure of the Constitution that all citizens have equal representation, so far as practicable, in the House of Representatives.' This principle has been damaged over the years by the reluctance of State legislatures to alter the boundaries of congressional districts in conformity with the uneven growth of population; and it is this situation which the administration is now seeking to correct through legislation just introduced in Congress. * * * Whether the bill just introduced by Mr. CELLER to accomplish this purpose is too extreme is a fair subject for debate. Whether the proposed reform would benefit the Democrats rather than the Republicans, the city rather than the rural areas, is interesting but irrelevant. But the intent of equalizing the congressional representation within the States is sound, and certainly in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution."

From the deep South, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, after calling attention to some of the possible objections to the Celler bill, has this to say:

"But it can be said that it also would go far toward achieving the desirable objective of fair and equal representation of the State's population in Congress. Although under its terms Congress would go further than ever before in directing the State legislatures how to redistrict, it may be that the Texas Legislature would welcome such guidance."

In Ohio, the Cleveland Press editorial states that—

"He [CELLER] says the Supreme Court has held that Congress has power to set up standards which the States must follow. Citizens who believe that each American has a right to an equal and effective voice in the conduct of his Government should favor and work for adoption of such reforms as CELLER proposes."

From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette comes this statement:

"This is an excellent bill and should be speedily approved by Congress. Experience shows that the States aren't always scrupulous about seeing to that equality of representation in the House inherent in the Constitution. A club such as Mr. CELLER has fashioned would go a long way toward correcting their laxity."

These are typical of many editorial comments from various geographical sections of the country. It is true, of course, that there have also been editorials adverse to the Celler bill.

President Truman deserves great credit for having called the attention of the Congress and the country to the need for legislation dealing with this important subject. Congressman CELLER has implemented the President's recommendation in the proposal which I heartily endorse.

It's Your Food Supply

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to make some references to an extension of remarks by Senator JOHN SPARKMAN, of Alabama, in the RECORD of March 28.

Senator SPARKMAN's extension of remarks included an article by Lauren Soth of the magazine Successful Farming. The lead paragraph states:

America's No. 1 farm problem today is not fair prices for farmers. Neither is it adjustment of production, soil conservation, nor any of the other perplexing questions which have bothered farmers and the Government in recent years. It is manpower.

Mr. Soth's article is an intelligent discussion, and I commend its reading to all Members of Congress who have problems of farm manpower existent in their districts or in their States. Senator SPARKMAN is to be commended for making this timely and important contribution.

The farmers of this Nation have been asked to produce to the maximum. Being still free and with an intelligence enlarged by experiences dating as far back as 1914 through two wars and numerous emergencies, our farmers will of necessity take an inventory of the calculated risks that the coming tillage and harvest may involve. If manpower is to be short, they will plant those crops entailing the least demands for manpower. They may have to let their lands lay fallow. They must have manpower.

In any event we of the Congress cannot ignore or escape their problems. If those problems can be solved by our action—let us act.

SUPPLY STILL AFFECTS PRICES

Farm production is vital. Food and fiber rank high as defense material. Moreover, peak production of a balanced supply is the only economically sound means of just, equitable and inexpensive price control.

Those in urban areas might well withhold their comments on rural problems until they have thought through the entire procession of circumstances that may influence adequate supplies—and, therefore, by causing scarcities, force high prices. Too often this is not done. The clamor goes up for strong-arm legislation with its expensive corollary of administration, including sleuths and enforcement. And so, by superficial thinking and reactionary legislation to control a scarcity we add to the costs of government and further deplete an already short supply of labor.

There is, of course, a common purpose for American achievement. The present defense effort is one. If it is western civilization we are defending, let us know clearly what the virtues of western civilization are. Free producers, free production, and free markets could be one—but those virtues have long since been lost in the fogs of expediency. Yet, free production, ample production, today, is one of our goals. It is time that urban and rural America sought out and planted their feet firmly on common ground.

THE ISSUE MUST BE CLEAR

We do not lack evidence, today, of the basis of our differences. They have been well outlined.

The President's Commission on Migratory Labor has now issued its report. In the name of full farm production that report needs constructive criticism. Yesterday my colleague, the Honorable SAMUEL W. YORTY, of California, placed a most complete summary of that report in the Appendix of the RECORD along with editorial comment from the New York Times and a copy of President Truman's statement. Let me recommend, also, a reading of Mr. YORTY's extension to all those who would fully understand both sides of the American farmers' No. 1 problem.

Yesterday, also, the Washington Post had an editorial on migrant farm labor. It follows:

MIGRANT FARM LABOR

The exhaustive survey of social, economic, health, and educational conditions of farm migrants made by the President's Committee on Migratory Labor is a shocking exposé of official neglect and private exploitation—a story about men and women living in insanitary camps without community ties and "usually beyond the reach of local school, health, and welfare authorities." There are at least a million of these migrants, about half of whom are domestic workers. The other half is made up of approximately 100,000 Mexicans legally under contract, 400,000 so-called Mexican wetbacks, who have illegally entered the country by slipping across the land border or wading or swimming across the Rio Grande, and a small number of British West Indians and Puerto Ricans. These migratory workers supply only 3 to 4 percent of the man-days of work used to produce the Nation's farm output. The great majority are employed on some 125,000 large farms producing cotton, fruits, vegetables, and sugar beets. Nevertheless, they make important contributions to farm output and are in great demand at critical periods of crop production.

Since more farm labor will be needed this year to replace men entering the military services and to harvest an extended acreage, pressure for increased importation of foreign labor, chiefly Mexican, is mounting. However, the Commission concludes that no special measures should be taken to increase the number of alien contract laborers beyond the number admitted last year and that legalization for employment purposes of aliens illegally in the United States should be discontinued. "We are convinced," it declares, "that by better recruitment and placement of domestic labor, we would have eliminated most, if not all, of the occasion for the certifications of labor shortage during the years 1947–50."

In that connection the report sharply criticizes the practice of legalizing the status of "wetbacks" and giving them employment in preference to workers who have not violated our immigration laws. It charges, too, that field officers of the Immigration Service have been under pressure from Washington to go easy on deportations until crops have been harvested. It further implies that if the Farm Placement Division of the United States Employment Service had done a more effective recruitment and placement job at home, there would not have been a labor shortage requiring the importation of large numbers of aliens. As a matter of fact, the Commission received evidence that last year some American workers were actually dismissed to make way for contract Mexican labor.

Numerous recommendations are made by the Commission designed to raise the living standards of migrant farm labor, such as minimum wage legislation, establishment of Federal and State minimum housing standards, grants to the States to conduct health programs among migratory workers and vigorous enforcement of child-labor laws. These recommendations, which cover both alien and domestic migrants, provide evidence, if any were required, of shameful neglect of this group.

The problem growing out of our dependence on alien labor is only one aspect of the general problem of migratory labor, but it is an important one. For cheap foreign labor creates the very scarcities that lead to an influx of aliens willing to work for wages that are indecently low according to American standards. We agree with the Commission that our efforts in future should be directed toward increasing the number of our own farm workers and eliminating dependence on foreign labor.

Mr. Speaker, the editorial obviously presumes that there is a larger supply of available migrant farm labor in the United States than actually exists. For our own information, the principles involved and the actual practice of recruiting farm labor from existing domestic labor pools has been tried before. It was not successful for several reasons. First, those not employed in a period of high production are obviously those who will not be employed continuously or effectively in any economic situation.

The farmers of this Nation wish that this were not true. But, again, they have had actual experience with domestic labor, forcibly recruited—and often from those lists most unlikely to succeed as tillers of the soil or harvesters of crops for the tables of our cities and armed camps. Moreover, most of our effective producing rural areas are today mechanized and the era of specialization influences them also. Skill is as much a prerequisite on the modern farm as it is in the factory from whose shadows the migrant laborer may have been moved, at Government expense, both ways.

Let us note the conclusion of the above editorial:

The problem growing out of our dependence on alien labor is only one aspect of the general problem of migratory labor, but it is an important one, for cheap foreign labor creates the very scarcities that lead to an influx of aliens willing to work for wages that are indecently low according to American standards. We agree with the Commission that our efforts in the future should be directed toward increasing the number of our own farm workers and eliminating dependence on foreign labor.

I feel it a duty to point out the fallacies in this editorial's conclusions. There would be no demand for foreign labor were there an available supply of trained domestic farm labor; also, under programs which we finally had to resort to—in all logic—in World War II, Mexican and other foreign labor could not be designated as cheap. These programs were inaugurated under the full jurisdiction of the Agriculture, State, Labor, and Justice Departments. This labor was recruited legally where available farm-labor pools existed in Mexico and other foreign labor areas. This auxiliary labor was brought into the United States under complete regulation. There was no violation of the immigration laws. The wage scales paid were the same as those paid to other farm laborers of like ability and at the end of the contract period this labor was returned to its source. To say that this labor was employed for wages that are unusually low, obviously, points up one of the difficulties that exists in our society today by reason of a jumping at conclusions already existing in a closed mind.

Let me conclude these remarks by again stating that the Congress of the United States has a real problem on its hands as the farmers of this Nation face the task of supplying you and the defense effort with the food and fibers necessary to a successful conclusion of the national responsibility which faces 150,000,000 Americans.

The MacArthur Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAGE BELCHER
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. BELCHER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Washington Daily News on April 9, 1951:

THE MACARTHUR ISSUE

President Truman and his political and military advisers are in a quandary over what to do about General MacArthur.

Involved in that decision is the larger and more perplexing problem of what to do about the Korean war.

General MacArthur would have been relieved of his command long ago were it not for the fact that his return would focus the attention of Congress and the country on questions he has raised which the administration would rather not discuss.

The very thought of the colorful commander relating the untold part of his story to a congressional committee, and the vast audiences such committees now command, could cause sleepless nights in some high places.

The vital question, of course, is the matter of bringing the war in Korea to a successful end. If the President has such a plan, he has kept it to himself.

All the proposals General MacArthur has made have been vetoed by the White House, in concert with the British Foreign Office—or possibly under prodding by it.

He wanted to bomb the Chinese railways and the Manchurian bases which were supplying the enemy, but the answer was no.

He wanted to allow the Chinese Nationalists to open a second front on their own mainland. Again the answer was no.

Most inexplicable of all is why South Korean recruits are not being armed and trained eventually to relieve our troops. When he was asked why this was not being done, General MacArthur replied that it was due to "political considerations" over which he had no control.

If he were relieved of his command and called before Congress, the general probably would explain just what these political considerations were. They could be interesting.

Why should Americans bear the brunt of the fighting when there are Asiatics who could do so, if they were given the equipment and permitted to fight?

General MacArthur is on the spot only because he has raised these questions, despite the attempts to silence him. Even most of the second guessers now concede his handling of the war itself has been admirable, particularly considering his limited resources and the restrictions imposed upon him.

Recalling or reprimanding General MacArthur will not clarify the question of our war objectives, and it must be clarified. Nothing will be settled by trying to silence the legitimate spokesmen for the American troops who are fighting in Korea and who want to know why they are there. That is the issue.

American intervention in Korea as an agency of the United Nations made sense when it was understood to be a part of a larger plan drawing a line against further Communist aggression everywhere. But that plan has been abandoned in favor of appeasement, under pressure from Britain and India.

So what are we fighting for now?

Are we merely holding a line, at a fearful cost in American lives, until the Communists can be bought off by giving them Formosa, and perhaps additional territory? Nothing else can be inferred from the only plans for a settlement which have been approved or seriously entertained by the United Nations.

General MacArthur has repeatedly asked for new instructions, but has received none. In the absence of such instructions, he has offered his own plan to win the war. That has been disapproved without the formality of a vote by the organization he is supposed to be serving. So there is no plan. That is General MacArthur's complaint, and it is a legitimate one.

If President Truman will take counsel with himself he will see that the fault is not with his commander in the field but with the British Socialists and their yes men and fellow travelers in the State Department who have taken the conduct of the war out of the general's hands and now do not know what to do with it.

How United States Dollars Have Been Arming Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which I prepared for the April issue of the Reader's Digest:

HOW UNITED STATES DOLLARS HAVE BEEN ARMING RUSSIA

(By Hon. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD, of Illinois)

American dollars and American technical skill built the Russian military juggernaut. Over the last 10 years, the tremendous industrial capacity of the United States has been the principal source of supply for iron-curtain armament. Without the strategic raw materials and critical machine tools supplied, directly and indirectly, by American dollars, the Kremlin's imperialistic war engine could not have attained its present menacing power.

We began in the years 1941–46 with $11,000,000,000 in lend-lease gifts to Russia. We contributed almost $2,000,000,000 to her between the years 1945 and 1947 under the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. In April 1948 we launched the Marshall plan. Although Russia was excluded from direct participation in its $15,000,000,000 fund, she was aided immeasurably by indirect trade through the 16 Marshall-plan countries.

The ruble area has received from these countries about $2,500,000,000 in raw materials, tools, and critical machinery—the very sinews of war. We supplied the raw materials to Western Europe in the form of Marshall plan gifts. Western Europe fabricated the essential industrial products required for the Kremlin arsenal, and traded them eastward for wheat, cotton, grains, caviar, tobacco, furs, and ores.

Not until December 1950, when the Hungnam evacuation was under way in North Korea, did our State Department begin to close the leaks in the Marshall plan pipeline. In the preceding decade, United States contributions, direct and indirect, commercial and governmental, to the Kremlin war machine totaled $16,000,000,000.

Two additional decisions in United States foreign policy after 1945 further strengthened Russia's industrial potential for war. We permitted the removal from Germany of several billions of dollars' worth of key industrial plants—machinery, tools, equipment, and skilled manpower. While these plants were being dismantled and moved to Russia, we were supplying, under the Marshall plan, tools and materials with which to rebuild, in part, the identical industries in Western Germany, as necessary to general European recovery. And on the other side of the world we withdrew all support from the Chinese Nationalists, while we permitted Russia to take over the vast industrial potential of Manchuria.

With these industrial resources from Germany and Manchuria, plus freedom of trade with all Marshall plan recipients, Russia soon emerged as a dominant industrial power of Europe and Asia.

Our lend-lease gifts gave Russia her first free access to American industrial secrets. Complete industrial plants were transported behind the Urals. The catalog of plants shipped to Soviet territory included three oil refineries and a tire factory. We also provided an electric-power program, which cost $135,000,000; a railroad-improvement program; and a steel-expansion program which involved more than $300,000,000.

At the same time the Soviet purchasing mission, which at one time numbered 1,500 especially schooled spies, was permitted by us to inspect, document, and photograph significant industrial centers in the United States.

Direct shipment of atom-bomb materials to Russia from the lend-lease air terminal at Great Falls, Mont., in February 1944, is recorded in the annual report of the House Committee on Un-American Activities for 1950:

"The United States, through actions of the Office of the Foreign Economic Administration, had licensed for export to the Soviet Union materials vital to the production of the atom bomb. The Soviet Union received on one occasion a shipment of 200 pounds of uranium nitrate. On another occasion it received a shipment of 468 pounds of uranium oxide, 1,000 pounds of uranium nitrate, 2 shipments of heavy water, and 25 pounds of uranium metal.

"Investigation further disclosed that the Soviet Union was permitted, without regard to censorship or customs-inspection regulations, to send out of the United States blueprints of the General Electric plant at Lynn, Mass.; diagrams of an electrically operated ship developed by the Groton, Conn., shipbuilding works; diagrams of an A–20 type military craft; and other blueprints and data relating to our industrial strength."

The committee reported that Semen Vasilenko, a member of the Soviet purchasing commission in Washington, returned to Moscow early in 1944 carrying "six bags containing special information concerning metallurgical research and other developments vital to the military. Vasilenko today is head of the production of metal pipes and tools in the Soviet Union."

This intensive course in American industrial methods was aided further by another act of incredible American naïveté. Immediately after the war the Department of Commerce allowed Russia free access to all American patents, of which some 13,000 were microfilmed for transmission to Moscow. Through this Department we also gave Russia access to almost all the technical and scientific secrets obtained from the Germans by our occupation forces in Europe.

Russia got approximately 30 percent of all our lend-lease grants. The list of things we gave her is too long to cite here, but an idea of its scope can be gained from these few items: 376,000 motor trucks; 7,056 tanks; 51,503 jeeps; 345,000 tons of explosives; 15,417,000 pairs of Army boots; $1,100,000,000 worth of machinery and tools.

The basic tools, equipment, and metals thus obtained were the seedbed of Russia's postwar military expansion—and her diplomatic arrogance. Despite the tremendous destruction wrought on her by the Nazi invasion, Russia's industrial production for 1948, measured in over-all tonnage, began to approach her prewar volume of 1940.

This revitalized productive capacity was aimed primarily at future military potential. By 1946, to illustrate, Russia's production of heavy capital goods was 14 percent above 1940, while her production of consumers' goods was still 43 percent below 1940. So marked was the development of Stalin's military potential that the House Committee on Foreign Aid (the Herter committee) reported in April 1948: "It would appear incorrect to argue that the Soviet Union is not now strong enough to undertake substantial military operations."

Despite this clear warning, our diplomatic policy continued to provide the iron-curtain area, through normal trade channels, with every basic and scarce item required for its expanding military machine. In a press conference in November 1947, President Truman stated that he saw no reason to interfere with shipments of industrial equipment needed by Russia for postwar reconstruction. In line with this policy, United States exports to Russia and her European satellites in 1947 amounted to $432,000,000, including $81,000,000 worth of industrial machinery and $23,000,000 in machine tools.

W. Averell Harriman, roving ambassador under the Marshall plan, was questioned about our trade with Russia by the House Foreign Affairs Committee in January 1948. He stoutly rejected the suggestion of an airtight military embargo against the ruble area. So did ECA Administrator Paul G. Hoffman when he testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in February 1950.

Under this policy, every attempt in Congress to curb around-the-corner shipments of strategic tools and materials to Russia from Marshall plan countries met with determined opposition, not only from the State and Commerce Departments and ECA, but from the White House as well.

As soon as the Marshall plan became effective in April 1948, the European nations began carrying out a series of trade treaties to facilitate exchange of western industrial products for Russian wheat, furs, and minerals. By January 1950 there were 96 such treaties in effect between Eastern and Western Europe.

The British Internal Combustion Engine Manufacturers' Association, as one example, disclosed that Russia had obtained from Britain $34,129,037 worth of electrical generators and powerhouse equipment during the years 1946–50. This represented about 28 percent of the entire British export of these items. It was under these same trade treaties that Britain shipped to Communist China in July 1950—the first month after the Korean aggression—650,000 gallons of gasoline and 9,000 tons of rubber.

In one 3-month period in 1950, Britain shipped $42,532,000 worth of machinery and basic war materials to the iron curtain nations. During the same period, Italy shipped $26,897,000; France, $18,694,000; Belgium, $19,603,000. Here is more than $100,000,000 in war potential shipped to Russia from Western Europe in 3 months.

The frank willingness of many of Western Germany's industrialists to continue to do business with Russia results also in a steady flow of goods through the interzonal border. The rate of these shipments, substantially increased since the Bonn government assumed control over all German exports, is now estimated at about $230,000,000 a year. Such shipments include sheet and tubular steel, ball bearings, machine tools, rubber and copper.

In Vienna the energetic Soviet-manned International Trading Corp. is busily rounding up strategic material for Russia, sneaking Marshall plan goods under the iron curtain at a rate of $4,000,000 worth each week.

Our Marshall plan grants to Europe during the first quarter of 1950 were $770,000,000. During those same months Western Europe shipped $176,000,000 in machinery and strategic materials to Russia and the iron curtain arsenal. These official figures mean that, indirectly, Russia got about 22 cents of every Marshall plan dollar to help build her war machine.

In the original Marshall plan authorization, Congress inserted two provisions specifically designed to head off sales of critical and strategic materials to Russia by nations that were given Marshall plan aid. The first directed the ECA, "in the interest of national security," to "refuse delivery insofar as practicable" of materials to be manufactured into products for a nonparticipating country, if the finished product would be refused an export license by the United States of America. A second safeguarding amendment authorized ECA to challenge any export license to a nonparticipating country if it deemed the transaction inconsistent with the major purposes of the European reconstruction program.

To what extent did the administration enforce these provisions? One revealing answer is found in the address on August 26, 1950, of Representative RUSSELL V. MACK, of Washington, in the House: "In 1949 these western democracies, to whom we are supplying arms, sold more than $1,000,000,000 in supplies to Russia and her satellites. If we want the nations of Western Europe to cease trading with the enemy, we must stop trading with the enemy ourselves. Several Congressmen, including myself, have implored the State Department to stop this senseless business of supplying the Russians, by our trade with them, American dollars with which to buy war supplies."

On November 29, 1950, the O'Conor subcommittee of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee reported: "We found that shipments to Red China have gone forward in substantial quantities from both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of our country, even after the Communist attack on Korea last June." Among the shipments were 15,000,000 gallons of petroleum products; 10,000 tons of steel plate; 4,500,000 pounds of copper ingots; 5,347,000 pounds of tin plate. These shocking revelations precipitated the embargo on American shipments to China in December 1950.

Public opinion is aroused and indignant. If Congress faithfully reflects the mood of America it will say, in effect: "Not one dollar for any country which supplies, directly or indirectly, an iota of military potential to the Kremlin's arsenal of aggression."

Big Business, Big Profits Under Our Democratic Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, during my absence I received from Mr. A. B. Kaiser, general manager of the tax department of Sears, Roebuck & Co., a copy of an address which he delivered in Chicago on March 8, 1951. It is quite lengthy, which prevents my inserting it in the RECORD. In the speech he criticizes and complains unfairly and without reason or justification against the Democratic administration. He sheds crocodile tears about business conditions and finds fault in general. To my mind his statements were ridiculous, especially since his firm had a deficit of over $2,500,000 in 1932—the last Republican year—but whose profits during the Democratic administration of which he complains so bitterly, both before and after taxes, mounted to heights never before attained in history, as is the case with most other big business.

Sears, Roebuck & Co. made profits of well over $1,500,000,000 before taxes and almost a billion dollars after taxes under this Democratic administration. I note in the press of April 10 that business corporations paid cash dividends of almost $8,000,000,000 in 1950, which is almost 20 percent over the 1949 banner year figure. The December figure of almost two billions was 45 percent higher than for December 1949.

I sent a letter to Mr. Kaiser which I am inserting with my remarks, giving him the true facts, in an effort to set him right, and in the hope that other men in high position with big business will take notice and not make such unwarranted and untrue accusations and statements.

Mr. A. R. KAISER,
Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. KAISER: I have seen a copy of your address, Socialism and Polio, and would like to make a few comments thereon.

I also am opposed to waste in government—and elsewhere—but apparently you regard as wasteful the whole successful program of the Democratic administration for the past 18 years. As has been done for 18 years, you prate about the impending "bankruptcy." You cast your eyes backward to the "good" old pre-New Deal days of President Hoover.

Perhaps you would like the country—and Sears, Roebuck & Co.—to enjoy such prosperity as was ours under Hoover's Republican administration. Need I remind you that at the end of this administration—for Sears' accounting period ending January 28, 1933—your company sustained a deficit of over two and one-half million dollars? Being somewhat more practical, I would appreciate receiving the "loss" sustained by Sears, Roebuck during the 18 years of Democratic administration, which you claim is bringing rack and ruin to the business of the Nation. The administration which you consider a socialistic-communistic dictatorship enabled your company to make profits of about $1,663,000,000. In one fiscal year alone, you made over $253,000,000.

By the first year of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's second term, your company was making far greater profits than it made during 1929, the peak year of the Republican boom economy. These profits were made of sturdier material than those of the twenties; they were to continue and to increase. They resulted from President Roosevelt's fundamental idea that a sound economy must be based on the policy of getting purchasing power into the hands of the average man. This average man is the person who buys your products. If he does not have the funds to buy, you will again get the good old days of Hooverism—if that is what you want.

The truth of the matter is that business sometimes has to be pushed into doing what is really best for it. Judging from your remarks, some segments of our business community have not yet learned that what helps the average man is in the long run helpful to their business. I might remind you that business prospers more on a large volume with high wages and fair prices than it does when low wages and unemployment prevail and prices are kept artificially higher than they would be under competitive conditions.

Let me close with a word about our unbalanced budget in the postwar years of prosperity. President Truman did his best to give the country a balanced budget, but the big taxpayers had enough influence to override his ideas and have their rates cut and have loopholes created, by which they could avoid paying their just share of the Nation's tax burden.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. SABATH,
Member of Congress.

Resignation of Hon. M. E. Thompson from Office of Price Stabilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the taxpaying public are continually asking where their tax dollar goes. This case of former Governor Thompson, of Georgia, which I am inserting under unanimous consent, of undisclosed parasites can be multiplied hundreds of times.

REFUSING TO BE TAX PARASITE, OPS OFFICIAL QUITS IN DISGUST—CONSULTANT AT $53.48 A DAY

Former Gov. M. E. Thompson, of Georgia, yesterday quit as a consultant with the Office of Price Stabilization, charging that "official Washington is drifting in a sea of confusion, inefficiency, waste and extravagance."

Thompson said in a statement that he came to Washington as codirector for territories for OPS.

"Knowing that it was impossible to have two directors for the same job," Thompson said, "I offered to resign and accept another assignment."

But, he added:

"For 12 weeks I have been carried on the payroll as a consultant at a salary, plus expense account, of $53.48 per day. Yet, during this time, I have been consulted about nothing. I have had no assignment to do anything.

"On February 19 at the White House, I told the President the story up until then. He called Don Dawson (Presidential assistant) and instructed him to see that the mess was straightened out immediately. It hasn't been done.

"Under the circumstances, I refuse to accept salary and expense money from the taxpayers when I am rendering no public service.

"I am resigning and returning to my home in Valdosta, Ga., I refuse to be a parasite on the American taxpayers."

Thompson said that there are "thousands upon thousands of others who are rendering no service but are on the public payroll, not only in Washington but throughout the United States."

He charged that no real effort has been made to stabilize prices.

"Even those charged with the responsibility have contributed to the upward surge of prices by deliberately predicting higher prices," he said.

"While the price spiral continues to rise, the bottom is dropping out of moral values."

He continued that "thousands of loyal Americans are giving unselfishly of their time to defense work, but their efforts are being nullified by the indecision, bungling, and interference of scheming politicians who are motivated solely by their desire to stay in power. The American people are being victimized by a national conspiracy of mediocrity."

Thompson, a Democrat, said that now is the time for "the people of America to make plans to free themselves in 1952 from the gang that has led the people into this mess.

"And as for me, I will not support the Democratic Party in the national election in 1952 unless its banner is rescued from the greedy hands of the gang now hiding behind it for protection. If this be political treason, make the most of it."

Thompson said that no one could question his record of unfaltering loyalty to the Democratic administration.

He said that in 1948 when the States rights movement split the South, "my efforts resulted in Georgia remaining loyal to the Democratic Party."

But he continued:

"Conditions existing in the national administration are so deplorable today that loyalty to party and patriotism to country constitute a conflict."

Thompson said that in Washington the "only refuge being held out to a confused people is the sign of the double cross."

Explaining his job status with OPS, Thompson said he received a telegram last January 21 from OPS Director Michael DiSalle "asking me to come to Washington to accept the job of regional director of OPS with headquarters in Atlanta. I accepted."

En route, Thompson said he was intercepted in Atlanta by telephone calls from the Democratic National Committee "telling me that Dixiecrat Herman Talmadge, Governor of Georgia, was protesting my appointment."

Arriving in Washington, I reported to Mr. DiSalle's office. Mr. DiSalle refused to see me, and I was told to report first to the Democratic National Committee office. There I was requested to accept the directorship of OPS for Territories. For the sake of harmony in the defense effort I agreed to accept.

"For 8 days I remained in my hotel expecting any moment to be assigned to the duties of the office, and when the assignment was made I was amazed to learn that another man and I were at the same time to be sworn in for the same office, at the same salaries and with the same duties.

"During the next 2 weeks, nothing was done and no program for administration of price controls in the Territories was promulgated."

Thompson was sworn in as codirector along with former Mayor Herbert Meighan, of Gadsden, Ala.

Thompson told a reporter he submitted his resignation to DiSalle yesterday afternoon.

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—DiSalle last night said in a statement that Thompson actually was sworn in as Acting Deputy Director of the fourteenth region but was dissatisfied with the role of deputy.

("Many times as I worked late at night," DiSalle said, "he would call me from his hotel room complaining bitterly of his lot as deputy. * * * I asked him to be patient * * * until we could find a position that suited him and fitted his capabilities. We finally determined that in view of the fact that he was a former governor he might be helpful in contacting governors and other State officials in explaining the price-control program and the part they might play in making the program a success.

(DiSalle said "It is to be regretted that in the administration of a very important program the action of 1 employee out of 4,000 should necessitate the taking of time to make this statement."

(White House Press Secretary Joseph Short knew nothing about Thompson's blast until reporters called it to his attention in the late afternoon. President Truman had left his office for Blair House, and Administrative Assistant Dawson was in El Dorado Springs, Mo., where he went to visit his ailing father.

(Short said he would try to find out something about the Thompson matter today.)

All Should Be Dealt With Alike

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Herald-News, Passaic, N. J., for April 4, 1951:

ALL SHOULD BE DEALT WITH ALIKE

The draft is the democratic way of raising a wartime army. It treats all men alike. If a young man is physically fit and of sound mind, he goes into service when he reaches military age. In an expanding army a young fellow with intelligence and the right attitude has a good chance to get ahead.

The Army needs men with special skills. It gets them from its manpower pool of buck privates by trade-testing those whose records show previous experience. That's how it selects truck drivers, telephone linemen, and bridge builders. That's how premedical men could be routed back to professional study after completing basic training.

A soldierly bearing and a high I. Q. in his intelligence test is a recruit's passport to officer candidates' school. Many a rookie has gone from private to major in the draft army.

That's the way it was and that's the way it should be. But from now on it's not going to be that way.

President Truman's Executive order, which authorizes selective service boards to defer the bright college boys, will make many a veteran of 1917–18 and 1941–45 ask himself, "Who sold the President that idea?"

With more than a million nonveterans in college now and more coming up, no one knows how many hundred thousand students will be exempted from service because they had good grades or because they will be able to pass the aptitude tests to be given on May 26 and June 16 and 30.

The order prompted many a cynical remark by boys who are crowding closer to the draft age. The policy makers in the Defense Department ought to hear what is being said. What this order will do to the morale of men fighting in Korea today is your guess, or anybody's.

Mr. Truman has set up a caste system. Nobody would suggest that a medical student be yanked out of school and put into camp, or that a research student in chemistry should be denied a deferment. But why exempt a bright lad who is spending 4 years in a liberal arts college simply because it's the thing to do and because his father can afford to send him? And why put a uniform on the boy who decided to learn a trade at 17 if the school athlete can beat the draft by proving his aptitude for a career in physical education? Let's apply the UMT principle, which means everyone fit for service undergoes training.

After the First World War the American Legion, in national convention, made a ringing declaration for an all-inclusive draft of manpower and other national resources, if war came again. Has the Legion forgotten its high resolution of a bygone day?

Every post in the country ought to make itself heard so that sentiment back home can find expression in Congress.

Continuance of Reconstruction Finance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER K. GRANGER
OF UTAH
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to make available to each Member of Congress the fine statement made by Director Walter E. Cosgriff, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in defense of that agency. As you know, Director Cosgriff's appointment to this board was made just last August, and so he has not been with the RFC long enough to be biased, but long enough to know of its value to small businesses. His reasons for the continuation of the RFC as an experienced banker can, I assume, be accepted at face value. Certainly no one will challenge his figures.

The matter follows:

Assailing the privately owned national banking system for failing in its job, Reconstruction Finance Corporation Director Walter E. Cosgriff yesterday called for a house cleaning of "those who have abused authority." He urged the continuance of RFC as an essential to American economy.

The former president of a 16-unit western banking chain and the only RFC director so far untouched by Fulbright committee criticism, Mr. Cosgriff answered in an interview those calling for abolition of the loan agency.

"No one called for abolition of the Army when Maj. Gen. Benny Meyers went to jail," Mr. Cosgriff protested.

The 19-year-old RFC must continue, he contends, "because the Nation's private banking system is either unable or unwilling to meet national credit needs."

SAYS AGENCY MUST CONTINUE

"If both long-term loans and the financing of such large new enterprises as the Kaiser-Frazer Corp. were available in the regular credit market, I would favor abolishing RFC even if Abraham Lincoln were its single administrator," Mr. Cosgriff said. "But private banks are not doing the job and, for that reason, I, as a Republican, believe the abusers of authority—including myself, if I'm guilty—should be turned out and the agency continued."

To document his charge of banking failure, the 37-year-old Salt Lake City banker who became an RFC director last August cited key RFC statistics: 631,351 business loans totaling $16,000,000,000 made over 19 years with only $134,000,000 of bad loans and a $600,000,000 net profit to the Federal Government.

"With all the scandal, the influence and the favoritism," he said, "the RFC has a loss record of about 1 percent on more than 600,000 loans. Each of these loans was made after the applicant produced certifications from the bank with which he does business, and from one other, that credit was unavailable. That our 'bank reject' loans pay out 99 percent seems sufficient evidence that banks are not servicing legitimate credit needs."

PRIVATE BANKS SHUN RISK

Mr. Cosgriff says American bankers fail in today's obligations because Government-backed bonds and guaranteed home loans lead them to shun business risks.

"Business that could have got private credit in 1910 are today denied it," he said. "Kaiser-Frazer is an example. Kaiser came to the RFC for $666,000,000, first, because big banks that could have made the loan listened to his competitors who did not want it made and secondly, because it was simpler and safer for them to put their cash in Government 'sure things.'

"This typifies a fundamental change in a banking system which, until the 1930's lived off the interest from business loans. In the last 20 years bank deposits have multiplied and, simultaneously, Government bond issues and guaranteed mortgages have offered profitable and sure investments."

"The result," said Mr. Cosgriff, "is that American bankers have turned their backs on the business loans with which America was built."

"I am against wild banking," he insisted, "but the pendulum has now swung too far to the conservative side."

The RFC Director agrees with the Hoover Commission that Government guaranties of business loans, similar to FHA insurance of home loans, would be better than direct Federal advances to private borrowers. But he added:

BANKERS' GROUPS KILL PLAN

"Every time a definite business-loan-guaranty plan is advanced," he said, "the American Bankers Association and other powerful groups kill it in congressional committee."

Since its 1932 birthday, the "average" RFC loan has been for $35,000, and 19 out of every 20 loans made have been for less than $100,000, he said.

"The Commerce Department counts 3,000,000 so-called small businesses. Our record of 500,000 small loans means we have helped 1 out of every 6 of them at some time or other."

In Fairness to All

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the New York Daily Mirror, April 3, 1951, published as a public service by a group of leading citizens of Greater Lynn, Mass.:

ORCHESTRA OF EIGHT MILLION

We wish to congratulate three fine Americans of our city: Judge Irving R. Kaufman, who presided over the court which tried the atom-bomb spies, and United States Attorney Irving H. Saypol and his assistant, Roy Cohn, who prosecuted and convicted those spies, Julius Rosenberg, Ethel Rosenberg, and Morton Sobell.

Some bigots will say the three spies are Jews and will denounce all Jews. They will forget to say that the judge, the prosecutor, and his assistant who did such a magnificent job for America, are also Jews.

The unfairness of drawing general conclusions from particular instances; the indecency of fixing a universal stereotype from a bad type is here exemplified.

It would be like saying that all the fine Americans of Italian descent in our city are like Frank Costello or Joe Adonis, rather than Arturo Toscanini or our Mayor Vincent Impellitterri.

It would be like saying that all the hard-working, decent Negroes in our city are like Paul Robeson, instead of like Ralph Bunche or Jackie Robinson.

It would be like saying that all the Americans in our city of Anglo-Saxon stock are like Alger Hiss, instead of like Bishop Sherrill.

It would be like saying that all Irishmen are like "Cockeye" Dunn, instead of like John Coleman and Gen. Rosie O'Donnell.

There is no logic in drawing false conclusions from a minimum of facts. Who dares say this Rosenberg creature is typical of our citizens of Jewish persuasion, when against him can be pitted millions of Americans such as Bernard M. Baruch, Bernard Gimbel, Jesse Isidor Straus, Barney Balaban, Admiral Lewis Strauss, Chaplain Joshua Goldberg, Rudolph Halley, and so many others who come quickly to mind?

We raise this very sensitive question because our city is the home of citizens of fairly immediate foreign origin. Of course, we are all of foreign origin at one time, and the history of our city shows that when a group became "old timers" they tended to look down on the "newcomers."

In a list of the white population in 1940 whose mother tongue was other than English, there were 429,000 Germans, 896,000 Italians, 163,000 Poles, 149,000 Russians, 121,000 Spaniards, and 911,000 who spoke Yiddish, a Germanic dialect used by Jews. Altogether this list included more than 26 varieties of "mother tongues" for a total of 3,000,000 persons.

Undoubtedly, during the past 10 years, this list has decreased, for the pattern is constant in our city, namely, that by the third generation the process of relating the "newcomer" to America completes itself and the "newcomers" become "old timers."

But we are not a melting pot, as Israel Zangwill so graphically described us. We are more like a symphony orchestra, in which men play various instruments, violins, 'cellos, flutes, oboes, trumpets, drums, and so on. Each plays differently; yet out of their differences comes the glorious Beethoven's Fifth or even George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue.

Harmony means neither sameness nor monotony. It does mean cooperation, self-discipline, and teamwork.

Of course there will sometimes be a devil who plays out of tune and out of time. He has to be straightened out or kicked out.

But because there is one sour note, we do not tear down Carnegie Hall.

Hon. William T. Granahan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. BARRETT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to place in the RECORD mention of a fine tribute accorded a distinguished fellow Member of the House of Representatives, WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN, of the Second Congressional District. On Wednesday, February 21, 1951, my colleague from the city of Philadelphia was awarded a life membership in the American Legion, Breen-McCracken Post 270, of that city. Presentation of the life membership, accompanied by a gold membership card, was made by the Honorable Vincent A. Carroll, judge of the Court of Common Pleas No. 2, of Philadelphia; and participating in the special presentation ceremonies were Welden M. Trauger, commander of Breen-McCracken Post; Harry Stinger, national committeeman of the American Legion; James Aitkins, sixth district commander; and John Stay, fourth district commander of the American Legion.

This high honor was bestowed upon Representative GRANAHAN in recognition of his tireless efforts in behalf of veterans' legislation and American Legion activities. A veteran of World War I and an active member of the Legion of long standing, Representative GRANAHAN'S sympathetic, understanding work in behalf of veterans' legislation has ever been in the highest tradition of American citizenship, and as an able and responsible representative of his constituents in our National Government. It is with pleasure that I record the high tribute and honor bestowed upon Representative GRANAHAN and express my firm conviction, as well as the feeling of others among his colleagues, that the recognition conferred upon him is well deserved and likewise reflects credit upon Breen-McCracken Post of the American Legion.

The New Draft Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by the president of Princeton University which I feel should be brought to the attention of all Members of Congress. Dr. Dodds made this statement on the contemplated change in our selective service policy on Sunday, April 8, 1951.

This distinguished educator calls the new policy "wrong for the country" and feels that college students generally have suffered because of the temporizing in Washington on the draft situation.

The statement follows:

As one who has consistently believed that universal military training and service is essential in the present world situation, I naturally view the proposal for almost blanket deferment of college students as wrong for the Nation and detrimental to the best interests of the colleges in the long run.

The Executive order places college students, as such, in a preferred position which entirely misrepresents their basic patriotism and willingness to serve. On the other hand, the proposal to defer students in subjects essential to the defense effort is sound and should be preserved. The impact on the morale of troops now in service of any program of college deferment beyond essential needs is obvious.

I yield to no one in the importance I attribute to the national need for young men broadly educated in the fields of humanities and social sciences. If, as I hope, a system of universal-military training is adopted promptly, these values need suffer no essential loss once that system is established and the rotation of men through the armed services permits a return of the college population to normal.

To be sure, the period of transition will create the gravest difficulties in the educational world. But I believe that these difficulties can be resolved without resort to a deferment policy so broad and so little selective as the Executive order contemplates.

College students have suffered greatly from the strains imposed by the temporizing in Washington and continued confusion over the Government's plans for the immediate future. They can and will adjust patriotically to national needs.

As one close to the strains they have been under and sympathetic to them, I hope that the present confusion will be quickly resolved in the interest of the principle of share and share alike in posts in which the individual's services will count for most.

After all, this is what the college men want. And I believe it preferable to protecting them against interruption of their college careers, which would react adversely upon their influence as future leaders and the long-time values of the subjects they are studying.

What Price Patriotism?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an article titled "What Price Patriotism?" This article was written by Dr. J. Ollie Edmunds, president of John B. Stetson University, at DeLand, Fla. It follows:

WHAT PRICE PATRIOTISM?

There is no evidence to suggest that Lord Macaulay was an especially malicious individual, but if he was, and if he were alive today, he might very well be rubbing his hands and preparing to say, "I told you so." That sagacious English statesman didn't think very highly of Thomas Jefferson's ideas and he predicted that the democratic government which Jefferson evolved for America would crack up about now. He declared that one of two things would happen: (1) Either "some Caesar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand" or (2) "your Republic will be as fearfully plundered * * * by barbarians of the twentieth century as the Roman Empire was in the fifth; with this difference * * * the Huns and Vandals who ravished the Roman Empire came from without. * * * Your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own institutions."

Macaulay was pretty sure that pressure groups eventually would bring about the Nation's downfall by electing legislators who would hand over to them the wealth created by others. He thought of pressure groups in terms of workingmen hearing their "children cry for more bread," for he came along several generations too soon to think in terms of political action committees, farm blocs, veterans' organizations, old-age pension clubs, manufacturers' associations, and similar symbols of an age in which most of us are less worried about getting bread than we are tires.

If pressure groups didn't cause the crash, he figured that some strongly entrenched group (he thought it would be the military) would do the trick by depriving us of our liberty in their efforts to save order and prosperity. Such pessimistic conclusions were not arrived at impulsively. Macaulay watched our Government in operation for half a century before he made his dire predictions. He did not expect to see the smash-up in his time, but he said, "Your fate I believe certain, though it is deferred."

Today thoughtful Americans are wondering a bit fearfully just how good a prophet Macaulay was. They see the shadow of the Government growing larger and that of the individual citizen growing smaller. They see free enterprise becoming restricted enterprise. Even in the face of socialistic disillusionment abroad, they see Americans who, under private management, have made themselves the most prosperous and successful people on earth, being gently coaxed into trying Government management—with pennies from their own till. They see Washington swarming with economic doctors, who, though pleased with the golden eggs, are itching to operate on the goose.

These economic experimenters are causing increasing concern to many citizens. Now, with so much of our attention focused on our tremendously vital defense effort, the set-up should be about perfect for them. With powerful propaganda machines at their command, millions of dollars of tax money to play with, and almost everybody looking the other direction, they should be in a position to "correct the shortcomings of our democratic form of government" to their hearts' content.

What will our Government be like when the smoke lifts? Will these well-meaning planners turn out to be a twentieth-century variety of kind Huns and gentle vandals (armed with pens instead of spears) who will, with the most altruistic intentions, destroy our time-tested way of life if we don't watch out? Nations catch socialism in two ways: Either they are exposed to it through revolution or, as is the case with creeping socialism, they breathe too long the stagnant air of apathy.

With uncanny foresight, Macaulay pointed out some of the problems that would be facing us a century after his death. But the most important factor of all he overlooked—the one thing that can save us from the fate he predicted; that is, the character of the American people—the fact that when they get their back up Americans can be a strong for preserving their Government as he thought they would be for overthrowing it. He failed to realize that by the middle of the twentieth century most Americans would still like their form of government—imperfect though it is. He thought their selfishness would be the rock upon which their ship of state would be wrecked. What he did not foresee was that out of the self-reliance and individual initiative engendered by their institutions the great body of Americans—both inside and outside of pressure groups—would have become so contented and prosperous that their selfish desires would be less compelling than the deep pride they would have in their country. Loyalty—though he did not know it—will dissipate selfishness and apathy, too. He failed to take into account that wonderful thing called patriotism.

We are likely to be hearing a great deal about patriotism in the months ahead. It is probable that a lot of strange items will be offered in patriotic wrappers. It might be a good idea to take time out to discover just what patriotism is. Exactly what is this powerful force that can upset Macaulay's unhappy calculations? What does it require of us as individuals?

Dictionary definitions are inadequate. Patriotism is more than "love of ones' country"; it involves attitude, alertness, action. It requires, first of all, a deep conviction that the principles for which our country stands are right. It implies a personal determination to guard these standards, not from change, but from unwise change, or change slipped over on us. It connotes an active loyalty—not the kind that lets George do it.

There are two kinds of patriotism. The wartime patriotism which all of us know about, and a deeper, less emotional kind—the patriotism of peace. The first kind we usually turn on and off on holidays and during war scares. The other is something continuous, an element in our character like self-respect, good sportsmanship, or love of one's family.

Like freedom, patriotism is not free. The price was high at Valley Forge; it is higher today in Korea. For us at home, there is a price. We must believe fervently in our country's basic ideals, and stand for them ourselves—boldly and unashamed. We must protect these ideals against the political dreamers and economic theorists who offer us enticing substitutes, some original, some imported (with the directions on the box). We must support the institutions which are teaching our time-tested principles to the young men and young women upon whom we must depend to preserve our national heritage in the future.

Among such institutions are the hundreds of small, independent, Christian colleges which for so many years have been training their students, through precept and example, to pull their own weight as good citizens—self-respecting, self-reliant, loyal. America will be needing these privately supported colleges in the years to come—perhaps as never before—for they are ramparts from which our American way of life will be defended. Are you helping to keep these ramparts strong?

Myself I Must Make Strong

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mr. Hubert M. Harrison:

MYSELF I MUST MAKE STRONG

(By Hubert M. Harrison)

In the midst of confusion, criticism, and near chaos that overshadows our democratic effort to arm ourselves to save our Nation's life, the average citizen is bewildered. Every honest patriot wants to do his part for his country and yet he doesn't know where to fit into the giant plan.

For most of us, the best thing to do is to attend to our own jobs with a new spirit of devotion. The armchair strategist who thinks he can give MacArthur a few pointers, the radio diplomat who questions the loyalty and integrity of high officials, the selfish schemers who are trying to make money out of this crisis of mankind, the workman who risks slavery for his children by refusing to produce, the fomenters of race prejudice; all these are hindering the war effort and playing into Stalin's hands.

No matter how weak and corrupt some of our leaders in Washington are, the fact remains that they are our leaders. Although Alan Valentine, former Economic Stabilizer, may be right in his indictment of the low moral tone of the Capital, impeachment is difficult and practically impossible under our system. Valentine said: "The moral ground on which contemporary Washington now rests is so low that mists of contagion can rise quickly and spread far." The official Government, Valentine said, is headed by "an honest, well-intentioned, and industrious President." But there exists a "second government nominally headed by the President but with activities of which he can be only vaguely aware."

I am glad I do not have General Eisenhower's terrifying responsibility but I do have my own little job to do. I am accountable for the way I serve now and shall be throughout all time. Myself I must make strong.

The farmer who does not do his utmost to make his acres produce food or feed to full capacity; the workman who does not do an honest day's work; the businessman who does not do the best possible job of management with all his heart and soul; the housewife who refuses or neglects to make a home to comfort, sustain, and inspire her menfolks in their tasks; the community that does not do its best by its own efforts, without calling on Austin or Washington for help; all these are weakening the Nation.

The man or woman who through lack of will power, sickness, or overindulgence, comes to the point that he is not self-supporting and becomes a charge on relatives or the community, is a liability to family, community and state and hinders the war effort although not intentionally disloyal.

This Nation, rich as it is, cannot afford to defeat communism at home and abroad and take care of everybody at the same time. All who possibly can must stand on their own feet.

Under God and my Nation's flag, my duty is to do my job the best that I know how. Myself I must make strong.

The MacArthur Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. M. G. BURNSIDE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the REC-

ORD, I include yesterday's editorial from the Washington Post:

THE MACARTHUR PROBLEM

The crisis produced by General MacArthur's repeated efforts to run away with the diplomatic ball in the Far East seems to have excited little more than a ripple among the American people. This is due to the way that the crisis has been muted. In reality civil supremacy is at stake in our Government. General MacArthur has now told all and sundry, including a leader of the opposition, that he is not in sympathy with the United States or the United Nations policy in the Far East. Nor is this all. General MacArthur, in his repeated statements, is trying himself to seize the initiative in policy making. Over the week end several United Nations governments, including Canada's and Britain's have expressed open alarm, and the crisis is thus as much one in our international relations as one in our domestic Government.

Since the outbreak of the Korean War, the President has given his confidence to the supreme commander without stint. This has been due in some part to the lessons that he has drawn from our history. The chief lesson stems from some of Lincoln's intervention with the conduct of war operations. Mr. Truman, indeed, has gone too far in deferring to the supreme commander. Not once but several times he has answered the question of action beyond the thirty-eighth parallel by saying that the issue lay with the military commander on the spot. He never seemed to realize that beyond the thirty-eighth the question was not military but politico-military. General MacArthur knew better, and, before he seized the initiative, he complained of a "policy void." However, there was no policy void on the subject matter of MacArthur's letter to Representative MARTIN on March 20. Here the American policy on the neutralization of Formosa stands, yet General MacArthur came out for support of a Chiang Kai-shek attack on mainland China. And 7 days later, having already seen a summary of a policy directive on Korea, he issued his own cease-fire, and in a manner calculated to inflame the situation with regard not only to our enemies but also to our allies. This is a course of conduct that the President, out of sheer protection of his office and his prerogatives, simply cannot ignore.

Any reassertion of the President's authority as Commander in Chief and initiator of the country's foreign policy would win him, we feel sure, the support of the American people. That's what they are crying out for—leadership. The institutions of this country are too precious to be trifled with. Mr. Truman is not without courage, as was shown when General MacArthur last time sought to distort the President's foreign policy before the Veterans of Foreign Wars. But the present question is one of extraordinary delicacy. We are in a hairsbreadth zone of war, and the state of our policies, moreover, has run down so rapidly that the spirit of faction is uppermost. General MacArthur has become more of a politician than a general. He appears to have a sort of personal organization here, there, and everywhere. And to many of the Republicans he is sharing the spotlight with McCARTHY as a symbol of opposition. It is a thoroughly unhealthy situation—alien to our institutions, likely at any time to tip the scales in favor of all-out war with China, and destined to leave this country isolated in what the Arizona Daily Star calls "hopeless crusades for unlimited objectives impossible of attainment."

Farmers Face Big Crop Loss—1950 Wheat Rust May Strike Area Again This Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Agriculture appropriation bill will shortly come before the House, I believe a study of the article which appeared in the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune on April 8 will be of interest to the Members.

Evidence has shown that the farmers of the Midwest lost $20,000,000 at least in wheat production alone in 1951 due to the outbreak of a new race of rust known as 15B. To combat this outbreak it is very necessary that a new strain of wheat be developed which will be resistant to that particular rust. Closely alined to this is the need for a sufficient appropriation to continue the very worth while work of barberry eradication. The article reads as follows:

FARMERS FACE BIG CROP LOSS—1950 WHEAT RUST MAY STRIKE AREA AGAIN THIS YEAR

(By Russell Asleson)

Minnesota's legislature is being asked to appropriate $210,000 for emergency rust-control research.

Farmers and the grain industry alike have marked such a program "rush." They've got to find new rust-resistant wheat in a hurry to stay in business.

Rust is an airborne fungus that can cause a wheat field to have an almost complete crop failure. It's been around to plague farmers in one form or another for years, but plant scientists have been breeding new kinds of wheat to meet such emergencies.

For 10 years the situation was well under control. Until 1950.

Years of good work were toppled almost overnight when a new strain of rust, more infectious than any previously known, suddenly found weather conditions ideal and began to race through the durum fields of northern North Dakota and Minnesota.

Scientists had labeled it 15B and knew it had been around for nearly 15 years, lurking undercover and waiting. It had been termed "potentially dangerous" by Dr. E. C. Stakman, University of Minnesota plant pathology chief and the world's leading authority on rust.

As early as 1938 Stakman had predicted its explosion.

The 1950 eruption cost Minnesota and the Dakotas an estimated twenty-three and a half million dollars in lost crops, hitting hardest in North Dakota's durum area where farmers lost nearly $20,000,000.

Farmers viewing ruined fields found no variety withstood the fungus onslaught. All commercial wheats, including durum, which is used in making of macaroni and spaghetti, were affected.

That's the situation that brought on the emergency, not only on a State but a national level.

Another 15B invasion this year must be liberally sprinkled with big "ifs," but the possibility must be considered by agricultural experts fitting together the jig-saw puzzle of the Nation's food supply.

What measures can be taken as preventive medicine against any future epidemic? There are three steps:

The immediate is development of new resistant varieties.

The permanent is eradicating barberry bushes on which new rust races develop.

The experimental is chemical control of rust.

For some time it has been known that sulfur dust can control rust. But it takes more than one application, making it too costly and uneconomic. The Bureau of Plant Industry is working on other chemicals but to date has nothing promising.

Any permanent solution must take the barberry bush into consideration. Barberry is the only plant on which rust exists in its sexual stage and it is on this host that races do their crossing—or hybridization. It is fortunate that not all such hybrids are as virulent as their parents.

Since 1918 barberry elimination has been a cooperative State and Federal venture. Field headquarters for an 18-State area are in Minneapolis, in charge of Raymond O. Bulger.

The barberry program has eliminated 393,830,000 bushes on 143,029 properties, but work must be stepped up. Congress is being asked to increase the present appropriation of $700,000 by 15 percent. Minnesota has been providing $15,000 a year.

It is in the plant breeding end of the fight, however, that scientists are racing against time. It takes from 12 to 15 generations of wheat to develop a new variety.

To speed up the process, promising strains have been grown this winter in California and will be planted this spring in the North. Thousands of types are being tested for resistance under the widest ranges of temperature, light, and humidity. Last year the breeders were working on the second to sixth generations of some strains.

If they get the legislative appropriation fully half will go into new greenhouses at the University of Minnesota. With adequate help and space, the breeders say they can grow three to four generations a year instead of two, as they are now doing.

When they do find a resistant strain their work isn't done. The farmer wants a wheat that will yield well, stand up well, and retain its kernels when ripe. The miller wants a high protein wheat that will make fine, white flour.

While the plant scientist is trying to combine all these factors into a wheat that also has resistance to rust, a new rust may also be developing to lay waste to the new wheat.

E. R. Ausemus, University of Minnesota agronomist, has some promising rust-resistant strains but say that even at best it will be several years before varieties resistant to 15B and with the right growing and milling qualities are available for planting.

Minnesota and North Dakota scientists are playing a vital role in a Nation-wide effort to protect the food supply. North Dakota's Legislature appropriated $83,000 for the work, and a Federal grant of $60,000 is being sought from Congress for research.

What are the possibilities of another outbreak of 15B this summer?

The potential is there. It could break out if a spell of hot, humid weather hits at a critical time.

But because of the uncertainties of weather, predicting rust epidemics is a bit risky.

"Look at all the heat the weatherman gets when he predicts a clear day and snow turns up," said Don Fletcher, excutive secretary of the rust prevention committee.

It is entirely practicable to determine the areas of danger and name the races which are prevalent, thereby supplying the material for storm warnings.

Such storm warnings are flying this spring. Agricultural men know that the rust spores blew South last fall and were found in southern wheat fields. They were perpetuated on green grains and wild grasses always present in the continuous grain belt from Mexico to Canada.

They also know race 15B is now independent of barbery, and any strong southern wind will start the return journey. Some of the stem-rust spores have been found as high as 10,000 feet.

But the South had a hard, tough, and dry winter, and a lot of the wheat crop was lost. If the patches of rusted grain still left do not develop the northern crop may be safe—from 15B.

"There are no grounds for flatly predicting a return of 15B this year," reported Fletcher. "The threat is there, however, and we have no way of stopping it if weather conditions are right for rust."

Let's take a look at this saboteur:

Rust looks just like the ordinary iron pipe variety, except that it is found on the stems of the grain. The dusty, brick-red substance, however, is a living parasite—a fungus so tiny some are less than one-thousandth of an inch in diameter.

The collection of parasites suck the food sap in the stems—food that should be going up to the kernels to make them plump and full. When the wheat stem is completely girdled by the rust, considerable moisture also is lost and the stem is weakened so it breaks off easily in the wind.

The result of rust is seen in shrunken kernels of poor quality. It can cause any degree of damage to a crop, depending on severity of infection.

North Dakota farmers were out some 9,000,000 bushels of durum worth $18,013,000 and 2,000,000 bushels of bread wheat worth $3,723,000. Minnesota lost 556,000 bushels of durum worth $1,145,000. South Dakota had a $780,000 loss, mostly in bread wheats.

Through many years of wheat breeding and selection, plant scientists had been able to give the American farmers wheats that resisted the rust diseases most prevalent.

But like the youngster vaccinated for smallpox who then turned around to catch measles, 15B came along to supply the measles.

The late 1950 spring put wheat crops several weeks behind normal development. It also gave 15B its chance to invade wheats never before rusted. Only the fact much of the bread-wheat crop was mature prevented it from being hard hit.

How do these new races spring up to menace crops?

Wheat rust is in the red spore stage when it multiplies on the growing crop. When the straw becomes dead, the rust goes into the black spore stage in which it survives the winter's cold, coming to life and germinating the next spring. The wind picks these newly germinated spores from the straw and deposits them on young barberry leaves.

The spores dig into the leaves and start building up, producing small, blister-like sores called cluster cups. Later, spores from the cluster cups are mixed together, either by insects or by two cups growing together.

The mating of spores from two cluster cups if they are of different races may produce a brand-new race—a hybrid—ready to make a short hop via the wind to a susceptible plant.

"Nature," says Fletcher, "is continually plotting such disease warfare against our crops and only continual scientific defense will save us from future food shortages. If our farmer and miller is to stay in business, he must be given means to outmaneuver these rusts that destroy overnight what it has taken years to develop."

Income Tax Relief for Professional Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article which appeared in today's press by one of America's most distinguished commentators, Mr. George Sokolsky:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

FREDERIC R. COUDERT, JR., is introducing a bill into Congress to rescue the professional workers of this country from permanent poverty. For precisely that fate faces lawyers, doctors, architects, writers, and others, who, no matter what they earn, are being squeezed between taxes and high prices, without any opportunity to save for the future.

COUDERT's bill is to aid those men and women who are not eligible as beneficiaries of corporate or other private pension plans. These plans are really savings.

For instance, I was recently looking at the card of a Sears, Roebuck file clerk who had been with that company many years and, as I calculated it, she has saved, through their plan, $60,000. I would not mind being a file clerk with such savings.

Professional men, writers, artists, farmers, and small-business men are now unable to make great savings, unless they swindle, because of taxes which are geared against them.

COUDERT's idea is to permit the postponement of Federal taxes as regards a portion of their earned net income, so that the amount of money shall be contributed as a restricted retirement fund.

The worst phase of this situation, as it affects professional men, writers, and artists, is that their earnings are up and down, a lot one year and not so much another year.

If they could keep their earnings, they could average out over a few years. But the way it is, a writer may earn a fortune in 1 year and get taxed for the full amount in that year, and then he does not earn for a few years and is broke.

The Treasury amortizes machines; why not men?

COUDERT says:

"It is of utmost importance to encourage young men to enter the professions and small business. Yet the operations of the present tax laws, instead of giving this encouragement, tend to do the exact opposite by making corporation employment more attractive to young men. I believe this to be against the public interest."

I tried to read the Coudert bill and, like all other acts of Congress dealing with taxation, it gets so involved that you have to hire a lawyer and an accountant to discover how it works.

But it is enough for me that it gives to the white-collar folks a chance to put aside something of their earnings for the day when the joints ache and the hand is shaky and the eyes not so good.

Even columnists lose their popularity after a while, and some even lose their value. Yet, under the present set-up, they cannot save in their limited good years. I, for instance, started this business in 1917. I have, I hope, worked hard at my trade, which involves voluminous reading, the cultivation of memory, travel in many parts of the world, and some small, unheroic element of risk.

In our business a young person is hired on the general assumption that he knows nothing. Then, for 10 or 15 years, he keeps on learning the hard way, his product appearing in black ink on white paper for all to see.

So our hero arrives. But so has Uncle Sam. He tells his wife that he is now a big shot, but she wants to know how it happens that E. Merl Young's wife grabs a $9,540 mink coat while she has to wear mouton, which is fancy for sheepskin. Our genius tells her to go fight the Treasury.

Well, maybe there are 10 wonderful years, during which the great man sits on the dais and rises for a bow and then up comes another young fellow and pushes him into the back pages. So there is nothing to do but to become a ghost writer.

But savings. There are none except what Uncle Sam gave to the British to bridge their dollar gap—only a small share of it—which must make a man feel noble.

A man really earns little more than he can keep after he has met taxes and his cost of living. Men who want to save and cannot save because their taxes are too high are not earning what they think they earn.

Actually, they are only an intermediary step between those who pay them and the Treasury.

What remains is hardly compensation for the work they do. They are being kidded; they are kidding themselves.

The Coudert bill offers a good way out and should be supported.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD H. VELDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, the firing of Gen. Douglas MacArthur by President Truman comes as a severe shock to me, and I am sure to 99 percent of the people in my congressional district. It is true that the President, as Commander in Chief, has the power under the Constitution to wield the ax wherever he sees fit as far as his military commanders are concerned, but the reason given for the firing of Gen. Douglas MacArthur really takes the cake.

If I read the President's statement correctly, the reason given for the dismissal was that—

General of the Army Douglas MacArthur is unable to give his wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and of the United Nations.

What policy is the President talking about? You cannot support or implement a policy that you know nothing about or that is nothing more than a figment of a few people's imagination.

We have been doddling along so long now in Korea that it took some kind of statement from General MacArthur to arouse the State Department, the White House, and the United Nations out of their lethargic sleep and let them know there is a war going on, that more and more of our boys are dying every day and being maimed for life, simply because we have had no clear-cut policy in the Far East and we still have not one today. There has been a lack of direction, and no ultimate objective for the fighting in Korea has been established.

These people who talk about General MacArthur's dismissal opening the gates to a peaceful conclusion of the Korean War do not know what they are talking about. I would just like to point out that General MacArthur had nothing to gain by prolonging the Korean War for he already has his five stars.

It could be that the well-known armchair strategists, General Marshall and Anna Rosenberg, had their say along with our renowned Secretary of State, whose magic wand still waves over the administration.

Then, too, I just cannot understand how our United Nations allies, who have made a combined contribution in manpower and material of less than 15 percent of our own contribution in Korea always seem to have so much to say about how the Korean War should be fought.

As the President said in his statement, "General MacArthur's place in history as one of our greatest commanders is fully established," and I would like to add to this that the final chapters in the life of General MacArthur, as yet unwritten, will bring to light the sordid tales of how the Roosevelt and Truman administrations sold China down the river and opened the floodgates of godless Communist aggression upon all of Asia.

For a Sound National Military Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following letter which has been sent to the Members of this House by a former distinguished Senator from New York and Representative from New York's Forty-first Congressional District, James W. Wadsworth. No man in America has given more careful and more extensive consideration to the problems of forging a sound national military policy for this country, in time of peace as in time of war, than has Senator Wadsworth. During the decades when he was an illustrious Member of this Congress, he worked with dedicated purpose toward that end. His plea in the following letter for a national military policy which will include provisions for a continuing program of military training for our young men deserves attentive consideration by every Member of this House.

Senator Wadsworth's letter follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 6, 1951.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Returning to my Washington residence temporarily after 2 months' absence from the country and being deeply concerned by the trend of events, I venture to address you on a subject which has gripped my attention for a long time—the subject being national military policy.

I think you will agree with me that the United States has never, up to this day, adopted a military policy endurable in time of peace and effective in time of war. Lacking such a policy we have been forced to meet attacks upon us by the desperately hasty mobilization of untrained manpower. In other words, we have commenced to get ready to fight after the fight has started. The cost in dollars has been staggering (witness the national debt) and, more important, the sacrifice in lives has been tragic. Moreover, our unreadiness, well known over the world, has tempted the aggressor to attack, confident that he could attain his objective while we were still in the throes of preparation.

None of us can be certain about what the future will bring. We may have strong allies or we may be caught alone. In any event, our best protection is strength, organized and maintained in time of peace. I am sure no thoughtful person will deny the truth of that statement. Then, how shall we develop and maintain peacetime strength? Shall we support, in time of peace, a regular, professional military force strong enough to meet a major emergency? It is obvious, if we think twice, that we can't do it unless we are willing to pay two fearful penalties—one a crushing financial burden and the other the creation, eventually, of a dominating professional military caste. The payment of such penalties would go far toward Prussianizing this country—a prospect which is abhorrent to every thoughtful American.

Is there no other way for us to be strong? For more than 30 years I have been convinced that there is such a way and that, if followed, it would provide strength without injuring our free institutions. Look back at the two great wars which we have fought since 1917 and it will be noted that the overwhelming majority of our defenders was drawn from civil life. Those defenders came into the service of their country eager but untrained. They served and suffered. Without them we would have lost. Trained or untrained, the civilian, summoned to the defense of his country is the man who, in the long run, must save it. Without him we're gone. If this be conceded, is it not wise for us to see to it that the civilian is trained in time of peace so that we may have a great civilian reserve ready to answer the call, should it come? Is there any other way by which we can be strong? There is none.

And is it undemocratic to require capable young men to prepare themselves for the defense of their country? Is it not a part of the true democratic spirit for all such men to assume the obligation? If it is not their obligation, who will assume it? Volunteers? Our history shows conclusively that reliance upon volunteers has failed utterly and the underlying reason for the failure has been that such a system, if you can call it so, is fundamentally undemocratic.

Today there is pending before the House of Representatives a measure which, if approved, will establish, for the first time in our history, a national military policy emerging from the experience of the past, calculated to meet the strains of the future and, most important, founded upon a truly democratic concept. To strike from this bill those provisions relating to the training of our young men under predominant civilian control would throw us back into the confusion of no policy—the same old story—and cause every potential aggressor to rejoice.

Remember, they are watching us. I am hoping earnestly that the Congress will dispel further confusion at home and deny encouragement to our enemies abroad by adopting this proposal.

Sincerely yours,

J. W. WADSWORTH.

Ousting of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the ousting of General MacArthur completes the Truman administration record of capitulation to British foreign policy. Even though the people of this country, and their elected representatives, have overwhelmingly expressed the desire for freedom of action in Korea and a quick end to the killing of American boys in that battle area, the President's advisors in the State Department have succeeded in subordinating our wishes and in upholding Britain and other nations of Europe in declaring that continent the most critical military area.

This is not merely the firing of a general in the field but a complete sell-out of a strong American foreign policy. There have been over 1,000,000 casualties in the Korean War to date on both sides—yet the President refuses to consider this as a major war area and to take the appropriate steps to assure victory in Korea.

MacArthur has gone about his task of winning the Korean War despite the handicaps placed upon him. The United Nations has taken no stand in over a month on the ultimate aims in Korea, and the Truman administration has adopted a similar stand-pat program. Despite these factors, MacArthur has been trying to win a major war as quickly as possible with the smallest number of casualties.

President Truman's action will bring unbridled joy to the hearts of the Communists in Moscow and Peiping and in other capitals of the world. The American Communists and fellow travelers are now in complete command of our foreign policy. This is appeasement of the worst sort.

A War Without Plan, Without Preparation, and Without Objective

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit herewith a column entitled "They're Never Mailed," by Henry W. Clune, which was published in the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle on March 6, 1951, together with a copy of my reply to the column, which was published in the Democrat and Chronicle of March 20, 1951:

[From the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle of March 6, 1951]

SEEN AND HEARD

(By Henry W. Clune)

THEY'RE NEVER MAILED

Sometimes I wake up in the middle of the night in a cold sweat. Then it becomes a hot sweat. Then I get up and go downstairs and write a letter to the Congressman. A letter written to a Congressman in the middle of the night under a head of steam is no thing to put in the mail, and in the morning I have always destroyed what I have written. "Mad Letters" are often unreasonable, always intemperate and seldom effective. And I am not mad at my Congressman as a person. I am mad only at the craziness that appears pandemic in Washington.

I got off of those unmailed "mad letters" the other midnight after reading in the newspapers that the casualties among our fighting forces in Korea now number more than 50,000. That is an awfully lot of good American men to be knocked off in what the President of the United States once blithely described as a "police action." It seems particularly tragic when the thing goes on interminably, with no one, so far as I have been able to find out, defining its objective.

I don't pretend to know anything about the international situation. It's not my line. I'm no pundit or seer. Neither am I overly impressed by those who claim to know all the answers to the problems of the present crisis. I can second guess as well as they can, even though my finger isn't held tightly on the pulse of the world, as a fellow on the radio, with a little too much boast for my taste, claimed the other day that his was.

But I have three sons of military age, one of whom is back in the Army for a second hitch, and several of his friends who were called back with him now lie dead in Korea, sacrificed to a horde of barbarian monsters who are too great in number ever wholly to be defeated by American forces. I don't know the international score, but I'd be as bitter as gall and think it a wasteful sacrifice, if my son suffered a similar fate.

I'm biased by personal and selfish interests, to be sure. But a man worrying about his own son can also have a good deal of concern for the son of the man sitting next to him at a restaurant table or in a bus. From what I ascertain from listening to the comments of people in the street, the great majority of them have no stomach for the Korean war, and the soldiers who suffer the possibility of exposure to it definitely want out.

They write to me about it and they don't write as they did during the last war. There was a fine high spirit among them then. It was reflected in their letters. They thought they knew what that was all about. This time they write bitterly about what one of them called the muddling by the meatheads in Washington. One man who left a wife and two children and a home he had just started to buy, recently wrote:

"They have given the unorganized Reserves, of which I am one, a lousy deal in this thing. I had nearly 3 years of overseas service in the last war. Much of that service was fighting service. I came out with a good 10 years added to my life. I thought at last I had a chance to live a normal life. Now I'm back in the Army, and God knows where I'll be a month from now.

"They say Korea. They say our job is to bleed the Chinese Communists white. And that we've got to save face in the Orient. Who's face? Harry Truman's at the loss of a couple of hundred thousand Americans? Or a million. It could reach that number, if the Chinese keep pouring in, and we keep pouring in against them. What's our goal, how will we know when we've won? Joe Stalin must be laughing."

A couple of soldiers have sent me columns by Westbrook Pegler. One who did this wrote, "I never liked Pegler before. But read what I have underscored, and see if you don't agree." The lines marked were these:

"Why are American men in Korea? How can this ghastly folly end in any advantage to this country? They are there for a jumble of disgraceful reasons, starting with Roosevelt's 'recognition' of Soviet Russia and rising to the lamentable climax of Truman's offhand decision to send a few companies of milk-fed riflemen into a loathsome, unknown country to be slaughtered by an enemy as elusive as a fog. * * * How did we get into this damned thing? Does anybody want to go on with it besides the contemptible fakers who make war medicine?"

As I said, I tore up my midnight "mad letter" to the Congressman. But maybe he'll read this. I hope he does.

[From the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle of March 20, 1951]

SEEN AND HEARD

(By Henry W. Clune)

CONGRESSIONAL REPLY

DEAR HENRY: That midnight "mad letter" about Korea that you wrote to your Congressman, tore up, and then wrote about in your column of March 6, has wound up on my desk in multiple copies. You say modestly that you "don't claim that your finger is on the pulse of the world," but a couple of typical correspondents indicate the contrary. One writes that "Henry Clune has put his finger on one of his readers' pulse, namely mine." And another encloses your column with the comment that your view that Korea is a "wasteful sacrifice" is "so true."

Of course, it is true, Henry. I doubt that Americans realize yet how true it is. I said last summer that we had been plunged into a war with Korea, "without plan, without preparation, and without objectives." (And, of course, without consultation. Time has only deepened my conviction that the decision to intervene in Korea was not a military decision: it was a political decision, and moreover, a political campaign decision. We have just seen the Reds move in on Tibet, but not one official hand has been wrung, so far as I know, over the Tibetans. Could it be a matter of timing?)

As you know, at the time the decision was made to go into Korea we had withdrawn our Armed Forces from the peninsula, accepting the Army's view that it was militarily undefensible.

We knew, from official reports of the UN Commission on Korea, that the North Koreans and the Chinese Reds had completed a military-aid agreement in 1949. We knew, because the UN Commission on Korea had told us so, on May 10, 1950, that the North Koreans were massing and mobilizing on the thirty-eighth parallel and that "there was imminent danger of invasion from the north."

But the administration had officially washed its hands of Korea, had evacuated our Army, had announced that our western line of defense did not extend to the peninsula. Korea was a political and military vacuum and the Reds moved in.

If during our occupation, a stable republican government had been established in South Korea, our "police action" might still have been justified on the basis of a gallant defense of a sister republic struggling to establish democratic self-government. The plain fact is that the contrary was true. Our efforts at creating a sound civil, democratic government and a working economy were a spectacular and extravagant failure.

According to C. Clyde Mitchell, an American administrator in the United States military government of Korea: "In 1948, as the United States transferred authority to the new government of South Korea, the industry of the country was virtually wrecked. Inflation was growing worse. Koreans were slaughtering Koreans by the hundreds in bloody riots. Political parties multiplied; seldom were they able to reach an agreement on any course of action. Korean police were as brutal as the Japanese police had been. Civil rights were practically unknown; restrictions on the freedom of speech had been instituted which were so severe as to be called by responsible Korean observers 'totalitarian thought control.' The new Korean Government had shown no great desire to change the traditional way of government by squeeze and patronage."

I am not pointing the finger of scorn in citing this. There are understandable historic, psychological, and ethnic reasons why this was so. But that was the situation. Korea was regarded as militarily undefensible. And experience had proved it to be disastrously unready for a republican form of government. Why, then, did we let Stalin choose it for us as a battleground? I did not know at that time, and I still do not know.

And I am less irked than some over the fact that the UN drags its feet in supporting us in Korea, because I realize that the Europeans and Latin Americans may be as puzzled as I am over this campaign to defend "democracy" at the gates of Seoul. Europe fears, as one of her leading statesmen recently put it, "that the United States might lose itself in an Asiatic war where it might find a fate similar to that of Napoleon in Russia: numerous and great successes, but absolute impossibility of bringing the war to an end, a terrible waste of strength for a problematic result."

What, then, to do about it?

Well, Henry, Alcoholics Anonymous have a wonderful prayer which goes something like this: "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change; the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference." Perhaps that is also a prayer for our times.

For example, sooner or later we are going to have to arrive at a settlement in Korea. It is now a ruined country, economically, spiritually, and in every other way. I do not imagine it greatly matters to the plain people of Korea today who wins the fight, so long as the fighting stops. The least that we will probably settle for is a toehold on the peninsula to save our so-called face. The most that we can win is a destroyed, demoralized, subjugated, and bankrupt country. We shall pour more billions into it, after the settlement, to repair some of the destruction, but the major problem of establishing stable self-government there will be farther than ever from solution. It seems to me that this is the time to reflect that there are some things we cannot change, in 1 generation or 10, and I hope, we shall have the serenity and the intelligence to accept that fact.

There are some things we can change though, and I also hope we have the courage to recognize and change them.

As freeborn Americans we do not have to continue in office an administration which has brought us to this disastrous pass. We have learned the hard way that in foreign affairs this administration has been soft-headed, opportunistic, purblind, and unrealistic. In domestic affairs, it has been extravagant, capricious, and corrupt. We do have the ballot box where we can correct these things. Let us have the courage and sustained conviction to use it.

I am not saying to you that the Republicans, if in power, will correct these things in a week or a year. I am saying that this administration has stayed in power too long; that, as one of the Washington newspapers recently put it, it can no longer distinguish between the fruity, ripe aroma of hung pheasant and something that just plain stinks.

We are today saddled with the highest budget, the largest debt, the most far-flung commitments, and one of the most extravagant and corrupt governments in the history of our country. Stalin himself couldn't have planned it better. And American voters are the only ones who can do anything about it.

Very sincerely yours,

HAROLD C. OSTERTAG,
Representative, Forty-first Congressional District.

Use of Chinese Nationalist Troops

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Question of Calculated Risk," regarding the proposal to use Chinese Nationalist troops, which appeared in the Washington Star yesterday.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTION OF CALCULATED RISK—ADMINISTRATION MUST SOON FACE SQUARELY ISSUE RAISED BY MACARTHUR ON CHIANG TROOP USE

(By Constantine Brown)

The question the administration may have to face squarely in the near future is whether to take a calculated risk and give the Chinese Nationalists the green light to land in southern China, as General MacArthur has recommended, or follow the British-Indian line and accept a peace with the Chinese Communists in Korea on their own terms.

General MacArthur's statement last week is reliably reported to have been preceded by a realistic summation of the situation, as follows:

1. Because of our commitments in Europe there is no likelihood of the United States sending any further reinforcements.

2. The other members of the United Nations which have forces in Korea cannot increase them. Neither Britain nor France can add a single platoon to the forces available there. France has her hands full in Indochina, while Britain has engaged everything at her disposal for the Far East in Malaya and Hong Kong.

3. For reasons known best to the administration in Washington no support has been given to the South Korean Government to increase its fighting power. Some 250,000 South Koreans are available. These men, who could have been trained for combat, did not receive the needed weapons for training or fighting, despite President Syngman Rhee's repeated pleas to Washington.

Dr. Rhee had to draw on his meager dollar reserves to engage American Reserve officers to train his young men and also to purchase some equipment. Recently more than 100,000 men in training camps had to be released because of lack of food and clothing.

When queried about the correctness of this report, which was published in American newspapers, General MacArthur stated that this was a matter between the American and Korean Governments and outside the scope of his authority. Thus, the United Nations forces are being deprived of between 150,000 and 200,000 reinforcements, which could have been drawn from South Korean manpower, because "something had gone wrong in Washington."

4. The Chinese Communists are building up their striking power for an early spring offensive. Their ground forces are estimated by Allied intelligence at between 400,000 and 500,000 men in North Korea. A force of undetermined strength is being gathered on the eastern and western North Korean boundaries.

There are good reasons for believing that for the first time since the outbreak of hostilities the enemy will be provided with an adequate air force and possibly will be supported by volunteer submarines.

Thus, on the Allied side we are confronted with a situation in which we cannot possibly hope for any additional ground forces. These are a top priority in the present war in Asia, since the high command is not allowed to use its air power strategically.

The enemy, relying on his masses of ground forces and reassured that his sanctuaries across the Yalu River will not be molested by UN aviation, can look to the future with confidence.

Under these conditions General MacArthur once more has made a final plea to his superiors in Washington to permit the Chinese Nationalists to enter the war. The opposition to use of these forces came last summer from the State Department where it was believed that so long as the Nationalists did not intervene the Communists would remain outside the conflict.

The diplomats were wrong, principally because the Indian ambassador at Peiping, who was our listening post, had drawn the wrong conclusions from his conversations with the Communist leaders. But it would be useless now to try to place the blame on anybody for such a plausible error. The important thing now is to prevent a defeat or stalemate, which might be tantamount to defeat.

The Nationalist Government in Formosa is a charter member of the United Nations. Its representative in that organization is a permanent member of the Security Council. The fact that some governments, such as those of Britain and India, have withdrawn their recognition from the Nationalists and extended it to the Communists does not change in any way the situation of Nationalist China in the UN. Hence, legalistically and realistically the Nationalists are entitled to every assistance for opening a second front in guerrilla-ridden Southern China.

The Final Appeasement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY J. LATHAM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, the firing of MacArthur is another and perhaps the final step of appeasement by Truman and Acheson and ranks in the American hall of shame with the sell-outs at Yalta, Potsdam, and Tehran.

When generals who are military pygmies compared to MacArthur prepared the order relieving him of command, they told every American fighting man that courage, skill, intellectual honesty, and a deep conviction in fundamental American principles of individual liberty and freedom, for which they are asked to die, had been relegated to the scrap heap.

When President Truman directed the removal of MacArthur, he told the world that henceforth the clique of Lattimore, Jessup, and Dean Acheson, the discredited leader whose policies brought about the Korean War and 60,000 American casualties and who is a professed supporter of a convicted traitor, will direct future military policies.

America faces its greatest crisis. It is not of a military nature. The people must now decide for all time whether they will permit a Communist-sympathizing Secretary of State to tear out the fighting heart of America and deliver it on the platter of appeasement to our enemies.

Attitude of British Labor Party Toward General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by David Lawrence regarding the attitude of the British Labor Government toward the muzzling or removing of General MacArthur, which appeared in the Washington Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW SET OF RULES SUGGESTED—BRITISH LABOR "LEFT-WINGERS" COULD BE PLACATED BY MUZZLING OR OUSTER OF GENERAL MACARTHUR

(By David Lawrence)

There's an ironical answer—although perhaps one not too palatable for Americans—with which to try to placate the "left-wing" members of the Labor government in Great Britain who seems to think General MacArthur should either be muzzled or removed from his command. It would be to formulate a new set of rules somewhat as follows:

1. No officer or enlisted man of the Armed Forces of the United States shall hereafter answer any letter from any Member of Congress, Democrat or Republican, who addresses any inquiry to him.

2. If any military man happens to write a personal letter or a letter commenting on matters of public interest to some Member of Congress who makes such a letter public, believing it in the public interest to do so, the immediate expulsion of any such Member of Congress shall be ordered and a certified copy of the removal action shall be sent to the British House of Commons or to any other complaining governments in the UN.

It might, of course, encourage the British Socialists who have introduced a motion in the House of Commons calling for an expression of "no confidence" in General MacArthur to feel that the adoption of such a motion is tantamount to an order to President Truman to discipline General MacArthur and that it will establish a precedent for regulating the behavior of other American officials in the future.

Seriously, however, the episode is likely to split the British Parliament as it is bound to split the American Congress if it is pressed. The Labor government in Britain really cannot afford to make an issue of it with the American Government without at the same time creating in the United States the very kind of dissension that the British are represented as anxious to avoid with respect to European as well as far-eastern problems.

For, if the British "left-wing" move proceeds further, it is bound to have repercussions on this side in Congress. Already the United States Navy is seriously considering withdrawal from the over-all command principle with respect to the inter-allied command in the Atlantic. American Naval officers say they do not want to see any of their number subjected to the same kind of criticism that has already been directed toward General MacArthur.

The truth of the matter is that General MacArthur is just being made the scapegoat for the differences of opinion which have existed between Washington and London for several months as to what should be done in Korea. General MacArthur has publicly appealed to the United Nations for military help. He has appealed for reinforcements again and again to no avail. He has pointed out the dangers of stalemate. He has urged that he be given the right to bombard the bases from which the Chinese Communists are coming to attack his troops. He has made his recommendations through official channels and has got nowhere. It is apparent that General MacArthur is pleading on behalf of the 250,000 Americans who are stagnated in Korea and destined to fight indefinitely there without further help from the European allies.

Maybe the British criticism will unwittingly have a beneficial effect. It may compel a showdown inside the UN on Korea. For it looks as if a decided effort is being made to force the UN out of Korea through a program of abject withdrawal. Again and again these elements have called for peace negotiations, and every time the Chinese Communists have answered with arrogance and defiance, because they undoubtedly regard these constant overtures as a sign of UN weakness. But irrespective of the sacrifices that have been made, the "left wingers" in London, through professing to believe in freedom of speech, now evidently object even to the statement of the case to the people of the world as General MacArthur has tried to do. They do not want any further discussion by the man on the ground—even though he be the UN Commander in Chief—unless it fits their point of view.

President Truman has been urged here, too, by some of the anti-MacArthur group to discipline or reprimand the general. Some of the pressure is coming from the peace-at-any-price elements here. All that can be said is that if General MacArthur is disciplined, it will touch off a political controversy that will not end with the fate of the general himself but will affect American policies toward Europe in general and Britain in particular for a long time to come.

The American Government has kept silent too long as to its own viewpoint with respect to Korea. A declaration of aims and purposes in Korea might at least clear the air and let the world know that the sacrifices undertaken since last June in the name of a war against aggression have not been in vain.

St. Lawrence Waterway, Panama Sea-Level Project, and National Defense?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, two gigantic construction projects, strenuously advocated over many years primarily on the basis of their alleged necessity to the national defense, are the St. Lawrence waterway and the so-called sea-level canal at Panama.

During the hearings on the St. Lawrence proposal before the House Committee on Public Works on April 9, 1951, former Representative Willis W. Bradley, of California, in a notable presentation definitely clarified the principal national defense issues concerning these two undertakings and revealed the major fallacies in the reasoning underlying their advocacy.

In this connection special attention is invited to a list of authoritative articles on the atomic bomb, security, and national defense in an extension of remarks of Representative CLARK W. THOMPSON of Texas, Chairman of the Special Subcommittee To Investigate the Operation of the Panama Canal under House Resolution 44, Eighty-first Congress, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 16, page A5580—entitled "Isthmian Canal Policy of the United States—Bibliographical List." More recent articles dealing with the same subject have been published in subsequent issues of the RECORD in extensions of remarks of Representative THOMAS E. MARTIN of Iowa.

The main ideas in these articles obviously apply to the St. Lawrence waterway as well as to an Isthmian Canal, and support the opinions expressed by former Representative Bradley. His views, backed as they are, by a broad naval and civil governmental experience, merit the most careful study by every Member of Congress, especially those on the committees charged with responsibilities affecting the national security. They clearly emphasize the urgent need, long recognized by distinguished Members of Congress, for the Congress to have the benefit of technical opinions by the best qualified independent authorities whenever considering construction projects of vast magnitude.

For the complete record of former Representative Bradley's discussion, attention is invited to the forthcoming printed hearing on the St. Lawrence proposal. Meanwhile, under special leave accorded, I quote the full text of his basic statement:

STATEMENT BY CAPT. WILLIS W. BRADLEY, USN, RETIRED, BEFORE THE HOUSE PUBLIC WORKS COMMITTEE ON THE PROPOSED ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

I. INTRODUCTION

Mr. Chairman, my name is Willis W. Bradley. While I am appearing at the invitation of the St. Lawrence Project Conference, I do not appear as one of its officials or representatives. Rather, I put myself in the category of the average American taxpayer who views with alarm as taxes rise and the value of his dollars melts away.

To save time, I submit the following information in an effort to qualify as a witness whose ideas deserve consideration in the formulation of your views on this St. Lawrence project.

I am a captain in the Navy, retired after more than 40 years of service. However, the opinions I express here should not be taken as having any connection, either direct or implied, with the Navy Department. I am a graduate of the Naval War College and a postgraduate in naval ordnance and gunnery. For some 7 years, I was a member of the Board of Inspection and Survey of the Navy, inspecting more than a thousand ships of all types and accepting, on behalf of the Government, more than 500 ships of various categories. In the political and administrative fields, I have been Governor of Guam and a Member of this House of Representatives. While a Member of Congress, I served on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and was chairman of the Subcommittee on Ship Operation, Construction, and Maritime Labor. For some years I have carried out extensive studies of the Panama Canal and have participated in the controversy over the proposed replacement of the present lock-type installation with a sea-level canal, due to alleged inability to defend present locks and dams against aerial bombing.

I trust these comments will serve as an adequate qualification.

II. GENERAL

With all due respect for the prominent gentlemen who have appeared heretofore in advocacy of this St. Lawrence waterway, I find myself in opposition to it purely on the basis of what seems to be for the best interests of the Nation as a whole.

Let me quote from the Wall Street Journal of February 26, 1951. Under the heading "Review and outlook" we read:

"One of the serious dangers to which the country's rearmament effort is being exposed is the anxiety of almost innumerable interest groups to grind their particular axes on it. This, that, and the other project and pet legislative scheme is declared, in terms of alarm, to be essential to our survival as a Nation.

"Let enough of these plots succeed and Marshal Stalin may well grin contentedly behind his pipe * * * etc."

It is easy to recognize the solemn truth of these words of the Wall Street Journal.

III. SECURITY

A major claim of the waterway proponents is that the national security will be greatly enhanced by an extension of deep-water shipbuilding and ship-repair operations to the Great Lakes. This claim seems to resolve itself into two phases: First, greater security from enemy attack; and, second, provision of needed additional shipyards.

Prior to the advent of long-range bombing the Great Lakes region was one of the most secure areas of the Nation insofar as damage from enemy action is concerned. Even now, it might be so if our prospective opponent were situated in the Southern Hemisphere or were of small potential air effectiveness. However, such conditions do not prevail and are not likely within the foreseeable future.

We have only one potential enemy sufficiently strong to worry us in the sense of national survival. That is the Soviet Union.

The Soviet is not a great sea power and there is small prospect of it becoming one, other than as this might be accomplished through the operations of a huge submarine force. The really great strength of the Soviet Union is in its army and its air force. It must be apparent even to the novice in world strategy that any assault upon the continental United States is almost certain to be from the air. The shortest route from probable Soviet air bases is across the Arctic to the Pacific Northwest, the upper Great Lakes country, or the New England States.

I doubt if the Soviet Union now has any aircraft which can fly a worth-while bombing mission to the United States and return to base, but I haven't the least doubt they will have such craft in the near future. They can fly such a mission now on a one-way basis, deliver their bombs, and land for capture or internment as the case might be. This assertion is verified by Gen. Hoyt Vandenberg, who stated in the Saturday Evening Post of February 17, 1951, that—

"The Soviet Union, for example, now has at least 450 planes that can strike our major population and industrial centers from bases in the U. S. S. R."

Thus, we find that the Great Lakes area has become one of our most exposed frontiers and any idea that the national security can be enhanced by increasing the density of shipbuilding facilities therein, at the expense of less-exposed regions, should be abandoned as without foundation in fact.

Additional shipbuilding and ship-repair facilities, other conditions permitting, would best enhance the national security by being situated in the deep South, say a hundred miles up the Mississippi, up the St. John's River in Florida, and in other spots similarly located with reference to exposed frontiers.

Permit me to quote Vice Adm. Russell Willson before a Senate subcommittee holding hearings on this St. Lawrence waterway project in 1947. Admiral Willson said:

"In my opinion, the concept that this project would make a substantial contribution to national security by providing additional facilities for deep-sea vessels in a relatively secure area has been nullified by the recent and prospective developments in the field of warfare."

IV. SHIPBUILDING

At the hearing above mentioned, Admiral Willson also said:

"I see nothing in the warfare of the future to change the role which the Great Lakes shipyards played in the last war. They built 510 small vessels up to and including escort vessels and submarines. Any additional capacity could be used for similar purposes, as this was only 12½ percent of the number of these types of vessels built during the war."

And also:

"Had I the decision I would think long and hard before I counted heavily on shipbuilding facilities for deep-water vessels on the Great Lakes, when all facilities there could be used many times over for equally necessary small vessels."

The fact is that we now have many times the shipbuilding and ship-repair facilities needed in time of peace. We have so many yards that our west coast is without a single large ship under construction—that yards stand empty from Canada to the Mexican border—that others exist precariously on repair jobs and on crumbs thrown by the Government as vessels are taken out of reserve and restored to active service.

Shipbuilding has become so scarce since World War II that mechanics and other artificers employed in the trade have scattered to the winds—obliged to turn their hands to any job offering a living wage. Great yards—such as Calship at Los Angeles and Oregon Ship at Portland—yards which in their heyday delivered a Victory ship every 4 days—are dismantled as unneeded in the future.

Yards on the east coast and in the Gulf have been more fortunate than those in the West but, at times, these big establishments have been reduced to a single job in hand.

I quote from the 1950 annual report of the Shipbuilders Council of America:

"The report of activities for the past year and the outlook for the immediate future is not encouraging.

"No contracts for naval vessels were placed with private shipyards since the last annual report in 1949 and no new contracts for naval vessels are in sight.

"The present and prospective activity in the industry is not now sufficient in volume to maintain that degree of efficiency necessary to have an adequate core of shipbuilding and ship repairing know-how available to meet another emergency."

Facilities for expansion of shipbuilding on salt water coasts are tremendous as has been shown in the two World Wars.

Great Lakes shipbuilders have done excellent work in the past on vessels which can be brought to the sea through existing outlets, but, as previously stated, they produced only 12½ percent of the smaller ships constructed for the Navy during World War II. The need for these small vessels (mine sweepers, antisubmarine craft, picket and patrol boats, landing craft of various types) is likely to be just about unlimited in the event of another great war.

I should strongly recommend to the Great Lakes people that they put aside local pride and ambition and recognize that their most valuable contribution in any future war effort in this particular field is in the expeditious and economical production of ships which can utilize present outlets to the sea.

In concluding this section, I submit that, in my opinion, the argument that additional deep-water shipbuilding and ship-repair facilities in the Great Lakes would materially enhance the national security is fallacious, and that expenditures of Federal funds to bring about the establishment of such facilities in the Great Lakes would be unsound, uneconomical, and a travesty on the efforts of this Congress to hold the cost of national security to the lowest level consistent with the safety of the United States.

V. CANALS

The St. Lawrence seaway project involves an extensive use of canals for ships passing from salt water to the Great Lakes. As a general rule, both owners and masters of large ships regard canals, more especially lock canals, with distrust and dislike due to the time required for passage and the very considerable risk of damage to the ships, the locks, or both. In view of this, canals for large vessels cannot expect to be successful financially unless they serve as an indispensable link or are great time savers, for there is no place in industry where the adage "time is money" is more applicable than in shipping.

As a partial consequence of the above, estimates of probable overseas world trade which would move through the waterway are quite likely to be exaggerated, and the adverse sentiments expressed by American steamship men in letters inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 8, 1947, by Senator Overton, are likely to be more nearly accurate than the estimates of proponents of the project. Even the most discerning man cannot say just what trade will or will not utilize the waterway. It is not as simple as that. One can only surmise from a general knowledge of ships and seamen, of probable profits, of risks and delays involved.

Canals are alike in many ways, and one such is their actual cost as compared to preconstruction estimates. Each time the estimators are sure they are right. Each time they turn out to be wrong. This is just a human failing because even the best engineers are not omniscient and so are not able to foresee costs for years ahead. Also they can't foretell what legislators and politicians may do in the construction period.

Take these few figures from the Minority Report by Senator LODGE in 1948 (80th Cong., Rept. No. 810, pt. 2):

	Estimates	Actual costs
Welland Canal	$40,000,000	$120,000,000
Chicago drainage canal	16,000,000	53,000,000
New York State barge canal	62,000,000	176,000,000

Completed costs for these canals averaged 197.5 percent above the estimates.

Of course, a considerable part of the St. Lawrence costs will be for dam construction. So let us take Senator LODGE's figures on dams:

	Estimates	Actual costs
Bonneville	$42,000,000	$80,000,000
Coulee	113,000,000	159,000,000
Hoover	70,000,000	116,000,000

Completed costs for these dams averaged 57.7 percent above the estimates.

When one carefully considers these statistics he is quite likely to arrive at the conclusion that the St. Lawrence waterway project will cost at least 100 percent more than current estimates. This is not said in a critical mood but rather in the spirit that we may better face the music now than in 1953 or in 1955 when we have gone too far to reconsider. We have excellent engineers and estimators but, with minor errors for round numbers, human limitations seem to be expressed in the cold figures given above and I hold that the evidence is quite conclusive.

Here let me quote Lt. Gen. R. A. Wheeler, Chief of Engineers, before a Senate subcommittee on June 13, 1947:

"With regard to your query as to what the actual cost of construction would be should the project be built within 7 years, it is difficult to form an opinion. I believe we are now in the peak period of postwar construction cost levels. However, conjecture is dangerous and I cannot make a forecast."

In view of the increase in costs during the last year or so, what a wise man General Wheeler was when he made that statement.

The estimates presented by General Pick in his recent statement before this subcommittee covers 6 years instead of 7. The estimated costs for the United States are $566,794,000. In the light of the above figures, it would appear that we can arrive at only a well-calculated guess of what the actual costs would be.

VI. LOCKS

The basic purpose of a navigation lock is to transfer a ship from one water level to another.

The avowed purpose of the St. Lawrence locks is to open the Great Lakes to deep-water shipping.

The alleged reason why this great project should be undertaken now, in a time of deficit governmental finance, is the enhancement of our national security through the assurance of a flow of Labrador ore sufficient to maintain an adequate supply of high-grade iron ore for Great Lake furnaces.

Our problem then is:

Are Americans justified in placing major dependence for an adequate steel supply in time of war on a flow of iron ore which must pass through 16 widely scattered locks situated in territory decidedly vulnerable to enemy air attack?

The answer to that question should, in my opinion, be a major factor in the consideration of this proposed legislation.

Current proposals for the St. Lawrence waterway envisage three sections with locks for navigational purposes. These are: Welland Canal, length 27.6 miles with eight locks having a normal lift of 327 feet; International Rapids Section, length 46 miles with three locks having a normal lift of 84 feet; Canadian Section, length 68 miles with five locks having a normal lift of 133 feet.

In all, 16 locks having a normal lift of 544 feet.

The standard lock dimensions are to be in accord with those of existing Welland Canal locks, that is, 800 feet by 80 feet by 30 feet.

VII. PANAMA CANAL

A comprehensive study of canal vulnerability to enemy attack has been made recently covering the Panama Canal. We should be able to draw conclusions, both valuable and pertinent, from that study.

In Public Law 280, the Seventy-ninth Congress authorized the Governor of the Panama Canal to investigate the means of increasing the capacity and the security of the Canal to meet future needs both as to interoceanic commerce and as to the betterment of the national defense.

The Governor, in making his investigations, had the services of a board of consulting engineers employed under his authority. These engineers reviewed the studies made by him and concurred with his report which was transmitted to the Eightieth Congress on December 1, 1947.

In his report, the Governor recommended what amounts to a new Panama canal at sea level at an initially estimated cost of $2,483,000,000, and an estimated time of completion of 10 years.

The Governor's report is long and complicated but its main features have been summarized in the Transactions of the American Society of Civil Engineers, 1949, volume 114, by Col. James H. Stratton, United States Army, who was the supervising engineer in the preparation of the report.

Colonel Stratton writes:

"Although no one can say what course World War II would have taken had the Japanese followed up Pearl Harbor (Hawaii) with an attack on the Panama Canal, it is now clear that the locks could have been destroyed and the canal emptied into the sea had an attack been made and the defenses penetrated. The development of larger bombs and new weapons of both conventional and atomic types since Pearl Harbor leaves no doubt as to the vulnerability of the canal to enemy attack and sabotage."

And further—

"It can be stated, however, that the lock canal cannot be made resistant either to atomic bombs or to modern conventional weapons. At best the protection that could be provided a lock canal would only increase the difficulties rendering it useless. * * * The lock type of canal, no matter how strongly constructed, would not increase security to meet the needs of national defense."

Although I have been a consistent opponent of the sea-level project, as recommended by the Governor of the Panama Canal, my opposition has not been on the basis that the locks or other structures in the present canal can be made impregnable to severe damage by bombing or sabotage. Rather, it has been because of my belief that the alleged advantage in security of any practicable sea-level canal over the present lock-lake type, when reasonably protected and prepared to withstand attack, has not been sufficiently established to justify the vast expenditure required to change over to the sea-level type. It is my opinion that the sea-level canal, as recommended by the governor, would cost the American people in excess of $5,000,000,000 by the time of its completion and I have not, so far, been able to see that the additional security afforded by the change would be worth that price.

However, I find myself in agreement with Colonel Stratton, when he writes:

"The penetration of canal defenses by rockets, guided missiles, or robot planes loaded with powerful conventional or atomic explosives launched from the air, from ship or submarine at sea, or from a land base, must be accepted as a possibility."

I am, therefore, of the opinion that we must accept Colonel Stratton's statement—"It can be said, however, that the lock canal cannnot be made resistant either to atomic bombs or to modern conventional weapons—as a reasonable premise, in fact, as a declaration of the very best technical knowledge available along these lines at the present time."

VIII. ST. LAWRENCE RELIABILITY

As the alleged reason for undertaking this project now is to assure Great Lakes furnaces of an adequate flow of high-grade iron ore in event of hostilities, and as it is maintained that a considerable part of this ore must come from Labrador via the proposed waterway, then real lack of security of locks, dams, or other vital waterway structures, will destroy the reasonable assurance of that Labrador ore supply and thus eliminate the basic reason for enactment of this legislation.

Just how reliable will the St. Lawrence waterway be in event of war with the Soviet Union?

Consider here a few extracts from General Vandenberg's article in the Saturday Evening Post:

"The American people must realize it is impossible to amass or invent an absolute, impregnable defense against bombing attacks by a strong, determined enemy.

"Should war come, we can expect to destroy not more than 30 percent of the planes making an attack in strength on the United States before their bombing missions are accomplished.

"Even if we had many more interceptor planes and antiaircraft guns and a radar screen that blanketed all approaches to our boundaries, a predictable 70 percent of the enemy's planes would penetrate our defenses despite the extraordinary valor and skill of our pilots.

"The bleak and blunt evidence of the last war proved conclusively that no bombing attack mounted in sufficient strength by the Americans, British, or Germans ever was turned back by the most strenuous defensive action. The offensive always has a crushing advantage in aerial warfare, and there is no prospect that the balance will change in the foreseeable future."

And now for a few expressions of opinion by Maj. Gen. Follette Bradley, United States Army, retired, before the Senate subcommittee holding hearings on this same subject in 1947:

"The St. Lawrence seaway and power project now lies in the most exposed and vulnerable part of continental United States except Alaska.

"The real question is: Can the project with its 40 locks, more or less, and its proposed dams and powerhouses be defended against enemy air attacks? I answer categorically, 'No'."

Just recall, please, pertinent extracts from the Governor's report:

"It can be stated, however, that the lock canal cannot be made resistant either to atomic bombs or to modern conventional weapons.

"The lock type of canal, no matter how strongly constructed, would not increase security to meet the needs of national defense."

There we have the cold, hard facts from men who are trained at public expense to know what destructive forces locks and dams may be expected to resist. And these gentlemen say "the lock canal cannot be made resistant to atomic bombs or modern conventional weapons."

Is it possible to present more blasting and conclusive evidence that the proposed waterway cannot be made a secure link in the system of national defense?

Thus, I believe we have arrived at answers to the several questions previously propounded.

Question. Can enemy attack inflict sufficient damage of the proposed waterway to stop the flow of iron ore from Labrador for an extended time?

Answer. Assuming the enemy to be of the strength and location of the Soviet Union—most decidedly, yes.

Question. Just how reliable will the proposed St. Lawrence waterway be in the event of war with the Soviet Union.

Answer. Thoroughly unreliable.

Question. Are Americans justified in placing major dependence for an adequate steel supply in time of war on a flow of iron ore which must pass through 16 widely-scattered locks situated in territory decidedly vulnerable to enemy air attack?

Answer. Emphatically, no.

We arrive, therefore, at the conclusion that the American people should reject as detrimental to the public safety the claim that the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway project would greatly enhance the national security by providing an adequate and dependable flow of high-grade iron ore from Labrador sources.

IX. PROBABLE OVERSEAS-GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

Proponents' claim is that the provision of a 27-foot waterway into the Great Lakes would result in the establishment of a considerable overseas Great Lakes shipping. This claim deserves careful consideration.

At present there is a 14-foot channel into the Great Lakes. As far as I know, not one single American-flag ship is utilizing that channel in regular trade, and there is no change in prospect.

I quote from the statement of Mr. Harry C. Brockel, director, Port of Milwaukee Commission, before this subcommittee, in 1950:

"This trade went into eclipse for several decades, but was briskly revised after World War I, when European shipowners sought new trade routes. The St. Lawrence gateway, neglected by American shipping interests, was recognized as a new shipping artery by European shipowners. British and Scandinavian tramp vessels able to carry about 1,500 tons of cargo on the 14-foot draft of the St. Lawrence canals were chartered to haul bulk cargo between European ports and the Great Lakes."

The uninformed, reading this statement, would conclude that our American shipowners just neglected their opportunities—their responsibilities to the American people—and so let this trade go by default to the foreigners. I doubt if Mr. Brockel had any intention of conveying this impression but, to me, it seems to do so, and I want to go on record as of the belief that such an idea is entirely erroneous. American shipowners just couldn't make a success of that shipping. Their expenses for ship construction and operation were so high that the business went to foreigners whose ships and labor cost less than similar items under the American flag.

In my dealings with American ship owners and operators, I have found them to be rather keen businessmen, fully alive to their responsibilities to the public, both as individuals and as a Nation, but, nevertheless, obliged to meet their payrolls, expenses, and taxes.

According to figures just furnished to me by the National Federation of American Shipping, only 115 American-flag vessels out of our 1,177 privately owned ships, as of January 1, 1951, draw 25 feet or less at full load. Only 94 such vessels draw 24 feet or less at full load.

A 27-foot channel would be usable, then, for only about 9.7 percent of these ships even if one were willing to take the considerable risk of having only a trifle more than 1 foot of fresh water under the keel of ships drawing 25 feet in salt water. Only 8 percent would come within the more reasonable category of drawing 24 feet or less.

I realize that ships do not always sail at full load, and I have read Admiral Cochrane's statement and statistics covering possible utilization of the waterway by partially-loaded American-flag ships which could, in many instances, load to full displacement after reaching deep water. I believe this statement may lead one to be overoptimistic. I think it tends to make the listener accept the possible traffic as a somewhat sure-fire indicator of probable traffic, whereas I am of the opinion that the normal need of topping off in cargo, fuel, and supplies, will score heavily against any extensive use of the proposed waterway under these conditions.

A knowledge of the history of the American merchant marine leads me to believe that such shipping as would use the 27-foot channel into the Great Lakes for regular service would be almost 100-percent foreign flag. With current costs of American-built ships and American labor, I do not see how it could be profitable for our ships to compete in this foreign trade. Neither can I see shipping of any volume between Great Lakes ports and ocean ports of the United States, as the length of the voyage, terminal charges, stevedoring, and so forth, would likely make such a service unprofitable.

For years I have fought steadily to keep American-flag merchant vessels on the seas and to prevent our seamen and engineers from being displaced by foreigners working for wages entirely too low for a decent standard of American living.

I have made this fight with full appreciation of the fact that foreign-flag vessels can carry the goods cheaper than Americans, and just as efficiently, and that transportation might be somewhat less expensive if foreigners were allowed a clear field in the water-borne trade. But America has not reached its present position of the world's greatest nation by utilizing the cheapest of everything as we go along. We protect our farmers, our manufacturers, and many of our basic industries. We permit and encourage labor unions so the working man may receive a fair return for his toil. We do not allow the foreigner to engage in coastwise commerce and we have extended this rule to include Puerto Rico, Alaska, and the Hawaiian Islands. We encourage and protect essential trade-route ocean shipping by means of subsidies. We do these things because we have learned by experience that the best interests of all of us are served thereby.

Over the years we have built up a huge transportation system to care for the Great Lakes region. That system includes immense facilities in the way of ships, railroads, terminal set-ups, canals, and a thousand and one other things. It is operating satisfactorily, generally speaking, with American labor, American capital, and American equipment. It may not operate as cheaply as could be expected if foreigners took over. It may not be quite as economical to some of the particular interests in the Great Lakes region and contiguous States as a foreign set-up would be. But, when one thinks of the Nation as a whole, of the average taxpayer from Maine to California, it is my opinion that the present arrangement is more economical than one which would result from the enactment of this legislation, and that it should not be scrapped either for the benefit of the relatively few Americans who would profit therefrom or of the foreign shipping which might prosper by taking over in this internal economy of the United States.

X. SUMMARY

I submit, Mr. Chairman, as a summary of my statement, these conclusions:

(a) The Great Lakes area has become one of our frontiers most exposed to enemy attack.

(b) Additional Great Lakes shipbuilding and ship-repair facilities for large deep-water ships are unnecessary either in peace or war.

(c) War shipbuilding in the Great Lakes should be restricted to local needs and to such other vessels as can reach the sea through current outlets.

(d) The argument that deep-water shipbuilding and ship-repair facilities in the Great Lakes would materially enhance the national security is fallacious.

(e) Previous experiences indicate that the actual cost of the proposed St. Lawrence waterway may well exceed current estimates by 100 percent.

(f) An impregnable defense against determined air attack has not so far been achieved and there is nothing to indicate that it will be achieved.

(g) A lock canal cannot be made "resistant either to atomic bombs or to modern conventional weapons."

(h) Enemy attack can, and likely would, seriously damage the proposed waterway and thus block ship transits for an undetermined time.

(i) America is not justified in placing dependence for a reliable ore supply in time of war on the proposed waterway.

(j) Such overseas trade as might develop through a 27-foot channel would likely be 100 percent in foreign bottoms.

(k) The present set-up for Great Lakes region transportation is more economical to the average taxpayer of the Nation than would be the case if this proposed legislation were enacted.

Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that this proposal for the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway should not be enacted.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM R. WILLIAMS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I view with alarm the increasing power being assumed by the President over the military affairs of our Nation as shown in the summary dismissal of our outstanding military-government leader in Korea, Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

It is in the same category with Truman's vicious letters to some other people who have been brave enough to face his personal wrath by giving honest constructive criticism of our Executive.

It is my humble opinion that this Nation does not have any other person who is so well versed in the physical, economic, and financial situation among the peoples of the Far East, and the loss of General MacArthur from our staff will greatly weaken our position among the members of the United Nations.

This action on the part of our Chief Executive in his role as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces is a stunning blow to my optimism which I have felt about the Korean situation during the past few weeks.

Questionnaire on Current Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KEN REGAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have recently returned from a brief trip, during our Easter recess, to my congressional district of west Texas, which includes the city of El Paso.

Many fine, patriotic Americans of pioneer stock make their homes in El Paso and throughout my area and they are gravely concerned with the course of events in our country; the many real and nonessential services dispensed by our Government; the aid being given to European countries and peoples; our many costly bureaus and the huge number of governmental employees, now exceeding 2,000,000 persons; our huge national debt and our constantly increasing tax burden.

Recently, one of our businessmen, Norman L. Casner, Jr., president of the Casner Motor Co., of El Paso, became so concerned that he sought the views of the citizens of that area through publishing a comprehensive questionnaire in the daily newspapers, the space for which he paid regular advertising rates.

It is my opinion that the membership will be interested in the views as expressed in the preliminary returns as they bear on matters now before Congress, and I ask unanimous consent that they be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today at the close of these remarks:

CASNER MOTOR CO., INC.,
El Paso, Tex., March 26, 1951.

To the United States Congressional Delegation of Texas, Washington, D. C.:

GENTLEMEN: We have in our files over 3,000 signed ballots concerning the matters listed below. For your information and guidance we respectfully submit the tabulated results of these ballots:

1. Are you for or against our representatives taking action right now, to eliminate the waste, the unnecessary jobs, inefficiency, and extravagance within each major department of our Government?

A. For, 2,970—99 percent.

B. Against, 20—six-tenths of 1 percent.

C. No opinion, 11—four-tenths of 1 percent.

2. Do you think our Government should stop giving and lending money and materials, other than military material, to foreign countries, until we can do so with a reasonable tax load, and a diminishing national debt?

A. Yes, 2,793—93.1 percent.
B. No, 153—5.1 percent.
C. No opinion, 55—1.8 percent.

3. Do you think our representatives should take action to correct legislation that requires our Government to buy farm products and other commodities in huge, unusable and unsalable quantities, with taxpayers' money?

A. Yes, 2,906—96.9 percent.
B. No, 58—1.9 percent.
C. No opinion, 37—1.2 percent.

4. Are you for or against admitting Red China into the United Nations?

A. For, 162—5.4 percent.
B. Against, 2,722—90.7 percent.
C. No opinion, 117—3.9 percent.

5. Are you for or against legislation that will prevent the President from ever again committing our Nation to undeclared war, or to any other unusual foreign duty, without consent of Congress or congressional committee?

A. For, 2,513, 83.8 percent.
B. Against, 361, 12 percent.
C. No opinion, 127, 4.2 percent.

6. Do you think the UN should impose an embargo and blockade against the Chinese mainland, and encourage Chiang Kai-shek with moral and material support against the communists?

A. Yes, 2,755—97.8 percent.
B. No, 81—2.7 percent.
C. No opinion, 165—5.5 percent.

7. Do you think our State Department needs a "good overhauling" beginning at the top?

A. Yes, 2,797—93.2 percent.
B. No, 64—2.1 percent.
C. No opinion, 140—4.7 percent.

8. Are you for or against legislation to stop all trade, direct or indirect, with Russia, and forbid entry of people, ships, and goods from Communist dominated countries, into this country?

A. For, 2,764—92.1 percent.
B. Against, 110—3.7 percent.
C. No opinion, 127—4.2 percent.

9. Are you for or against an immediate and all inclusive clean-out of Communists and "Fellow Travelers", from every department of the Government, and air-tight steps taken to keep them out?

A. For, 2,942—98.0 percent.
B. Against, 25—eight-tenths of 1 percent.
C. No opinion, 34—1.1 percent.

10. Are you for or against sending a large standing army to Europe?

A. For, 810—27 percent.
B. Against, 1,633—54.4 percent.
C. No opinion, 558—18.6 percent.

We will be very glad to forward these ballots to any responsible party requesting them. Otherwise, we shall retain them in our file for a reasonable length of time before disposing of them.

Very respectfully yours,

NORMAN L. CASNER,
President.

DOUGLASS, DOUGLAS, OLIVER & HUGHES,
El Paso, Tex., March 28, 1951.

Mr. N. L. CASNER,
Casner Motor Co., Inc.,
El Paso, Tex.

DEAR MR. CASNER: We have counted the ballots submitted to us as at March 27, 1951, and we hereby certify that there were 3,001 ballots.

DOUGLASS, DOUGLAS, OLIVER & HUGHES,
By R. A. DOUGLAS.

The Price of Lead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON
OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter I have, written by Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Director of Defense Mobilization, regarding the price of lead.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 6, 1951.

Mr. CHARLES E. WILSON,
Director of Defense Mobilization,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I noticed in the Wall Street Journal of last Wednesday that the British Ministry of Supply has raised the price of lead to 20 cents a pound and the price of zinc to 20 cents per pound, an increase of 3 cents. The British Ministry of Supply does all the buying and selling of metals in Great Britain. Our ceiling price is 17½ cents, East St. Louis, for zinc, and, in lead, I find there is a two-price ceiling recognized, that is, 17 cents per pound, New York, for lead mined in my own State of New Mexico, and 18½ cents, New York, for lead mined in Mexico, Peru, Canada, and elsewhere and imported into the United States. So far as I can ascertain this discriminatory two-price system in lead has not been duplicated in other commodities. I understand that the volume of foreign lead being sold at the 18½ cent level is roughly the same as the volume of domestic lead sold at the 17-cent level. It seems to me manifestly unfair to all the lead miners in the United States for them not to be able to receive the same price for their product as manufacturers are willing and permitted to pay for lead of foreign origin.

If a two-price ceiling is to be permitted for lead there should logically be two prices for storage batteries, white lead paint, Ethyl gasoline, plumbing goods, and other articles made from lead. I am wondering how the Office of Price Stabilization proposes to facilitate the flow of such lead ores and pig lead from foreign countries, which we need to supplement our domestic supply, when the ceiling prices here are now at least 3 cents below the market in England. Obviously, England and European countries will be able to outbid us and draw any Mexican, Canadian, and other lead they might need at the 20 cent price. Inasmuch as the tremendous volume of lead now consumed in the United States, about 1,250,000 tons per year, requires the importation of a certain amount of foreign lead, our domestic civilian and defense production will suffer unless the Government agencies quickly make up their minds as to how they are going to reconcile a low domestic price for lead with a higher foreign price, either through Government purchases at a high price and disposal here at the ceiling price, or raising the domestic price to the world level. During the last war premiums were paid to stimulate domestic production. In view of the high world price of lead today premiums should not be necessary if the miners get the benefit of the world market, or its equivalent.

I know from my own experience that the prospectors and miners in my own State of New Mexico generally do not know very much about the world picture in the metal markets. They merely read the metal quotations in their local papers and, unfortunately, the only price quoted nowadays is the ceiling price of 17 cents. I doubt if very many of them know that the world market is now far above this quotation. They get very little satisfaction out of technical discussions of world trade and a world fight against inflation. They have payrolls to meet and money is what they need to meet them.

I take it that Great Britain is just as much concerned with inflation as we are. If that nation is apparently prepared to pay 20 cents per pound for its lead, I should think we could do likewise. What answer can I give to lead producers in New Mexico?

In any event, the two-price ceiling for lead is inexcusable and should be abandoned speedily.

Sincerely yours,

CLINTON P. ANDERSON.

Proposed Amendment of Defense Production Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK
OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I have prepared regarding hearings by the Committee on Banking and Currency on the proposed amendments to the Defense Production Act.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEARINGS ON DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT

In view of the statement made this afternoon by the majority leader, Senator MCFARLAND, urging Mr. Charles E. Wilson and the heads of the defense mobilization agencies to speed up their work on recommended amendments to the Defense Production Act, I am glad to make known the decisions of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee which met early this afternoon.

The committee will begin consideration of an extension of the Defense Production Act and any amendments to the act on Tuesday, May 1, and will continue through Friday, May 25. The committee will meet daily, Monday through Friday.

In view of the fact that several titles of the Defense Production Act and the Rent Control Act expire on June 30, it will be necessary for the committee to complete its hearings not later than May 25 in order to have the bill before the Senate in June.

Realizing the tremendous interest in this legislation, the committee has further instructed me, as chairman, to limit oral testimony during these hearings to representatives of major national organizations who will be able to represent the various segments of the national economy. I want to make it plain that, while we will not be able during the remaining time to hear each individual, the committee will welcome any written statement which may be filed for the benefit of the members during their consideration of this legislation.

The committee had previously agreed that any extension of Federal rent control would be considered in conjunction with the hearings on that portion of the Defense Production Act relating to authority for general economic controls.

The committee also agreed that any request to testify during these hearings must be filed not later than Wednesday, April 25, in order that the committee may determine the order of appearance for the witnesses who will open the hearings the following week.

Easing German Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Easing German Controls," which appeared in the Washington Star on yesterday.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EASING GERMAN CONTROLS

The common defense of the Atlantic community has been additionally strengthened by the latest Anglo-French-American relaxation of controls on West Germany's industrial production. The Ruhr—"the workshop of Europe"—will now be rid of many former restraints, and its stepped-up output, in addition to promoting the country's internal economic health, cannot fail to contribute significantly to the free world's effort to counter the threat of Red aggression.

As agreed upon by the three-power Allied High Commission, the relaxation covers a wide and varied field of productive enterprise. Among other things, it removes all limitations on the size and speed of the merchant ships that the Germans are capable of building, and it permits them to resume the manufacture of synthetic oil and rubber. Further, it authorizes them to make ball bearings, primary aluminum, electronic tubes of different kinds, certain types of machine tools and similar items heretofore prohibited or rigidly restricted. Finally, it provides that the present ceiling on their steel output (11,000,000 tons yearly) may be lifted to help build the defenses of Western Europe.

The only thing still subject to strict limitations and outright prohibitions is West German production of a military nature. A special three-power Allied law continues to apply against atomic activity, and other controls remain in force against the manufacture of aircraft, certain electronic equipment and weapons in general. It is noteworthy, however, that the new Anglo-French-American agreement makes allowance for the possibility of granting licenses to companies in the Ruhr and elsewhere to turn out armaments or related items when, as and if such output is found to be desirable or necessary to bulwark the security of the Atlantic community as a whole.

All this is a far cry from the time when some people saw wisdom in the so-called Morgenthau plan. That political and economic absurdity would have done violence to all the laws of nature with a program designed to reduce the Germans to a completely deindustrialized nation of farmers. But the character of Soviet policy, if not simple sanity, soon demonstrated how such "pastoralization" could have ended only in a Western catastrophe. Our Allied relaxation of controls represents a common-sense recognition of the fact that Germany's productive capacity is of prime importance to the defense of freedom.

Posthumous Decoration of Corp. Bobby Smith, of Anderson, S. C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have before me an editorial which appeared in the Anderson (S. C.) Independent on April 5, 1951. It is an open letter to the United Nations concerning the presentation posthumously of the Distinguished Service Cross to Corp. Bobby Smith, of Anderson, S. C., who gave his life in Korea. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE UNITED NATIONS CONCERNING THE LATE CORP. BOBBY SMITH

UNITED NATIONS,
Lake Success, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: We have just learned that the United States Army's General Hodge is coming to Anderson April 12 to present the Distinguished Service Cross to Corp. Bobby Smith, of Anderson.

Corporal Smith will not be here to receive the medal. Corporal Smith is dead.

The medal will be awarded, as they say, posthumously. It will be given to Bobby's parents, who live at No. 5, Bailey Street, in the pleasant Equinox community.

The medal is in recognition of Corporal Smith's devotion to duty, and to his willingness to sacrifice above and beyond the call of duty.

He is one of many heroes, living and dead, whose courage nourished on the good South Carolina air hereabouts and whose love of country springs from a long line of patriots who have fought in all our wars, from the Revolution forward.

Corporal Smith is not the first Anderson County boy to breathe his last in Korea, nor will he be the last.

All of us realize that men are going to be killed when there is war and the families of those who are on the battle lines steel themselves daily against bad news, the meanwhile praying that the fateful telegrams will not come.

Many such telegrams came to Anderson during the last war, gentlemen. Too many have come this time.

It is bad enough when the aims of the war are clear. It is much worse when those aims are confused, faltering, and uncertain as they are today.

We would like to think that when Corporal Smith fell he was convinced that he was dying for his country, and that his sacrifice would contribute in some effective way to eventual peace on earth.

It is fitting and proper that a high general should come to our city bearing a medal for Corp. Bobby Smith, thus assuring that this soldier will be remembered always in the hearts of his countrymen.

But, gentlemen—

The list of Bobby Smiths is growing every hour while you so-called diplomats chatter away inanely, sidestepping the cold facts, dodging the issues, and generally putting on as cowardly a display as has ever disgraced the pages of human history.

You sit there in the security of lushly furnished meeting rooms fearing to show leadership, backing away from challenging all-out the aggression which brought Bobby Smith and others like him to their untimely graves.

You backbite General MacArthur and others who are trying to bring the killing to an end. You want to gag those who would tell the truth about Korea.

It is understandable that you would gag MacArthur. Every time he opens his mouth and says anything about ending the Korean War he puts the UN on the spot.

Every day you procrastinate you are building higher the fire of demand that MacArthur be brought home and allowed to tell the people the truth.

People want to know why the war is being dragged out, they want to know why the killing continues, and the demand will mount in coming days when and if the Chinese Reds launch their threatened offensive which may result in the greatest blood-letting of the war thus far.

People want to hear from the White House, too. It's time for the American voice in UN to be heard a lot louder than ever before. There has been too much pussyfooting, too much fear of stepping on toes, too much regard for the next election and not enough for the lives of American men.

The life of one "Bobby" Smith is too high a price to pay to keep your shabbily operating organization alive if you can offer no more than you have to date.

There was a day, gentlemen, when the UN was looked upon as the hope of the world. You have succeeded only in killing thousands of American "Bobby" Smiths, and you can't or won't say why.

Ours is the voice of one newspaper in what you striped-pants boys sarcastically refer to as the hinterland, but we've got millions of cousins throughout the land who are in chorus with us.

Pay heed, gentlemen, lest that chorus mount in volume until it blows down the hypocritical house of straw in which you cower, paralyzed by fear, and shamed by the deeds of valor of Cpl. "Bobby" Smith and his comrades in arms.

THE INDEPENDENT.

An Undemocratic Ruling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the following news story carried by newspapers in the Forty-first Congressional District, New York, bearing on the President's recent executive order exempting college students with certain scholastic ratings from the draft. The news story, datelined Batavia, N. Y., April 8, follows:

President Truman's recent Executive order exempting college students with C ratings from the draft was attacked here today by former Senator James W. Wadsworth, who said he was "aghast" at its implications. Speaking over station WBTA as a guest on Congressman HAROLD C. OSTERTAG'S weekly radio program, the former Representative from the Forty-first District expressed the hope that widespread opposition to this order would be registered throughout the country, and that it would be heard.

The President's order says, in effect, according to Senator Wadsworth, "that if you attain a rating of 70 percent you need not serve your country, but if you obtain a rating of only 69 percent, you must go into the foxholes."

"I don't like it," he said. "I don't believe the Armed Forces should be made up of men who don't stand high in school. They should be made up of men of every conceivable rating in school."

Senator Wadsworth said he favored deferment of certain students who are being trained in science, engineering, electronics, etc., but objected to the blanket use of a "C" rating for deferments.

Congressman OSTERTAG, concurring in these views, commented that the deferment of draftees on the basis of brains rather than character or military requirements is both unsound and undemocratic.

Concentration of Power in the Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, last week end I returned to Kansas for a few days. While in Topeka I visited with a former colleague and distinguished Member of this body, Senator Arthur Capper, who retains his interest in public affairs, as is evidenced by his broadcast of April 8, 1951, from Station WIBW, Topeka, Kans.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Senator Capper's broadcast be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, because the former Senator gives a timely warning on what is going on in the grab for power within our Government.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPPER SAYS—INCREASINGLY DISTURBED BY GRAB FOR POWER WITHIN GOVERNMENT

A post card from a Mr. J. K. Leiser of Hartford, Kans., indicates that I did not cover quite enough territory a few Sundays ago when I discussed socialism and communism, and attempted to define the same. That was in answer to a letter from Mrs. H. P. Davis, of Neodesha, Kans.

Mr. Leiser wants me to define also fascism, and express my opinion on fascism.

Well, the best definition, and most easily understood, is that fascism is socialism effected through the corporation.

That is, fascism is that form of socialism—abolition of private property—in which the Socialist state is operated through corporations, either government owned or government controlled.

Most recent example, of course, was furnished by Mussolini's so-called corporate state.

As I believe I pointed out 2 weeks ago, communism and socialism hold this in common, by definition:

Communism: The opposite of the system of private property.

Socialism: A state or system in which there is no private property.

To which I now add—

Fascism: Socialism (or the Socialist state) accomplished and operated through the corporation.

You will notice that what we call Russian communism in reality is state socialism. That Soviet Russia takes this same view is evidenced by the official name, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

You may remember also that the word Nazi in common usage a few years ago, is an abbreviation of national (or state) socialism.

All four isms—communism, socialism, naziism, and fascism—are forms of the same concept of government and the relationship between government and the individual.

What we now see in Britain is the spectacle of state socialism masquerading as a labor government.

When the United States withdraws—perhaps I should say if and when the United States withdraws—its financial and other forms of economic support from the British Labor government, the odds strongly are that Britain will have to become openly a Socialist state.

Whether you boldly call the onion an onion, or try to kid yourself and others by calling the onion a rose, you still get the smell of the onion instead of the scent of the rose.

Returning from the realm of poesy to the starkness of fact.

In the Socialist state—whether you call it by that title, or call it the Communist state, the Fascist state, the garrison state, or the police state—the outstanding feature of that state is that the government is everything, all-powerful; the individual is nothing, powerless.

As one Frank Chordorov, a classic economist who also is able to write, put it in one of his articles in Human Events weekly pamphlet recently:

"Any course that tends to increase the power of government must deplete the power of the individual."

I say to you, and I should ponder that statement well, my friends, and very seriously and thoughtfully—

"Any course that tends to increase the power of government must deplete the power of the individual."

That is why some of us, for some time, have become increasingly disturbed by what might be termed the "grab for power" in government.

This grab for power has not been just in the Federal Government in Washington. It has been evident in State capitols; in municipal governments—city councils and commissions and managers; in school boards; throughout Government bureaus and agencies.

And moreover, this grab for power is not just power in government and power over patronage.

The grab includes the grab for power over business; over agriculture; over industry; over money and credit; over electrical power, transportation and communications; down the road, power over labor—after using arrogant but short-sighted labor leaders to center all power in a government which these anticipate they can control, forever and a day; and of course, power over the individual, his life and living, his freedom of thought, action, movements.

In the last analysis, the exercise of this power calls for dictatorial methods, dictators, dictatorships—all the way from local school boards to the supposedly three-branched Federal Government.

The focal point in this contest for several months past has been the Senate of the United States, over whether the war-making power resides in the White House or in the Congress of the United States.

Public attention on this struggle between the White House and the Congress has been diverted in the past few months by (1) the crime investigations by the Kefauver committee of the Senate, and (2) the RFC investigations by the Fulbright committee of the Senate.

Instead of following the so-called great debate in the Senate, and the almost equally important struggles in the House of Representatives, people have been regaled with spectacular and televised developments by those committees.

The heart of the issue, the kernel of the coconut, in the great debate is over the war-making power in our Federal Government.

I do not mean at this time to go into the proposition of the transference of the war-making power of the Government of the United States to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

In the long run that might be even more fatal than what the fight in the Senate is against today—whether the President shall be allowed to usurp the war-making power.

But for the immediate future, who shall exercise the war-making power is the all-important issue involved in the "great debate." In the news columns and to a great extent in the public mind the issue is figured "troops to Europe."

But the "troops to Europe" really is only the superficial issue, the token, so to speak, of the real issue.

The real issue, I will say again, is who shall exercise the war-making power.

At the risk of repetition of some ideas I expressed some 6 weeks ago, I propose to discuss again this matter of war-making power.

First, I quote from Senator HOMER FERGUSON, of Michigan, who said a few days ago:

"One of the major struggles in the evolution of both modern and ancient democracy has been to popularize controls of the decision on war or peace, and to restrict the freedom of the head of the nation to use the armed forces at his own discretion.

"For centuries kings, at whim, sent armies to fight in foreign lands where thousands of voiceless subjects paid the price of their lives. Memories of these evils left strong fears. * * *

"The American colonists inherited these fears, strengthened by forced participation in colonial wars which were the result of decisions over which the colonists had no control. * * *

"It was with these traditional fears that the founding fathers set out in framing the Constitution to control the power to involve the new Nation in war. It was to Congress that the Constitution specifically entrusted not only the sole power to declare war but also (other powers in connection with waging wars). * * *

"The makers of the Constitution did not conceive of the President's powers as commander in chief to be unlimited.

"They clearly intended that the danger of an irresponsible sovereign were to be avoided by the United States. * * * They concentrated the power to raise, finance, and govern the armed forces, as well as the power to declare war, in the hands of Congress.

"A long line of distinguished Presidents, reaching down into the twentieth century, thought these decisions wise and abided by them."

A few more than a hundred years ago Abraham Lincoln put it this way:

"Kings have always been involving and impoverishing their peoples in wars, pretending generally, if not always, that the good of the people was the object.

"This our (Constitutional) Convention understood to be the most oppressive of all oppressions, and they resolved to so frame the Constitution that no man should hold the power to bring this oppression upon us."

More than a half-century before Lincoln, Thomas Jefferson expressed it this way:

The Constitution, he said, "had muzzled the dog of war" by transferring the power of "letting him loose from the executive to the legislative * * * from those who spend to those who are to pay."

And I would add this comment of my own, in reference to the great debate of 1950–51.

If the war-making power resides in the President, then America has returned to the days of the ruler—the days when the ruler's word was law; the days when the people themselves had nothing to say about the Government's decisions as to war or peace.

Of course, the one-man rule of a subject people was one of the things our forefathers left Europe to escape.

Europe, after they left it, has remained much the same, despite the claims to the contrary. Even since the American Revolution we have seen a Napoleon, a Bismarck, a Wilhelm, a Hitler, a Mussolini, a Stalin, and the evils they have brought to the world, through one-man rule.

I fear too many of our present generation do not realize this. So they are falling for the idea of turning over to a strong man the powers—not only the war-making powers, but also the taxing powers, the money and credit and other control powers, the conscription powers, that the kings used to have.

And as surely as we surrender those powers to the all-powerful, we will have our Napoleons, our Wilhelms, our Hitlers, our Mussolinis, our Stalins, and all the attendant evils.

It is far from happy prospect.

Friends, I believe the country is becoming aroused to the danger, as evidenced by the growing public support accorded Senators who have been waging the fight against turning the war-making power over to the President.

This is one fight that should be continued, and waged with undeviating vigor. Eternal vigilance and eternal resistance are the only guaranties of liberty.

The Dakota Cowboy Who Became President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Dakota Cowboy Who Became President," by Hjalmar Bjornson, which appeared in the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune on April 8, 1951. It deals with the life of the late Theodore Roosevelt.

It is estimated that it will cost approximately $150 over the regular amount allowed for printing, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, even though the cost exceeds the regular amount.

In my opinion, Mr. President, it is one of the finest, most concise, and clear articles ever written about Theodore Roosevelt's life in the State of North Dakota.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DAKOTA COWBOY WHO BECAME PRESIDENT—SAD, DISCOURAGED TEDDY ROOSEVELT FOUND IN THE BADLANDS A NEW VIGOR THAT CARRIED HIM TO THE WHITE HOUSE

(By Hjalmar Bjornson)

For more than 60 years Teddy Roosevelt and the badlands of North Dakota have been associated as closely in the public mind as Minneapolis and St. Paul.

Yet many may not realize today how potently the Little Missouri wastelands influenced the career of the future President.

Theodore Roosevelt was both a sad and disillusioned man when he came to Dakota Territory in 1884. In February of that year his mother and his wife had died within a few hours of each other. The slender young New York assemblyman was left a widower at 25, with an infant daughter to rear—Alice, who was to become the darling of the White House.

Not many weeks after that personal tragedy, Roosevelt suffered a bitter political disappointment. The Republican Party machine soundly defeated an independent faction Roosevelt had led.

Life seemed dark indeed as Roosevelt gloomily packed his bags and boarded a train for the Little Missouri to get away from the world. He was, said a friend, "a broken-hearted man." Roosevelt himself wrote his sister, Anna, some time after his arrival in North Dakota:

"I am sorry my political career should be over, but after all it makes very little difference."

Roosevelt at that time could not foresee the therapeutic value of the West and of his new cowboy companions. Neither did he count on the force of his own ego. Before his badlands venture ended 3 years later, a Medora friend prophesied: "That man will be President someday."

How the rough frontier life restored Teddy Roosevelt's health and confidence in himself is clearly revealed in the Letters of Theodore Roosevelt, now being published by the Harvard University Press. Edited by Elting E. Morison, the first two volumes throw new sidelights on the factors that made Theodore Roosevelt the political maverick he was.

Roosevelt first fell in love with the Little Missouri badlands in the fall of 1883, before his wife and mother died. He had journeyed West to hunt buffalo as a guest of the Eaton brothers of the Custer Trail ranch, who then were in the process of founding the dude ranch industry. The wild beauty of the buttes and brakes, the rugged life of the cattlemen, enthralled him. He purchased, before he returned East, a partnership in the Maltese Cross ranch adjoining the Eatons, 7 miles up the river from present-day Medora. He renamed the ranch Chimney Butte.

It was to Chimney Butte that he fled to forget his personal grief and get away from political problems in 1884.

"I am out here," he said, "because I cannot get up any enthusiasm for the Republican candidate (James G. Blaine) and it seems to me to punch cattle is the best way to avoid campaigning."

But soon after he reached Dakota, Roosevelt's melancholy vanished. The West gave him new excitement and a new gamble. Within a month he wrote to his sister Anna, enthusiastically:

"Well, I have been having a glorious time here, and am well hardened now. I have just come in from spending 13 hours in the saddle. For every day I have been here I have had my hands full. First and foremost, the cattle have done well, and I regard the outlook for making the business a success as being very hopeful.

"This winter I lost about 25 head from wolves, cold, and the like; the others are in admirable shape, and I have about 155 calves. I shall put on a thousand more cattle and shall make it my regular business. In the autumn I shall bring out Bill Seawall and Bill Dow and put them up on a ranch with a very few cattle to start with, and in the course of a couple years give them quite a little herd also.

"I have never been in better health than on this trip. I am in the saddle all day long either taking part in the round-up of the cattle or else hunting antelope. I got one the other day—another good head for our famous hall at Leeholm.

"The country is growing on me, more and more; it has a curious fantastic beauty of its own; and as I own six or eight horses I have a fresh one every day and ride on a lope all day long. How sound I do sleep at night now. There is not so much game, however; the cattlemen have crowded it out and only a few antelope and deer remain.

"I shot a few jack rabbits and curlews, with a rifle; and I also killed eight rattlesnakes. Tomorrow my two men go east for the cattle; and I shall start out alone to try my hand at finding my way over the prairie by myself."

Roosevelt had caught the enthusiasm that was roaring through the Dakota country like a prairie fire. It was a good year, and everybody plunged in the wildest speculation. The New Yorker's interest in politics flared again, too. He paused in the heat of the round-up to write to Henry Cabot Lodge that summer:

"I shall be East about a week after you get this letter and I wish to see you at once. I am very anxious you should take no steps hastily for I do not know a man in the country whose future I regard as so promising as is yours; and I would not for anything have you do a single thing that could hurt it, unless it was a question of principle when of course I should not advise you to hesitate for a moment."

Back in Medora after that trip East he again wrote Lodge:

"In a day or two I will start out with two hunters, six riding ponies and a canvas top prairie schooner, for the Big Horn mountains. You would be amused to see me, in my little broad sombrero hat, fringed and beaded buckskin shirt, horsehide chaparajos or riding trousers, and cowhide boots with braided bridle and silver spurs.

"I have always liked horse and rifle. Being like yourself, I prefer * * * sport which needs a buckskin shirt to those whose votaries adopt the red coat. A buffalo is nobler game than an anise seed bag. The Anglomaniacs to the contrary notwithstanding."

Roosevelt took pride in his hunting prowess and he loved to boast about his successes. He wrote his sister Anna from Wyoming: "We met a dozen parties either of English or eastern amateurs or of professional hunters, who were on the mountain at the same time we were; but not one of them had half the success I had. This was mainly because they hunted on horseback, much the easiest and least laborious way, while Merrifield and I, in our moccasins and buckskin suits, hunted almost every day on foot, following the game into the deepest and most inaccessible ravines. (Arthur Merrifield was one of Roosevelt's partners in the Chimney Butte ranch.)

"Then again, most of them would only venture to attack the grizzly bears if they found them in the open, or if they were several men together, while we followed them into their own chosen haunts and never but one of us has shot at a bear."

Though Roosevelt the hunter was to follow his hobby to the remotest corners of the world in later years, he never forgot the first bear he killed.

"We had found where he had been feeding on the carcass of an elk; and followed his trail into a dense pine forest fairly choked with fallen timber. While noiselessly and slowly threading our way through the thickest part of it, I saw Merrifield, who was directly ahead of me, sink suddenly to his knees and turn half around, with face fairly ablaze with excitement.

"Cocking my rifle and stepping quickly forward, I found myself face to face with a great bear, who was less than 25 feet off—not eight steps. He had been roused from his sleep by our approach; he sat up in his lair, and turned his huge head slowly toward us.

"At that distance and in such a place it was very necessary to kill or disable him at the first fire; doubtless my face was pretty white, but the blue barrel was as steady as a rock as I glanced along it until I could see the top of the bead fairly between his two sinister looking eyes; as I pulled the trigger I jumped aside out of the smoke, to be ready if he charged; but it was needless, for the great brute was struggling in the death agony, and, as you will see when I bring home his skin the bullet hole in his skull was exactly between his eyes as if I had measured the distance with a carpenter's rule.

"This bear was nearly nine feet long and weighed over a thousand pounds. I had grand sport with the elk too, and the woods fairly rang with my shouting when I brought down my first lordly bull, with great branching antlers; but after I had begun bear killing other sport seemed tame.

"Oh, I have had good sport; and enough excitement and fatigue to prevent overmuch thought; and moreover I have at last been able to sleep well at night. But unless I was bear hunting all the time I'm afraid I should soon get as restless with this life as with the life at home."

Roosevelt's life in Dakota, however, was not all hunting. He became the owner of two ranches—the Chimney Butte, near Medora, and the Elkhorn, 35 miles down river. He apparently intended to remain a rancher for he wrote his friends back East, "I do not believe that I shall ever be likely to come back into political life."

Roosevelt enjoyed ranch work and, whether he knew anything about cattle or not, felt his work was important. He wrote Lodge from Medora in 1885:

"I have had hard work, and a good deal of fun since I came out here. Tomorrow I start for the round-up, and I've just come in from taking a thousand head of cattle up on the trail. The weather was very bad and I had my hands full, working night and day and being able to take off my clothes but once during the week I was out.

"The river has been very high recently and I have had on two or three occasions to swim my horse across it; a new experience to me. Otherwise I have done little that is exciting in the way of horsemanship; as you know I am no horseman, and I cannot ride an unbroken horse with any comfort. The other day I lunched with the Marquis de Mores, a French cavalry officer; he had hunted all through France, but he told me he never saw in Europe such stiff jumping as we had on the Meadowbrook hunt."

The name of Antoine de Vallombrosa, Marquis de Mores, introduces one of the more bizarre incidents of Roosevelt's life in Dakota.

The Marquis de Mores, a hot-blooded French nobleman about the same age as Roosevelt, had arrived in Dakota in the spring of 1883, some months before the New Yorker's first visit.

De Mores had made nearly half a million dollars trading on the Bourse in Paris. Then he had married Medora Van Hoffman, daughter of a Wall Street banker and multimillionaire.

He came to the Dakota hamlet then known as Little Missouri, bought an estate totaling some 600 square miles, built a new town across the river from Little Missouri and named it Medora, for his wife.

The marquis had conceived the idea of establishing a huge packing plant at Medora, building a chain of refrigerated storehouses across the country and, in short, running the Chicago packers out of business by slaughtering beef at its source. His plans were sound—so sound that, his sympathetic biographers claim, the big packing companies and their Wall Street financiers ganged up on the Frenchman and forced him to abandon his enterprise, after he had spent nearly $1,500,000.

De Mores unjustly connected Roosevelt, his badlands neighbor, with his Wall Street enemies—and with a prosecution for murder, in which De Mores was acquitted but which he also blamed on his financial foes. De Mores wrote Roosevelt a note in the fall of 1885, saying: "If you are my enemy, I want to know it. I am always on hand as you know and between gentlemen it is easy to settle matters of this sort directly."

Roosevelt was well aware that the Frenchman had killed two men in earlier years, in duels in France. Yet he quickly responded:

"Most emphatically I am not your enemy; if I were you would know it, for I would be an open one and would not have asked you to my house or gone to yours. As your final words, however, seem to imply a threat, it is due to myself to say that the statement is not made through any fear of possible consequences to me; I too, as you know, am always on hand, and am ever ready to hold myself accountable in any way for anything I have said or done."

That was sufficient to soothe the count, but rumors of the incident spread over the badlands. The marquis had challenged Roosevelt to a duel, the story ran. Roosevelt had accepted, had chosen to fight with rifles at 12 paces. But the duel never came off.

Roosevelt did have some experience with frontier gunplay.

Three rustlers fleeing from a posse stole a boat from his headquarters ranch and rowed downstream. Roosevelt, then a deputy sheriff in Billings County, started in pursuit. He described the chase as follows:

"I got the three horse thieves in fine shape. My two main men and I ran down the river 3 days in our boat and then came on their camp by surprise.

"We simply crept noiselessly up, rising when only a few yards distant, covered them with cocked rifles while I told them to throw up their hands. They saw that we had the drop on them completely and I guess they also saw that we surely meant to shoot if they hesitated and so their hands went up at once.

"We kept them with us nearly a week, being caught in an ice jam; then we came to a ranch where I got a wagon, and I sent my two men on downstream with the boat, while I took the three captives overland, a 2 days journey, to a town where I could give them to the sheriff."

Rustlers were a constant problem of the early cattlemen, and Roosevelt was an active member of the stockmen's association, whose main concern was curbing cattle thieves. In the spring of 1886 he wrote: "I have just returned from the stockmen's convention at Miles City, which raw, thriving frontier town was for 3 days thronged with hundreds of rough-looking, broad-hatted men, numbering among them all the great cattle and horse raisers of the Northwest. I took my position very well in the convention, and indeed these westerners have now pretty well accepted me as one of themselves, and as a representative stockman. I am on the executive committee of the association and president of its Dakota branch—all of which directly helps me in my business relations here."

Roosevelt had some misgivings about how he was being accepted as a cowhand. There was reason for this.

The first time he took part in a round-up, the story goes, two hardened cowboys heard him shout, "hasten forward quickly there," in his shrill eastern accent. The phrase became a byword in the Dakotas. He was called "Four-eyes" because of his glasses, and cowboys often smiled as he joined them on the round-up or at the bar. But he earned the respect of the westerners and they were his stanchest political supporters in the years that followed. He took part in their fun and other affairs, and in 1886 delivered a Fourth of July speech at Dickinson to "a great crowd of cowboys and grangers."

Roosevelt enjoyed the vigorous life of the range, thinking nothing of spending as much as 18 hours a day in the saddle. But he was only a part-time cowboy. He never forgot his literary interests and even when preparing to chase horse thieves, he wrote Lodge. "I shall take Matthew Arnold along. I had had no chance at all to read it as yet."

He spent part of his time writing and had fixed up a study in his ranch house. In a letter to his family he told how his time was divided:

"Three out of four days I spend the morning and evening in the ranch house where I have a sitting room all to myself reading and working at various pieces I have now on hand. They may come to nothing whatever, but on the other hand they may succeed. At any rate I am doing some honest work whatever the result is. I have managed to combine an outdoors life, possessing much variety and excitement and now and then a little adventure, with a literary life also."

Once when a relative was thinking of coming West to visit he wrote back and said: "I rather dread seeing you at table, for we have of course no social distinctions, and the cowboys sit down in their shirt sleeves."

His family wrote him about the strikes that were then troubling the country and he answered by saying: "My men here are hard working, laboring men, who work longer hours for no greater wages than many of the strikers; but they are Americans through and through; I believe nothing would give them greater pleasure than a chance with their rifles at one of the mobs. When we get the papers, especially in relation to the dynamite business, they become more furiously angry and excited than I do."

Roosevelt believed in direct action, and had little patience for arbitration or a peaceful approach. A border incident with Mexico in the early fall of 1886 bothered him and in referring to it he gave first expression to an idea that formed the basis of his "rough riders" in the later Spanish-American War. He wrote to Henry Cabot Lodge from Medora: "I have written on to the Secretary of War Endicott offering to try to raise some companies of horse riflemen out here in the event of trouble with Mexico.

"Will you telegraph me at once if war becomes inevitable? Out here things are so much behind hand that I might not hear the news for a week. I haven't the least idea there will be any trouble; but as my chance of doing anything in the future worth doing seems to grow continually smaller I intend to grasp at every opportunity that turns up.

"I think there is some good fighting stuff among these harum-scarum rough riders out here; whether I can bring it out is another matter. All the boys were delighted with your photographs except the one in which you left the saddle which they spotted at once."

Nothing came of the Mexican incident, but the idea that there was fighting stuff in the harum-scarum West never left Roosevelt. He turned to it again when he felt a need to grasp every opportunity that was available to him.

Roosevelt's boyish enthusiasm for the badlands and the life of a gentleman cowhand lasted until the winter of 1886–87—the winter of the big blizzards that ruined cattlemen all over the West. He spent that winter in the East, as usual, but he returned in April to Medora and its desolated ranges.

"I am bluer than indigo about the cattle," he wrote. "It is even worse than I feared; I wish I was sure I would lose no more than half the money, $30,000, I invested here. I am planning how to get out of it."

He wrote to Lodge in the same vein: "Well, we have had a perfect smashup all through the cattle country. The losses are crippling. For the first time I have been utterly unable to enjoy a visit to my ranch. I shall be glad to get home."

But Roosevelt doubtless would have quit the West eventually, without the impetus provided by the blizzards. In 1887 he married again, and by that time he was again taking an active interest in politics. From then on his interest in the West was largely sentimental.

He did go back, however, to hunt and to seek votes—once while running for Vice President in 1900, again in 1903 when he was President and looking forward to the nomination in 1904.

When his train reached Medora on the latter trip, he wrote afterward, "The entire population of the badlands, down to the smallest baby, had gathered to greet me. This was formerly my own home station. The old men and women I knew well; the younger ones had been wild, tow-headed children when I worked along the Little Missouri. They had all gathered in the town hall which was draped for a dance. I shook hands with them all, and almost each one had some memory of special association with me which he or she wished to discuss. I only regretted that I could not spend hours with them."

The cowboy who had become President then looked back upon his life in the free and open West and extracted from it the philosophy of his later years. "We knew toil and hardship and hunger and thirst," he said, "and we saw men die violent deaths as they worked among the horses and cattle, or fought in evil feuds with one another; but we felt the beat of hardy life in our veins, and ours was the glory of work and the joy of living."

The swashbuckling life of those years was gone, as he said, "to the isle of the ghosts and of strange dead memories." But Theodore Roosevelt had taken with him to the Presidency the free spirit of both the old and new West.

Proposed Aid to India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter from Mr. Robert Delson, of New York City, which appeared in this morning's Washington Post, urging immediate action on the aid to India proposal.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAIN FOR INDIA, NOW

It is of the utmost importance that Congress should take speedy action to make available grain to India and to do so on a gift rather than a loan basis.

Our differences with India on foreign policy should not lessen our interest in aiding its suffering millions. To argue otherwise is to assume that no nation may expect help from the United States unless it is a willing satellite. Such an assumption can only serve the purposes of the Kremlin and must be vigorously repudiated by the American people. I believe, however, that the fundamental sympathies of the Indian Government and people are in accord with our own and that this will be manifested as our own position and that of the Soviet Union is demonstrated in action.

In the meantime, we should not too hastily reject the possibility that India's independent role may help to retard the transformation of the political into a military war. If, as now appears, this should prove impossible, our sympathetic understanding of India's role is likely to influence the Nehru government to associate itself more closely with the democratic governments against Soviet aggression. Let us understand, however, that the heritage of suspicion bequeathed by western colonialism can be dissipated only very slowly and will continue to retard cooperation even on matters of common interest.

In order that the proposed legislation should serve its full purpose, the grain should be made available as a gift. Careful study has revealed the fact that India would be unable to repay a loan without seriously impeding its ability to carry out its development program, including its plans for producing desperately needed foodstuffs.

Even more undesirable is the proposal that India acquire the grain from us on a barter basis. India is already making available to us all of the strategic materials and other export commodities which she can presently produce. (India shipped to the United States in 1950 three-quarters of its total exports of manganese and mica; 1951 deliveries are continuing at a greater rate than the 1950 average.) The dollars she is to receive for this are already earmarked for imports of food and other essential commodities and could not be diverted to repayment of a loan.

Member, American Emergency Food Commission.

The United Nations and Communist China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Gould Lincoln, dealing with the war in Korea and the attitude of the United Nations toward the Chinese Communist Government, which appeared recently in the Washington Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POLITICAL MILL

(By Gould Lincoln)

IT'S TIME UNITED STATES PUBLIC KNEW OF KOREA DEALS—BRITISH SHOULD STOP YAPPING ABOUT GENERAL MAC ARTHUR

Does the United Nations wish to win the war in Korea (against Red China) or not? Or is the purpose to make some deal in the future which will admit the Chinese Communist Government into the United Nations itself? It's about time these questions were cleared up.

The loud screams from Britain, particularly the members of the Labor government and the supporting press, over the military views of Gen. Douglas MacArthur—who very clearly wishes to win the Korean war and not to make any concessions to the Chinese Communists—point up the issue. Not only do these British demand that General MacArthur be recalled or controlled, but they assert the purpose of the United Nations is to avoid an all-out war with China and to bring the new China, by peaceful means, into the world family of nations.

THREE MAJOR CRITICISMS

The United Nations many weeks ago voted Communist China an aggressor—because of the war the Communist Chinese are waging against the UN forces in Korea. But it was with apparent reluctance that the British and some of the other member nations supported this condemnation. The Red Chinese remain aggressors. The military situation in Korea, however, because of the unwillingness of the United Nations to permit an attack on Communist bases, supplies, and men across the border in Manchuria, is made tremendously difficult for the UN armies, under the command of General MacArthur.

General MacArthur has been variously criticized—in this country as well as in Britain—for outspoken comments and his proposals that the UN forces attack the Communist bases wherever they find them and that the Chinese Nationalist armies in Formosa be used in a direct attack upon the Chinese mainland. One of the criticisms here is that a military commander has no business making political statements—such as his recent letter to Republican leader JOE MARTIN, of the House. Another is that he is preventing a settlement of the war in Korea, and a third that his comments and proposals threaten to force a third world war.

An answer to the first criticism is that Mr. MARTIN, having made a speech in which he urged the use of the Chinese Nationalists in an all-out effort to end the Korean War, wrote to General MacArthur and asked his views. To the second criticism, it may be said that the Chinese Communists have given no indication they want a settlement—and they seem to be satisfied to continue a war in which the UN's armed forces are hamstrung by being prevented from attacking enemy bases. In reply to the criticism that MacArthur's statements may hasten a third world war, it may be pointed out that the present efforts to discredit General MacArthur can only result in encouraging the Chinese Communists to continue the war in Korea, and in making them believe that the United Nations never intended to do more than slap them on the wrist.

CLEAR STATEMENT NEEDED

General MacArthur's letters and statements do not alter the underlying issues in this Korean war—waged now by the Chinese Communists, with Russian approval and supplies, if not men—against the United Nations. A failure of the UN to win the Korean war—and by winning the war is meant a settlement that will provide for a free Korea, without appeasement of the Chinese Reds—would be a tremendous blow to the free nations which are opposing world Communist aggression. The loss of the war would mean, in all probability, a consolidation of Asia under Communist domination. On the other hand, a defeat for the Red Chinese would be a major blow to Communst aggression everywhere in the world—and that includes Europe and the British Isles.

It's time that the administration make a clear pronouncement on Korea and what goes on there, so that the American people, who are supplying the vast majority of the fighting men and practically all of the supplies to carry on the war, may understand what they may expect; and it's time the British stop their yapping about General MacArthur—a great general who does not go two ways at the same time.

Should the RFC Be Abolished?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES P. KEM

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, the Senate will soon begin debate on Reorganization Plan No. 1, pertaining to the RFC.

Last Sunday, on the American Forum of the Air, I debated the proposal, Should the RFC be abolished? with Mr. Wendell Berge, former Assistant Attorney General of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the transcript of our discussion.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHOULD THE RFC BE ABOLISHED?

ANNOUNCER. Should the RFC be abolished?

The National Broadcasting Co. presents the American Forum of the Air, founded 22 years ago by Theodore Granik, and dedicated to the full and public discussion of all sides of all issues, coming to you from the Continental Room of the Wardman Park Hotel in Washington, D. C. Each week at this time the American Forum of the Air presents special guest speakers, so that you in your home may enjoy authoritative discussions of the provocative and vital topics of our time.

Here today to discuss this problem is Senator JAMES P. KEM, Republican, of Missouri, a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and author of a resolution to abolish the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and Mr. Wendell Berge, former Assistant Attorney General of the United States and Chairman of the Small Manufacturers' Emergency Committee, and your moderator, Theodore Granik.

Moderator GRANIK. Recent hearings by the Senate Banking Subcommittee, headed by Senator FULBRIGHT, have uncovered evidence of mismanagement and so-called influence in the granting of loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—the RFC. President Truman has proposed that the agency be reorganized, replacing the five board members with a single administrator. But many have urged that the RFC be abolished; that there is no longer a need for it, that its functions can be handled otherwise.

Today, the American Forum of the Air attempts to look at both sides of the RFC case. Should the RFC be reorganized? Or should it be abolished as proposed by Senator JAMES P. KEM, of Missouri?

Now, Mr. Berge, as Chairman of the Small Manufacturers' Emergency Committee, would you explain your charges that big business is trying to kill off the RFC at the expense of small business?

Mr. BERGE. Mr. Granik, one of the crying needs of small manufacturers and small business generally in this country today is for long-term and intermediate credit in order to expand their businesses and get their share of the production that is necessary for our national economy.

Local banks are not permitted to make intermediate and long-term loans: I mean, loans for 3, 5, and 10 years, which small business urgently needs.

When it comes to the big banks of the country, the Wall Street banks and insurance companies, they are not interested in making a loan for $100,000 or $75,000 in some remote place in Georgia or Texas. Moreover, since these loans that small manufacturers' enterprise needs, generally put those manufacturers in competition with big business, with monopolistic interests, these banks and insurance companies are all the more unwilling to help out because it is a well known fact that there are interlocking directorates between the large, monopolistic corporations of the country and the larger banks.

The banks are represented on the boards of the big corporations, and the big corporations are represented on the boards of the banks. They are seizing on this opportunity which they think is a windfall because of certain revelations about irregularities in the RFC. They are seizing on this to make an all-out drive for abolition of the RFC which I think would be disastrous to the small businessmen of the country.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KEM, do you have a statement?

Senator KEM. I have seen no evidence whatever that big business and banking interests oppose the continuation of the RFC. Those who stand to profit from the RFC's operations through favoritism and influence are the principal ones that are opposing the discontinuation of the RFC.

Those who value RFC as a useful tool to bring about and promote the handout state, that is, as a step toward socializing banking in the United States, and those who are holding lush jobs under the RFC, favor its continuance.

Many of these are liberals; that is, they are liberal with other people's money.

My opinion is that the RFC has survived its usefulness. For that reason, I have introduced into the Congress a bill to abolish it, lock, stock, and barrel.

What I propose is an orderly liquidation under the Secretary of the Treasury.

Moderator GRANIK. And with a decent burial?

Senator KEM. Yes; and with a decent burial as Mr. Jesse Jones so well said.

There is nothing so permanent, as has been said, as a temporary government agency. The RFC was organized as a temporary agency: It was to last for a year, and it was to help banks and businesses through the depression.

Since that time, RFC has been like Topsy. It has just growed and growed. Now we know, unfortunately, it has become more and more corrupt.

Moderator GRANIK. Mr. Berge, do you think it has outlived its usefulness?

Mr. BERGE. No; I certainly don't. The fact that it was originally organized for a temporary purpose, I think is irrelevant.

In 1932, when it was formed, we were in a banking and industrial crisis brought about by mismanagement of private business. A lot of the big banks of the country were about to fail. Railroads were in receivership. That was the need then, and the RFC met that need. It made big loans; loans to banks like the Dawes' Bank in Chicago. It was $80,000,000 as I recall it.

I don't criticise that because if the bank had failed, a lot of people would have suffered. But that was the need then.

Conditions changed. In the war, World War II, RFC was needed for necessary financing of war enterprises and now, since the war, during the late forties, RFC served a very important need in supplying long-term and intermediate credit to small enterprises, small manufacturers who could not get it, as I have said before, from their local banks.

At the present time, the RFC is needed in the mobilization program. Without going into detail, it is carrying on the financing of many projects that are essential in the mobilization effort which, again, can't get private credit.

So the fact that something was regarded as temporary at its inception, does not necessarily mean that it should be abolished now, because times change. Congress has apparently changed its mind from time to time by extending the RFC.

I would like to ask Senator KEM a question. He said there wasn't any evidence that big banks wanted the RFC abolished. What is the significance of the fact that the Wall Street Journal is making an all-out drive for its abolishment, and we might mention Colonel McCormick's papers, and the Scripps-Howard papers, and the fact that it is the bigger enterprises and not the small businesses that want the RFC terminated.

Senator KEM. I did not know that. I know that those papers you have mentioned have always stood for the free-enterprise system. They have been against socialization of industry in any way.

The disclosures brought about by the Fulbright committee make it clear that, as a result of political pressure, unsound loans in large amounts have been made by the RFC. In many cases, the intent of Congress has been wholly disregarded. These aromas emitting from the RFC—it has been called a Royal Fruit Cake—prove that it is spoiled through and through. The American people want it abolished.

Moderator GRANIK. Do you want to ask a question?

Mr. BERGE. I just thought that it is in order, briefly, to go into the banking record of the RFC.

Senator KEM. It seems to me, Mr. Berge, if you will permit me to say so, you meet yourself coming back. You say, first, that the big banks and the big business of the country want the RFC abolished, and then you complain about large loans made to the RFC.

I think that shows why there is only one banker who appeared before the McClellan committee. He was Mr. Cosgriff, the president of a bank in Utah and a member of the Board of Directors of RFC, who made a strong plea for the continuation of the RFC. That is the only banker that appeared before the committee.

I just want to say this. One of the fundamental principles in the American constitutional system is that the control of the purse strings of the Federal Government shall remain in the hands of the elected representatives of the people.

The RFC purse strings are in the hands of power-hungry, self-seeking bureaucrats who never have to answer to the people.

Mr. BERGE. I am not criticizing any large loans of the RFC because whether a loan is large or small can only be judged in relation to the industry. A loan of half a million dollars may be large if it is for a manufacturer of toys, say, or gadgets. But it would be small in relation to steel and aluminum. What is small business, small manufactures, has to be judged in relation to the industry where the loan is made.

The loans that the RFC has made have promoted competition in steel and in aluminum and in other principal industries where the loan might, in terms of dollars and cents, be large. But the fact is that something like 90 percent of the loans of RFC have been under a hundred thousand dollars, and a substantial number of those have been under $25,000.

Senator KEM. Let me say, in that connection, that 75 percent of the total amount of the loans made by RFC have been in loans of more than $100,000. In other words, over $4,000,000,000 has been loaned by RFC since it started, and three-fourths, or more than $3,500,000,000 has been authorized in loans of more than a hundred thousand dollars.

Now, we do not have time to go into the loans, but I might mention that the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad received $85,000,000. Kaiser-Frazer, in 1949, received an RFC loan of $44,000,000, and in December of 1950 came back and got another $25,000,000. Then there is the odiferous Lustron loan of $37,500,000. The RFC tells us they have charged off as a loss almost all of that loan. The people have taken on the chin a loss of $35,500,000.

Then there is the Texmass, or perhaps it ought to be called the Texmess, loan of $10,100,000.

It just does not do to talk here about the great beneficence of the RFC to small business. The fact is that over three-fourths of their loans have been made to these agencies of special privilege who come down here and wangle through loans in tremendous amounts.

Moderator GRANIK. I would like to ask how this great banking institution can regain public confidence after all it took about finagling and improper influence.

Senator KEM. I could answer that question. I would like to say that the RFC, in my opinion, must go. The people will be satisfied with nothing less. They are fed up. They are fed up with political favoritism, influence, unearned fees, natural royal pastel mink coats, free luxury hotel accomodations for Government officials.

People from all over the country are writing to Members of Congress and asking, "Are there no more public morals in Washington? Have they gone out of style?" That sort of thing hurts the pride of every American, every decent American.

Mr. BERGE. About those things, nobody is going to defend, and I am certainly not, any of the irregularities that have been shown by the Fulbright committee. But you do not throw the baby out with the bath. Those instances of influence, deplorable as they may have been in some instances, are not any argument against continuance of the RFC.

There have been numerous instances in our history where people have not been entirely faithful to their trust. When Secretary Fall was sent to prison that was no argument for abolishing the Department of the Interior. For that matter, let us look at private business concerns.

There are plenty of instances where private bankers have not lived up to the highest ethics of their calling. I remember that a man named Whitney and a man named Mitchel went to jail in New York for mismanagement and various derelictions in connection with their private banking operations. That was no reason for closing their institutions.

Senator KEM. If those men were running the RFC, that would be one very good reason to abolish it.

Moderator GRANIK. Gentlemen, I have before me a copy of last year's Senate hearings relating to the transfer of the RFC to the Commerce Department. I would like to quote part of Secretary Charles Sawyer's testimony. He said:

"I do feel that the lending of money as it is done by the RFC, or should be done, is a business function. Believing, as I do, that the job of the Department of Commerce is to assist business, it does not violate any theory of mine, to say that the RFC and its activities is a very proper part of our effort to help American business."

Just prior to his saying that, Senator SCHOEPPEL said:

"Mr. Secretary, you are the head of the great Commerce Department of the country and doing a very creditable job. * * * I think that has been pretty generally reflected in your activity and in your conduct of the Department."

In view of that feeling, would it not be a possible solution to put the RFC in the Department of Commerce?

Senator KEM. That plan has been before the Congress and was turned down sometime ago. I do not feel that you gain any thing by taking the same personnel over and putting them under Secretary Sawyer. He is pretty busy, busy in court and otherwise. I do not think you gain anything by that. I think what the people want is to have the house cleaned, lock, stock, and barrel, as I have said.

Mr. BERGE. Certainly there is no objection to cleaning the house. If you have a few bad apples in a barrel, you throw them out. You don't throw away the whole barrel.

The question here is whether the RFC performs a vital function in our economy or not.

Senator KEM. There are a lot of other questions besides that. One is whether it wouldn't be a wholesome example to every other agency in Washington to move in on this one that has proven itself to be unfaithful in its trust.

Mr. BERGE. No, Senator, there are a large number of employees in the RFC. They have a fine technical and competent staff. Only a relatively few people have been involved in these charges.

I want to point this out. At the hearing before the Expenditures Committee of the Senate, I believe it was, the Chairman of the Board, W. E. Harber, and Director Walter E. Cosgriff were complimented by Members of the Senate for the way they had administered their trust. As I recall it, when Mr. Cosgriff pointed out, that in the last 6 months they had instituted numerous reforms within the organization which saved the taxpayers money and which assured better administration in the future, Senator SCHOEPPEL, from your neighboring state in effect said, "I didn't know about that. Why haven't we learned about it?" Mr. Cosgriff stated, "We couldn't get it in the papers. They wouldn't print it."

Senator KEM. If you are calling Senator SCHOEPPEL as a witness for the continuation of the RFC, I think you have a very poor witness because just yesterday he voted for the resolution disapproving the reorganization plan of the President. The record I think shows that Senator SCHOEPPEL is against the continuation of this political grab bag for White House favoritism.

Mr. BERGE. I don't know whether voting against that particular resolution means he is against continuing the RFC or not. There are a number of legislators, I understand, who will disapprove the President's plan but don't want the RFC abolished.

Moderator GRANIK. Let us take some question from the audience to see how people feel about it.

Congressman BROWNSON. I have a question for Mr. Berge. I am CHARLES B. BROWNSON, a businessman and Representative from the State of Indiana.

In this time of inflation when there is too much money in circulation already, how do you justify the effects on our total economy of continuing this depression-born RFC which loans public funds and only adds to the inflationary spiral?

Mr. BERGE. Sir, since the middle of 1950 the offices of the RFC all over the country have been directed only to make loans that are connected with the defense effort, defense loans or defense related loans. Those are not inflationary. Moreover, loans to increase production, as I understand it, do not have an inflationary effect. Inflation comes from a shortage of goods. If the RFC hews to this line that has been laid down for this period, its effect is not going to be inflationary.

Moderator GRANIK. Senator KEM?

Senator KEM. I want to point out in connection with Congressman BROWNSON'S question, that we see the Government crying out and scolding the banks for making too many loans. The banks are told: "You are lending too freely." Yet we have 60 or 70 Government agencies opening the sluice gates of public money and distributing it around. By doing so they are adding fuel to the fires of inflation.

As Senator BYRD pointed out, by abolishing the RFC you can get rid from the payroll over 3,000 people, you can save $18,000,000 a year in administrative costs.

Now there are some useful functions of the RFC such as the rubber, tin, and abaca programs. They can go to the Commerce Department, of the Defense Department, or somewhere else. We don't have to carry on this huge agency distributing public money all over the United States, to snake farms in California, gambling casinos in Reno, Nev., and luxury hotels in Florida. I think the people are thoroughly convinced that they have no interest in financing enterprises like that.

Mr. BERGE. We are talking, Senator, anyhow about the present, and the loans that are authorized now are only defense loans and defense related loans.

Senator KEM. Defense production authorities are authorized to make loans for defense purposes directly and are set up to do that. There is no reason to have the RFC competing with defense production authorities in making loans. My position is that most defense loans can be made by commercial banks. Where they can't, they ought to be made by defense production authorities.

Mr. BERGE. Do you know, Senator, what the small manufacturers in Missouri think about this? There have been some 180 of them that have been beneficiaries in the last couple years when they couldn't get credit from the big banks.

Senator KEM. I wish time permitted us to discuss some of the loans made in Missouri.

Mr. BERGE. Our association of small manufacturers has some letters from your constituents who are very eager to have this organization continue.

Senator KEM. It is peculiar and an interesting thing that not one of them has contacted me.

Moderator GRANIK. Let us hear from another Member of the House.

Congressman LECOMPTE. My name is KARL M. LECOMPTE, Member of Congress from Ohio. I have a question for Senator KEM.

Senator, have you at any time asked the RFC to make a loan to small private business?

Senator KEM. I am glad you asked that, Congressman, because I am glad to be able to state my position on that. Since I have been in Washington, I have felt that loans of the public money when they are made should be made on a business basis and not a political basis. I have been importuned by many citizens in my State to assist them to get loans from the RFC. I have told them politely but firmly that I couldn't do it.

It is a source of satisfaction to me to know that Mr. Truman has in his files no letter from me urging loans from the RFC to private business concerns in my State or anywhere else.

Moderator GRANIK. Mr. Berge, do you want to comment on that?

Mr. BERGE. Well, I am willing to go along on any law which would forbid a Senator or Congressman from bringing pressure on the RFC to make loans. We are all for having this thing conducted on a clean basis. My organization of small manufacturers is not seeking, certainly, to condone any influence or favoritism, but just as we would want private business conducted on a high standard, we are eager that public business should, but people are essentially the same whether in Government or out, and the banking record of the RFC is a good one. It has made money.

The Senator talked a moment ago about economy. The RFC is one institution that has made money for the taxpayers. Its losses have been less than 1 percent over the years.

Senator KEM. Senator WILLIAMS, of Delaware, introduced in the RECORD last Thursday some figures that he has just secured after much insistence from the Bureau of the Budget. Those figures showed that RFC has operated at a loss of over $12,000,000,000.

Now this notion that the RFC has made a profit just cannot stand up. Theodore Hertz, the accountant for the Fulbright committee, who has been a professional accountant of high standing for 20 years, says that the figures that the RFC issued showing a profit for 1949 of some $5,000,000 are absolutely fallacious. As a matter of fact, the RFC that year operated at a loss of $6,500,000.

Now I would like to ask any businessman in the radio audience if he believes that a business that has been conducted as it has been shown the RFC has been conducted in the last few years can make money.

Moderator GRANIK. Mr. Berge.

Mr. BERGE. When you say they have lost money, Senator, you are taking into account the projects they have operated at the request of Congress under special legislation that required it. They operated the Defense Plants Corporation and during the last war the RFC had numerous war activities which certainly were expendable and not to be reckoned as showing a deficit. When I say they have made $500,000, I am talking about their banking operations where the RFC Board exercised the discretion that bankers exercised.

Senator KEM. I will tell you another reason, Mr. Berge, why I take with a grain of salt these figures that have come from the RFC showing a profit. The law requires the RFC, as every other Government corporation, to make to the Congress by January 15 of every year a written report of its operations during the preceding fiscal year ending June 30. The RFC has wholly failed to comply with that requirement of law. Now if we cannot get the figures from them, except after we have a Fulbright committee investigation, should we continue an organization like that, lending enormous sums of the peoples' money taken from the people in taxes?

Moderator GRANIK. May we take another question? Go ahead, sir.

FROM THE AUDIENCE. I have a question I would like to direct to Mr. Berge. Is not the handling of banking matters by the Government charged in some quarters with being socialistic, being competitive with private business?

Mr. BERGE. The RFC loans are not competitive with private business, because the RFC won't make loans unless they have a letter from the local bank that it will not handle the loan. In other words, the credit needs of the country as business is being conducted today need an RFC, and the RFC will not compete with private banks. The trouble is that private banks today don't want to risk capital any more. They sit around and clip coupons on Government bonds rather than make loans to small-business enterprises. So, except for the RFC, a lot of small manufacturers today would not be in business.

Senator KEM. I just want to say that I think there is no reason for the RFC to be kept alive any longer. I think its end is overdue. I believe that these men that Mr. Berge weeps about, these small-business men, can get money at the local banks. If they can't get it down there and they are engaged in defense activities, they can come up here and get it from defense production authorities. If they can't get it either place, there is considerable doubt in my mind whether in a period of inflation there is a public interest in having such a business expand.

Mr. BERGE. Our Small Manufacturers' Committee results from the fact that there are plenty of small-business men who are not able to get credit although the enterprises are sound.

Moderator GRANIK. Time for summary, Mr. Berge.

Mr. BERGE. My argument is that there are several reasons why the RFC should be kept. I won't undertake to cover them all in the summary.

First, small business finds it difficult, if not impossible, to get capital from local banks for long-term or intermediate capital investments and hence must turn to the RFC.

Second, new business finds it difficult, if not impossible, to get started without obtaining Government credit, because, being new businesses, it does not have a previous record of earnings which can be submitted as a basis for obtaining loans; hence they, too, must turn to the RFC.

Third, there is no doubt but that big investment houses have agreements with each other to restrict the entrance of new business in industries dominated by a few firms. Firms which are dominant in the capital goods industries are so interlaced with the investment houses and the banks that the investment banking facilities of the country do not look with approval in many cases on promoting competition for existing business.

Moderator GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. Berge. Your summary, Senator KEM.

Senator KEM. What Mr. Berge has been talking about is clearly a violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and I wonder why, when Mr. Berge was head of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, he did not prosecute people who were doing things like that.

The RFC's contribution toward a sound economy in my judgment has been on the negative side since the close of World War II. There is no public interest in prolonging the life of a business that can't exist without artificial oxygen from the Public Treasury. There is no public interest in financing a business where the people running it have no particular qualifications or have had no experience in business. There is no public interest in forcing competitors to the wall by artificially flooding the market with goods of a Government-financed enterprise.

All of these economic sins are being committed by the RFC.

Moderator GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. You have been listening to a discussion on "Should the RFC be abolished?" Our speakers have been Senator JAMES P. KEM, Republican, of Missouri; and Mr. Wendell Berge, former Assistant Attorney General of the United States and chairman of the Small Manufacturers' Emergency Committee.

Fair Representation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to note that H. R. 2648, introduced by the distinguished chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Mr. CELLER, has aroused Nation-wide interest and support. Typical of editorials appearing throughout the country is the following which appeared in the San Francisco News of April 2, 1951:

FAIR REPRESENTATION

Each Member of the United States House of Representatives ought to represent approximately the same number of people.

There are good reasons why each can't represent exactly the same number. But there's no good reason for, and no fairness in, the huge disparities that now exist.

One Ohio Representative, for example, has over 908,000 people in his district. Another from the same State has only 167,000. And one from South Dakota has only 148,000.

In six States there is a difference of more than 400,000 between the populations of the largest and smallest congressional districts.

In six other States, the gap is more than 300,000. In 12 others, it is more than 200,000.

That's not all. Some States, instead of forming new districts as their populations increase, elect Representatives at Large. And many States have districts "gerrymandered" into peculiar shapes to block in or block out groups of voters for political advantage.

Growth of the Nation's population, as shown by the 1950 census, means that some States are now entitled to more seats in the House, others to fewer, others to their present number.

So, before the 1952 elections, redistricting will be necessary in many States and desirable in almost all. This redistricting ought to correct the present inequities. Representative EMANUEL CELLER, Democrat of New York, has introduced an administration-sponsored bill intended to force their correction.

The bill proposes:

That each State entitled to more than one Representative shall establish a congressional district for each Representative. (To stop the practice of electing Congressmen at Large.)

That each district shall be composed of compact and contiguous territory. (To stop gerrymandering.)

That each district's population shall not be more than 15 percent larger or smaller than the average number obtained by dividing the State's total population by the number of districts in the State. (To insure that each Representative shall represent as nearly as possible the same number of people.)

Mr. CELLER's bill would enforce itself by denying a seat in the House to any Representative elected from a district not conforming to the bill's requirements. He says the Supreme Court has held that Congress has power to set up standards which the States must follow.

Many politicians, in and out of Congress, may not like this bill because it would deprive them of unfair political advantages now enjoyed.

But citizens who believe that each American has a right to an equal and effective voice in the conduct of his Government should favor and work for adoption of such reform as Mr. CELLER proposes.

A Turkish View on Friendship With Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, Turkey and Israel are sometimes referred to as the only two great military powers of the Near East and the only two countries in that area of the world that are truly democratic. Both are great friends of the United States.

In this connection, I believe the Members of this House will find it extremely interesting to read the views of a Turkish official on the friendly and peaceful relations of his country and Israel. Turkey, a Moslem country, was one of the first in the Near East to grant recognition and establish friendly relations with Israel.

Mr. Altemur Kilic, the author of the article The Friendship of Turkey and Israel, is an information officer in the press bureau of the Department of Public Information at the United Nations. He is scheduled to return to Turkey soon to assume the editorship of a new afternoon newspaper in that country. His article appeared in the March-April 1951 issue of the magazine Land Reborn, published by the American Christian Palestine Committee, and is as follows:

THE FRIENDSHIP OF TURKEY AND ISRAEL

(By Altemur Kilic)

I feel safe in asserting that Israel has no better friend in the Middle East than the Turkish Republic. This friendship is not merely a government-to-government relationship. Nor is it only the Realpolitik of both nation's statesmen. On the contrary, the friendship goes deeper; for Israelis and Turks have, I believe, much in common.

Foremost among the factors which encourage Turkish-Israel friendship is the youthfulness of minds and ideas in both peoples. Although Turks and Israelis are proud of their respective pasts, they have their eyes firmly fixed on the future.

Secondly, both Israel and Turkey are European in outlook. They may be situated on the western fringe of Asia, but neither the customs nor the culture of the Orient have as much influence as do the mores and morals of the West.

Thirdly, both Turks and Israelis are activistic in their approach to social and political problems. Both nations are not retarded by a yearning for the splendors and glories of their historic pasts. They are rather impelled by a modern desire to rid their lands of the disease, poverty, ignorance, and feudal structures which have far too long been the curse of the Middle East. Here both Israel and Turkey join in a modern crusade.

Fourthly, Turkey and Israel are the only two genuinely democratic states in the entire Middle East. Turkey granted full diplomatic recognition to the new State of Israel, not only because the Turkish people admired the courage and steadfastness of the Jews in their recent struggle for a home of their own, and their zeal in creating their new, modern state, but also because Turkey anticipated a healthy flow of Israel-Turkish trade and thus an ever closer bond between the two lands. (It is true that our economic relations with Israel mean, at present, many more exports from Turkey to Israel than exports from Israel to Turkey; but this imbalance is in process of being righted.)

In these four respects, we Turks directly parallel the Israelis. On several other scores we have somewhat divergent characteristics:

1. Turkey must transform its masses into an industrial population while Israel must reverse the industrial-rural process for many tens of thousands of its people.

2. We still have a considerable amount of illiteracy to alter; Israel has an unusually high rate of literacy, not alone for the Middle East where illiteracy abounds, but even in comparison with the highly literate nations of the European land mass.

3. Turkey has moved swiftly in this past generation since the days of the great Kemal Ataturk, but still has a long road to travel in search of its ultimate goal of urbanization, industrialization, modernization, and western education; Israels' particular problems are, in contrast, those of deurbanization and the training for productivity and integration of its industry and agriculture.

4. Turkey belongs to the West, not only because the Soviet Union demands our vital Straits and two of our eastern provinces, but also because of our concept of democracy. Israel, doubtless mindful of the problematic fate of several million Jews still behind the iron curtain in Russia and Soviet-oriented lands, prefers a policy of "nonidentification" with either East or West; but Turkey believes Israel's preoccupation with her own particular problems will, in time, give way to the necessity of taking sides in the East-West struggle and joining a collective security arrangement against the Soviet bloc.

I believe that Turkish-Israel friendship promises many fruits for the future, within both the framework of Middle Eastern politics, in particular, and the framework of our common quest for world peace, in general.

Two-Ocean Issues Unchanged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

TWO-OCEAN ISSUES UNCHANGED—MACARTHUR WAS RIGHT IN 1942 AS HE IS NOW IN PLEAS FOR DUE ATTENTION TO PACIFIC

(By David Lawrence)

Starting just 9 years ago, in the spring of 1942, and continuing from then on throughout most of World War II, the same controversy was going on as is emerging today—how much force to allocate to Asia and the Pacific and how much to Europe.

But the public didn't know much about it at the time, nor did it know how earnestly General MacArthur, backed up by Fleet Admiral King, pleaded for enough strength to win the war in the Pacific.

The fundamental issues haven't changed. When all the emotion has been removed from the present atmosphere of politics in Washington and London, and the European leaders face realistically the fact that from the Pacific Ocean can come a direct threat to United States territory in Alaska and to our vital bases on Okinawa, the Philippines, and Japan, a global strategy and viewpoint will come into its own once more.

It was because the American people for the most part had their eyes fastened on the spectacular battles in Europe that they did not appraise the remarkable struggle under heavy odds that our Army under MacArthur and our Air Force and Navy put up in the Pacific against a major power which had the naval strength and the air power to sweep to the tip of southeast Asia even while fighting a major war on the mainland of China. All this happened in the three long years before VE-day, while the American public looked on it as a secondary, if not unimportant, adventure in what was sometimes referred to in a somewhat derogatory fashion as "island hopping."

Few people today realize that, apart from heavy casualties of ground troops, 10,000 American boys were killed or wounded on the decks of American naval vessels in the immediate vicinity of Okinawa—the largest casualty list for a single battle in the history of any navy—as the ships stood guard there like sitting ducks for 83 days. They couldn't move away because the Navy's own air power was busily engaged in protecting ground operations and no other air power was available in the western Pacific to destroy the bases on Formosa, on the mainland of China and in south Japan from which the suicide planes were coming day after day. It did not hearten the American boys on the ships or in our Army and Marine Corps fighting on Okinawa—we had more than 275,000 men committed to the action there—to be told that our big B–29's were doing strategic bombing and were destroying vital factories in Japan. What the troops and sailors wanted and begged for was the destruction of the land bases just a few hundred miles away from which those enemy bombers were coming to Okinawa. It was the same old story of inadequate strength.

General MacArthur begged his countrymen not to forsake those vital air and submarine bases, but to do everything in our power to help Chiang Kai-shek or any other friendly influence inside China so as to keep the Communists from dominating the Far East. It goes without saying that the next time all of China and Korea and important bases in Japan will be in the hands of a hostile power unless the Communists are licked—and licked now.

It is therefore, a basic concept of global strategy which was ignored by the European press and to no small extent by those American observers who regarded the present flare-up as just a little matter of personalities or of excessive zeal by a prominent general. What seems to be overlooked is that, if world war III breaks out, the Pacific Ocean will not be a quiet lake. There are big factories on our Pacific coast which will hardly be immune from attack if the defenses of the Pacific are neglected—if America does not plan its strategy so as to reach out as effectively to destroy submarine bases in Asia as we appear to be doing with respect to those hostile bases in Europe from which submarine threats can come to menace shipping and the transportation of troops in the Atlantic.

Europeans who are not bounded on any coast by the waters of the Pacific do not seem to realize that the United States is a two-ocean country. Even today the European press is talking about American military strength getting bogged down in Asia as if there were some magic way of erasing the Pacific and the Asiatic strongholds from the map and persuading the military chiefs of the Communist regime politely to give up any idea of attacking us from that quarter of the globe when war comes.

High officers of our Navy, it can be stated positively, say that, while General MacArthur has not always selected the most tactful way to express himself, fundamentally he was 100 percent right when he declared America must be sure of winning the war now in Asia or else Europe will be lost too.

General MacArthur was right in 1942, and he was right again in arguing for due attention to the Pacific and most of all against any abject surrender or compromise in Asia that means the same thing militarily. He was arguing for the mothers and fathers of the boys enlisted today in the United States Navy who again will bear the brunt of any such attacks. He was arguing for the 250,000 men of our Army and Air Force now in the Pacific. He was making a sensational plea against misunderstanding of the fundamentals of global strategy.

MacArthur Has Outlived His Usefulness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not practice the profession of "arm-chair general." I do know enough about military affairs and Government, however, to appreciate that a man in public office who desires to direct a military campaign should become a member of the armed services, and that a general who attempts to direct the affairs of state should retire from the armed services and run for elective office. No matter how much praise may be due to General MacArthur as a soldier all must agree that he has outlived his usefulness as a general because of his insistence upon entering into the field of civil affairs.

Whether you agree or disagree with MacArthur's foreign policy no one can deny that as one in charge of military campaigns he has no right to make foreign policy.

I am happy to direct your attention to the fact that I am not alone in this conclusion. The syndicated columns of Drew Pearson and Stewart Alsop, and an editorial in this morning's Washington Post, are in agreement with my thoughts on the subject. Those articles are as follows:

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson)

MAC ARTHUR FRICTION RECOUNTED

At two Cabinet meetings in the past 3 weeks, General MacArthur's unauthorized policy statements have come in for important, even heated, discussion.

Most heated debate was not last week but immediately after MacArthur's pre-Easter statement of March 24, in which he proposed a peace meeting with Chinese military commanders.

At this Cabinet meeting the President remarked that he was sorry he hadn't fired MacArthur last summer—following his out-of-line statement to the Veterans of Foreign Wars. What aroused the President's heat just before Easter was that MacArthur's peace statement was one which Truman himself was planning to make.

What happened was that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had cabled MacArthur, for his perusal and personal reaction, a copy of an Easter appeal for peace which the State Department had already discussed with the British and French and which Truman planned to issue publicly.

But, without a word to Washington, MacArthur made the statement himself. Part of his text was almost verbatim with that sent him by the Joint Chiefs, though his threat to bomb Chinese bases was entirely his own.

MAC ARTHUR'S RECORD

Naturally Washington boiled.

Next day, Secretary of Defense Marshall sent MacArthur a personal cable ordering him to clear all future policy statements with him. That cable was dated March 25, and MacArthur's letter to former Speaker JOE MARTIN was dated March 20, so technically, at least, MacArthur is in the clear.

In the eyes of the Defense Department, however, he is not. For on December 5, 1950, confidential orders were sent to all military commanders to clear all policy statements with the Defense Department in Washington. Furthermore, MacArthur has had a history of jumping the traces, some of which is well known, some not, but all of which has made relations between him and his Commander in Chief more strained than at any time in recent American history. Here is the record:

Jump No. 1: In December 1949 MacArthur let off steam to a group of Republican Senators visiting him in Tokyo about sending United States arms and troops to Formosa. This teed off the running debate between the administration and the China bloc in Congress over Chinese intervention which continued for months.

Jump No. 2: In the spring of 1950, MacArthur took an unauthorized trip to Formosa, got a lot of publicity kissing Madame Chiang Kai-shek's hand, and openly discussed the idea of building up Formosa as a base. This was in complete contradiction of the Government's policy, and he obviously knew it.

Jump No. 3: After we got into the Korean War, MacArthur sent his famous letter to the Veterans of Foreign Wars regarding the use of Formosa as a base. He was reprimanded by Truman.

Wake Island: It was around this time that Averell Harriman, special representative of the President, went to Tokyo to soothe the general's fur. At this time Harriman got MacArthur's solemn promise to make no more policy statement without clearing them with Washington.

TRUMAN IS CHARMED

Following this, Truman made his special pilgrimage to confer with MacArthur on Wake Island. When he first arrived, he was a little nonplussed by the way the general strolled nonchalantly down to the runway—a little late—to meet him; and by the fact that MacArthur failed to salute his Commander in Chief. He was also disappointed that MacArthur's accompanying party consisted chiefly of his personal doctor, his valet, and Ambassador Muccio, whereas Truman had brought the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and a group of experts prepared to discuss important Far Eastern problems.

It was because MacArthur brought no experts to discuss anything that the conference was so abbreviated.

However, during their brief time together, MacArthur charmed Truman completely and the President came away singing his praises.

Jump No. 4: Came during MacArthur's November drive into North Korea. This was only a partial jump-over-the-traces, because Truman had given him the green light to dash up to the Manchurian border. However, on more than three occasions the State Department relayed warnings that the Chinese were about to attack—one from the French, one from India, and several from the British.

On another occasion, when the State Department urgently proposed a public statement assuring the Chinese that the big dams supplying water power to all Manchuria would not be bombed, MacArthur sent back a curt three-word telegram: "Do not concur."

MATTER OF FACT

(By Stewart Alsop)

MAC ARTHUR

It is at least conceivable that General of the Army Douglas MacArthur will be recalled by President Truman, perhaps even before this report is published. Truman is furious at what he considers MacArthur's insubordination. Those around Truman are convinced that the recent spate of pronouncements from MacArthur have been consciously designed to forestall Truman, who had planned to issue a statement of his own on Korean War aims. Finally, the pressure is heavy on Truman to demonstrate once and for all that he is master in his own house.

Yet on balance it is much more likely that cautious counsels will prevail, and that the administration will try to deal with "the MacArthur problem" by pressing ahead with a Japanese peace treaty with all possible speed. MacArthur himself has often intimated that he will lay down his proconsular duties once a Japanese peace treaty is signed.

It is therefore fervently hoped in administration circles that final arrangements for signing a treaty can be reached by early midsummer, that MacArthur will sign in the name of the American Government; and that he will then retire in a final blaze of glory, to a chorus of sighs of relief in Washington and the European capitals. This spectacle, of the American Government pressing feverishly for a peace treaty with a former enemy nation in order to dispose of a supposedly subordinate American official would be laughable if the issue raised were not so serious.

For there is nothing at all laughable in the issue which has caused a bitter public dispute between the American Government and its field commander at a time when a new Chinese offensive is certain, and Soviet intervention in Korea at least possible. The issue is this: Should the United States engage in a major war with China, in alliance with Chiang Kai-shek?

Surely if MacArthur's statements mean anything, they mean that this is what MacArthur wants to do. And the great majority of the policy-making officials of the Government are convinced that such a course would lead straight to disaster.

In the first place, they argue, such a war would be "a war between the shark and the tiger," an impossible war which could never be won. In the second place, the course MacArthur proposes would destroy the whole painfully built structure of American alliances. Finally, this country's European allies, and especially the British, are convinced that such a course would make inevitable a third world war for which our European allies are nakedly unprepared.

British intelligence has warned repeatedly that the Soviets are committed to intervene openly in case of an American attack on the Chinese mainland. Such intervention, which would presumably include bombing MacArthur's own "privileged sanctuary" in Japan, could hardly fail to lead to a third world war. MacArthur is reported to dissent strongly from this view, but it is worth recalling that the British also warned of the Chinese intervention, which MacArthur assured Truman on Wake Island would not occur.

Yet MacArthur's position has one great strength. It is simple, positive, and understandable—the way to fight a war is to try to win it, by using all available means to defeat your enemy. The official administration thesis sounds, by contrast, fuzzy and Micawberish. If the forthcoming offensive is smashing, according to this thesis, the Chinese and their Soviet masters may be willing sooner or later to come to terms.

This may not be quite as Micawberish as it sounds. For it is certainly true that both the Chinese and Russians have paid heavily for their Korean adventure. The Chinese have lost the flower of their best army, while their plans for expansion in southeast Asia have had to be at least postponed. As for the Russians, they have seen the western allies awakened from their lethargy by Korea, and beginning to organize their defenses in earnest.

Thus what seems to be in prospect is a long test of staying power, in which all the advantages are by no means on the side of the Communists. The trouble is that MacArthur is unfitted by temperament to command a local war of limited objectives and indefinite duration.

Yet MacArthur is right when he implies that this country cannot accept a bloody stalemate in Korea forever. Perhaps, as the administration hopes, the Chinese and the Russians will decide to cut their losses if the prospective offensive fails, and will then agree to an acceptable settlement. Perhaps the Russians will force the issue by intervening openly. If neither happens, there must be some sort of show-down eventually. When that time comes, however, it will be well to remember what MacArthur and his admirers forget—that the Ruhr Valley is a far more important stake in the world struggle than the Yangtse Valley, and that the real source of Communist power is in Moscow, not Peiping.

[From the Washington Post]

BRING MACARTHUR HOME

The issue that General MacArthur has catapulted into the camp of the free world is not Asia or Europe, Korea, or China, or a local or a continental war. It is General MacArthur versus Authority, and Authority can no longer duck it. In the circumstances the resolution that Senator FERGUSON has proposed for the visit of a committee of Congress to General MacArthur has become ridiculous. General MacArthur should do the traveling—and with Washington as his destination.

Why another congressional mission to Tokyo, anyway? Scarcely a month passes without one or other legislators traipsing across the Pacific to listen to the authoritative words of the Supreme Commander. After 15 years, when General MacArthur was last in America, the trips are beginning to look like pilgrimages. It is hardly dignified that our representatives should have to go all the way to Japan to check what General MacArthur is expressing so freely in public and private. The time has come for General MacArthur to be recalled for report. He has now launched a campaign upon the free world for the extension of the military campaign against communism throughout Asia—to free Asia, as he put it awhile ago. For this all-encompassing crusade he is reported to be demanding a free hand, something unheard of in history and something in the present circumstances of the United Nations war that the United States itself hasn't got. It is clearly impossible to keep General MacArthur in the command so long as this major conflict between subagent and agent and between both he and the principal remains.

The time, aside from the new urgency, is long overdue for General MacArthur to return. Government and people before this needed a chance to become acquainted with a man who by his long absence was becoming a myth and yet who was carrying a great responsibility to the United States on his shoulders. General MacArthur would have himself benefited from it. Even Anteaos had to renew his strength and refresh his outlook by occasional contact with the earth, and the same prescription would have profited General MacArthur. He would at least have been able himself to check at first hand with his somewhat intimidated and silent superiors.

In default of President Truman grasping the nettle in the manner of Lincoln and Polk, the way to get General MacArthur here is through the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Recall for report is the general practice with the diplomats and military chieftains of all countries, and General MacArthur has been left too long in Napoleonic aloofness. It may be argued that for military reasons MacArthur cannot leave his post. But MacArthur's headquarters are in Japan, not in Korea, and Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway is in operational or tactical charge in Korea, with a virtually autonomous command. General Ridgway has done so well there that there can be no doubt of his competence to be left alone for a spell.

Senator FERGUSON excuses the waiting upon General MacArthur because the President himself journeyed over the Pacific to meet General MacArthur. However, the President did not go to Tokyo. Nor did he establish any precedent. He had in mind the convenience of both himself as Commander in Chief and General MacArthur in holding the rendezvous at Wake Island. At that time the Supreme Commander, in spite of his situation at the Japanese base, was handling operations more intimately than he is now. So far as is known, the President chose the site, and his purpose, it is said, was to hear from General MacArthur's own lips the data about Chinese dispositions in North Korea and an estimate of the situation created by them. The general was put on the beam on policy, and the President in turn got an assurance that the Chinese would not intervene, though this is what they did almost before MacArthur got back.

All this, of course, is supposition but a reason for any hearing that Congress might call in case General MacArthur comes to town, presumably, would be to clear up the fog over this Wake Island meeting. Congress is likewise entitled to some comprehension of the help (or lack of it) that in the light of changing requirements MacArthur has been afforded to execute the command he was given. But the Executive must take action beforehand in laying down policy anew and restoring authority. If, after report and consultation, this means the supercession of General MacArthur, that must be faced, for if the conflict continues, our feeble Government will be left without any standing at home, and abroad we might as well prepare to see our allies in NATO, RIO, and the United Nations fade away.

Divine Discontent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to include the following sermon preached in St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Akron, Ohio, by the rector, the Reverend Walter F. Tunks, D. D., on Palm Sunday morning, March 18, 1951, and broadcast over Station WADC:

In recent years have appeared many books designed to tell us how to achieve inner calm and serenity. The eagerness with which they have been bought and read would indicate that they have answered a real need. They reflect the pressure and tension of our day—the demons that, in some form, all of us must fight—fear, worry, frustration, personal inadequacy, and that tired feeling of being pushed beyond endurance. The story may be apocryphal, but is typical of our overwrought nerves, that a tired businessman sank into a dentist's chair with a sigh of deep satisfaction and said, "Thank God for the opportunity to come here once in awhile and relax."

Long on the list of best sellers was a helpful book called Peace of Mind, by Rabbi Joshua Liebman, whose untimely death removed a distinguished scholar and teacher. Then came a book which had wide circulation called Peace of Soul, by Msgr. Fulton J. Sheen, known to many Americans through his preaching on the radio Catholic hour. Many people have been helped by the preaching and writing of Dr. Norman Vincent Peale. He has shown them how to relax their bodies, release mental tension, by opening hidden reservoirs of spiritual power. All these books answer a need that was voiced by Whittier so beautifully in his well-loved hymn:

"Drop Thy still dews of quietness
Till all our strivings cease,
Take from our souls the strain and stress
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace."

Peace of mind and peace of soul are great possessions. Together, they form one of life's greatest blessings—contentment. Through the ages poets and philosophers have sung the praises of contentment. Confucius wrote of himself, "With only plain rice to eat, with only water to drink, and with only an arm for a pillow, I am still content." In a world where material things are so fragile, he had discovered that the only durable wealth is the inner riches of heart and mind and soul. "Contentment is natural wealth," said Socrates, "luxury is artificial poverty." That is the essence of Thoreau's teaching about his simple life at Walden Pond. A man can live happily and well in a cabin in the woods with the brooks and birds as his companions, if he has a good conscience and a sensitive mind, plus an appreciation of nature. I like to think that it was the King himself who wrote in the Book of Proverbs: "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox with hatred." Perhaps he had stopped one day at a peasant's abode and discovered how good food can taste in a simple home where there is love and understanding and comradeship, and he recalled how tedious were court banquets with hatred, envy, and intrigue lurking in the background. Shakespeare knew what a great blessing is contentment and how rarely those in high office possess it. In Henry the Sixth he makes the King say:

"My crown is in my heart, not on my head;
Not decked with diamonds, and Indian stones,
Not to be seen; my crown is called Content
A crown it is that seldom kings enjoy."

Contentment seems all the more praiseworthy when we encounter those who never seem to possess it. Restless and dissatisfied, they are unhappy wherever you find them. Put them down anywhere and they will find something to complain about. You never ask them how they are. You know in advance. They are not well. They grumble about the weather, about their food, about their church, and they can tell you all that is wrong in our country. Their conversation is a monologue of discontents. The world was not made to their liking.

Their unhappiness is, of course, only the toxic poisoning of their self-centeredness. They never get themselves off their hands. On the other hand, you think of a great soul like Paul, chained in a prison cell, writing confidently to his friends, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am to be content." Anyone who can say that has mastered one of life's hardest lessons. What happens to us is not the decisive factor. It is our inner response that tells the story. Happiness is mental rather than environmental. In his deep concern for others, Paul had learned to think less and less about himself. There is no inner peace without that. Dr. McCracken writes of a woman who had lost her son and had become bitter, hard, and inconsolable until her health failed and her mind weakened. Her husband took her to a famous French neurologist who undertook an unusual method to effect her cure. He took her for a long drive through villages that had borne the fear and fire and devastation of war. "Madam," he said, "in nearly all these humble little homes there is a poor woman who has lost a son. In some there are mothers who have lost two or three sons. Is your grief greater than theirs? Go home and bear your sorrow with courage and patience." Some of us, I feel sure, would be ashamed of our petty complaints if we had imagination enough to understand the far heavier loads some people are carrying with cheerfulness and fortitude.

Probably there would be no disagreement among us this morning as to the value of contentment. Yet, I venture to say, that it is not the supreme goal of life. A popular radio program advertises the fact that its product comes from contented cows. That brings to your mind a lovely pastoral scene—a herd of cattle grazing peacefully in lush meadows under a bright summer sky—amid all the beauty of the countryside. But we humans are different from cows. We have moral consciousness. We have ambitions. We have ideals for ourselves and for our world. We dare not live in lazy indifference to what goes on around us. There are times and places and situations in which we have no right to be contented. We have no right to live in peace with racial discrimination and social injustice. We have no right to close our eyes to slums and poverty and crime. Who wants to live with inner peace that can be had only by closing one's ears to the still, sad voice of humanity?

When Catherine the Great made a tour of her country, her ministers went ahead of her, carefully arranging her schedule. Nice little homes were built along the route the Empress was to travel—like the fake houses that are a part of Hollywood technique—made for the cameras, not to live in. Peasants were instructed to appear along the roadway wearing their Sunday best, with happy smiling faces. The lame, the blind, and the deformed were hustled off the streets. The Empress must see no misery and want. She must not know the desperate condition of her people.

What decent person wants contentment at such a price? I think Fulton Oursler is right in something he wrote recently: "Our greatest danger is not from Russia, but from ourselves, from our growing disregard of principles, and our reliance upon expediency. Along this immoral road, we have already gone too far, feeling meanwhile more discontent than ever before. In book shops and drug stores, in correspondence courses and lectures, we seek peace of mind, peace of soul. Our private lives reflect the public evidence of decay and we are not happy about it. The renewal of conscience in modern society is its only hope."

We Americans may well take that rebuke to ourselves. We are an easy-going, complacent people, too ready to compromise with evil because it takes too much trouble to correct it. Perhaps the greatest weakness in our country today is our lack of moral indignation. We have no right to be satisfied with the low moral standards that prevail in high places today. We have no right to make peace with crooks and gamblers and racketeers and to accept the criminal alliance between the underworld and politics. The scandals that have come out of the mismanagement of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the brazen peddling of influence in high government circles, the old Pendergast morals that are so generally accepted in Washington today, the betrayal of trust by officials in our State Department, and the nonchalance of those who call treason only a "red herring" ought to stir us with righteous wrath. At any social gathering you can hear plently of grumbling about the corruption in Washington, but how easily we charge it off as the inevitable spawn of politics. "To the victor belongs the spoils" we say, and with a synical shrug of the shoulders, we seem to imply there isn't anything we can do about it.

But there is something we can do about it. We can examine our own individual lives and strive to correct what is wrong with them. Bad government always leads to our own doorsills—our willingness to live with low and easy moral standards. We are like the farmer who said "Don't tell me how to farm any better. I don't farm as good now as I know how." Most of us make the same confession. We don't live nearly as well as we know how. We know better, but it is too much effort to do better. We permit our children to do questionable things, not because we approve of them, but because we don't want them to be thought queer or different from our neighbor's children. With most of us selfishness is still the major sin. Expounding his philosophy of life, George Jean Nathan, the drama critic, said, "To me pleasure and my own personal happiness are all I deem worth a hoot." There is pure, unadulterated selfishness for you. Where would our city and our country be if all of us decided that the only thing worth a hoot is our own personal happiness? What decent person wants contentment if it means only the ability of the biggest hog to get to the feeding trough first?

Religion can bring us inner peace. But it ought also to fill us with divine discontent. Religion was never meant to be an anesthetic. Paul spoke of it as power. The word that he used was "dunamos." Dynamite, if you please. Every moral gain that has ever been made in this world was the result of someone's revolt against the status quo.

Again and again in the Gospels we hear Jesus saying, "Ye have heard it said of old time * * * but I say unto you." He walked straight across those old traditions and they snapped like cobwebs. It is pleasant to think of the Master healing the sick, forgiving the sinful, and taking little children into His arms to bless them. But there is no mistaking the moral indignation that flamed in His words and looks as he lashed out against the moral complacency of his times.

On this Palm Sunday we think of that strange procession that paused for a moment on the brow of Mount Olivet before entering the Holy City. There were tears in the Master's eyes. He was not thinking of himself and the suffering that lay ahead for him. He was thinking of the city and the people He loved, so blind to their impending fate. How contented the city was as it lay there bathed in the morning sunlight—how proud of its past history, how indifferent to its spiritual need. There was Pilate, the Roman Governor, the very embodiment of human pride—more concerned about holding his office than administering justice, and ready to turn an innocent man over to be crucified rather than take any chance of stirring up trouble for himself. Jesus must still weep when He sees how much irresponsibility still remains in high places.

There were the money changers in the temple, making fat profits out of their unholy traffic in the sanctuary of God. They had turtledoves for sale. Who raised them? They came from the pigeon farms of Annas, the ex-high priest and father-in-law of Caiaphas, the reigning high priest, and they sold, of course, for a nice profit. If you wanted to buy them you had to exchange Roman coins for temple currency, for the Roman coins bore the image of the hated Emperor—and the exchange, of course, brought further revenue for the high priest. Is it any wonder that Jesus strode into the temple a few days later and drove the grafters out. It wasn't the small whip of cords that frightened them. It was the high and holy indignation they saw in those eyes that looked straight through them. And He said unto them: "It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves." Graft is still graft, whether it be in turtle doves or deep freeze deals or mink coats or bribes paid by the underworld for police protection or the public money siphoned off to individuals by influential politicians.

Jerusalem was quite content that spring morning when Jesus looked out over the city with tears in His eyes. How perilous complacency can be. Little did the people understand or care about the destruction that was impending.

What of America? I pray that the spirit of Jesus may fill us with divine discontent with all that is wrong in our national life. Wherever there is injustice, wherever there is racial hatred and discrimination, wherever there is graft, corruption, and crime, wherever low moral standards prevail, we have no right to be contented. Are we for Jesus or against Him? Each gives his answer by the quality of his own life.

VA Sees Doctor, Nurse Loss to Armed Services

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, as further proof of the desperate situation that has developed in our veterans' hospitals, due to inadequate medical, dental, and nursing staffs, I wish to include in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Maj. Gen. Carl Gray, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, dealing with the problem that now exists and with the acute situation brought about by the arbitrary action of the armed service in raiding these staffs by calling up for active duty medical reservists and other medical men now in the service of the Veterans' Administration.

General Gray's letter, which follows, is self-explanatory:

VA SEES DOCTOR, NURSE LOSS TO ARMED SERVICES' NEEDS

(By Maj. Gen. Carl R. Gray, Jr., Administrator, Veterans' Affairs)

WASHINGTON.—An 8-year-old specter has returned to haunt Veterans' Administration officials—the serious depletion of professional medical personnel by the present military situation. The situation isn't as desperate as it was in early 1943 when the loss of doctors threatened to wreck the entire VA medical set-up, but is gradually moving in that direction despite law and and increasing work load.

VA has lost approximately 400 physicians to the Armed Forces since the start of the Korean hostilities. Nearly that many nurses have been called to active duty, and the dental service losses have been in about the same proportion.

The growing shortage of physicians is the gravest of VA's medical manpower problems. Approximately half of VA's 4,000 full-time doctors are Reserve officers. Many of these are senior Reserve officers in organized units. Others are senior Reserves not in organized units but in categories badly needed by the Armed Forces. Add to these the residents in the Reserves and those vulnerable to the draft, many of whom were trained as Navy V-12s or under the Army specialized training program, and the picture becomes even darker.

WHAT VA IS DOING

First, VA is attempting to call to attention the fact that under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, as amended, it has priority equal to that of any other agency in the manpower pool and the problems of supply. This VA did not have in 1943.

Second, VA has established a manpower board that makes representations to the Armed Forces for delays in calls to active duty of all physicians, dentists and nurses and for many other essential medical personnel who are members of the Reserves. To date, the board has been only moderately successful, and the best it can obtain for those ordered into uniform is a 6 months delay. Full-time physcians subject to the draft must take their chances with their local selective service boards, but hospital managers have been instructed to go to bat for them wherever possible.

Third, Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS has introduced H. R. 2996 in the House of Representatives, a bill that would have the effect of freezing all VA Department Medicine and Surgery employees in their positions. This measure, which has been referred to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, should have the immediate effect of emphasizing the seriousness of the situation and may result at the hearing in calling attention to the little-noticed fact that VA does have equal priority under the law and that it was the intent of the Congress to confer such a priority on VA to prevent the very thing that is now happening.

LOAD IS INCREASING

Fourth, representatives of VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery have appeared before the Health Resources Advisory (Rusk) Committee of the National Security Resources Board and, together with the Deputy Administrator, have conferred with the NSRB chairman to present VA's problem. They have also appeared with the Deputy Administrator before the Armed Forces Personel Policy Board to point out that we have a current and increasing load, a part of which can be attributed to the agreement by VA to accept as patients service personnel with certain types of chronic illnesses and disabilities. They have further pointed out that the existing procedures for calling Reserve officers have resulted in serious losses in certain categories of medical specialties.

Deferments and delays in calls to active duty provide little help since they are but temporary in nature and there is no source of medical manpower from which replacements can be recruited.

VA officials hope that one or all of the four courses of action will stem or help to stem the tide. Otherwise VA will be placed in the same disastrous position as it was in 1942 when no positive protective action was taken until too many of its physicians and dentists had entered the military service. Finally, the only effective procedure was the commissioning of VA physicians and dentists generally, and eventually it was even necessary for the Armed Forces to supplement VA staffs with military personnel.

Price Control on Copper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following letter received by me from Mr. R. M. Eaton, resident manager of the Hazard Insulated Wire Works, division of the Okonite Co., Wilkes-Barre, Pa.:

HAZARD INSULATED WIRE WORKS,
Wilkes-Barre, Pa., March 28, 1951.

Hon. DANIEL J. FLOOD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DAN: In letter of the 15th (acknowledging receipt of Bache & Co.'s release entitled "Bucking the Law of Supply and Demand," you asked me to prepare a statement, which I have been trying to do ever since.

It has taken so long because I feel that handling of the copper situation by present governmental controls is not entirely in accord with basic economy, as I understand it. I do not pretend to be an economist, but in nearly 50 years of active business life have always found supply and demand to be the factor regulating price, and it would seem to me the metal markets are simply acting in accordance with the law. In this respect let me quote from the above-mentioned release:

"When that law (supply and demand) is interfered with, then supply and demand get out of balance. Representatives of the domestic copper-producing industry who met recently in Washington with officials of the Defense Minerals Administration, told these officials, according to the trade press, that current ceiling prices on copper are diverting some foreign supplies from the domestic market. We anticipated that that would happen, and in our market letter dated February 13, 1951, we said:

"'If the Government should impose a ceiling on the domestic price of copper and if this ceiling should be lower than the world price, the domestic supply position may be placed in double jeopardy, through a drop in domestic output and the loss of foreign copper. Producers in other parts of the world will seek an outlet for their copper where the highest prices are being paid and many European consumers are already paying more than 24½ cents for copper and are anxious to buy large quantities at higher prices.'

"It should be obvious that if this situation is allowed to continue unchecked, the domestic shortage of copper is likely to become much more serious than it is already."

The above being so, it would seem to me that the 2-cent-per-pound import on copper should be suspended, and it should have been done long ago for the benefit of everyone and not retained for the benefit of a small minority group. The market should be allowed to find its own level so that consumers permitted to use the metal for making civilian articles (who are unable to get all they need at the market price of 24½ cents per pound) can buy additional amounts at whatever price necessary and pass this increased cost on to customers who want to buy their products—no matter what the price is.

While certain producers may accumulate enormous profits by this process, they could be siphoned off to the Government by excess-profits taxes, so that in the long run the Government would benefit.

It is my contention, therefore, that all producers of virgin materials should be encouraged to produce, since everything is in short supply. It is also my contention—as stated above—that there is no greater incentive to production than the natural law of supply and demand. If that law is allowed to function freely, all domestic and foreign producers will be attracted to the best market—which should be in this country since the potential consumption is far greater here than anywhere else in the world.

The present price controls and tariffs on virgin materials are preventing necessary supplies of these materials, and Congress can profitably weigh the advantages of free markets for these raw materials versus the hamstringing caused by controls.

Very truly yours,

Graft Endangers Federal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in the March 22 issue of the Verndale Sun, published in Verndale, Minn., appears the Weekly Newsletter of Representative FRED MARSHALL, Sixth District, Minnesota. Representative MARSHALL is known throughout the State of Minnesota as a man of great integrity, sincerity, and courage. His comments regarding moral and ethical standards of conduct in the Federal service are worthy of the study and attention of every citizen. I ask unanimous consent that Representative MARSHALL's newsletter be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAFT ENDANGERS FEDERAL SERVICE

Everyone interested in honest government must be bewildered and shocked by the almost daily reports of corruption and scandal being disclosed in Government operations. The very fact that this is headline news indicates that it is the unusual and not the usual.

I have no patience with those who betray their fellow workers and their Government by dishonesty. They are parasites and we must work to rid our Government of them and their practices. Their effect is even more far reaching than their immediate evil.

It is difficult to know just how much our Government has been weakened by reluctance of good men and women to accept positions because of these episodes.

In hearings last week on the Voice of America program it was revealed that Edward Barrett left Newsweek magazine at a considerable financial sacrifice to take charge of this important work. He then discovered that topflight personnel he needed refused to accept positions for fear of character assassination and the stigma of bureaucracy.

This situation makes it imperative that the present disclosures be pursued and that action be taken to encourage the loyal officials and employees who are quietly and efficiently serving the taxpayer. Only by ridding Government of graft and corruption can confidence be restored.

Corruption is not new or unique. Every administration has suffered from the greedy and power-hungry who seek to use Government for their own selfish interests. No political party is immune from those within its ranks who are there only for power or profit without regard for its political philosophy or principles.

This is true at every level of government—city, county, State, and Federal. And it will remain true until the facts are given to the people and they act to correct the abuses of authority and prestige. Our kind of government does not usually permit these things to remain hidden long, unless the people themselves permit it.

Those who out of false loyalty to party or friends defend dishonesty are most guilty. The attitude of my party or my friends, right or wrong, is moral cowardice which breeds corruption and undermines the fabric of government.

Outright theft or embezzlement in government cannot go long undetected. More dangerous are the peddlers of influence, the 5-percenters, the fixers, and the shake-down artists. These are the men and women who use their positions and their friends for personal gain.

The acceptance of a mink coat by a White House stenographer from persons interested in obtaining Federal assistance is an indication of moral laxity which a good citizen cannot condone.

The whole intricate maze of doubtful operations in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by some of its officials endangers a program which makes 80 percent of its loans to small businesses needing less than $50,000. But this fact is obscured by the disgusting spectacle of its officials collaborating with men in the White House and in Congress to set up questionable financial ventures and Miami Beach hotels.

Throughout history there has been a market for the intangible commodity known as influence. As long as men choose to be greedy and to profit from the needs or suffering of others, there will be a market for influence.

In exposing the officials who willingly permit themselves to be used, we sometimes overlook the moral degeneration of those who buy influence. Those who sell influence and those who buy influence are equally bad.

Elected officials as well as appointed officials are a part of the pattern of evil. Charges of patronage being peddled over the counter in Mississippi are not isolated incidents. Employment of persons by any agency without regard to ability is a dangerous practice. We, too, find people administering important programs who have little conception of the problems involved.

It is shocking to find that many Congressmen and Senators are receiving retainers or salaries from other sources. I have found my job more than a full-time job—it is a job that can never be completely done. Yet if these men are accepting salaries or retainers they must be providing services. And can anyone vote in the best interests of all of the people of a district, if he stands to make personal profit for a particular interest?

Though committees of the House and Senate are performing a great service in uncovering corruption and dishonesty, Congress must also look at itself. It may be legal for a Senator to spend thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money to send telegraphic accounts of his speeches all over the country. It may be legal but it is morally wrong.

This is the heart of the problem. Many of the practices disclosed are not illegal. Yet, we cannot set mere legality as the standard of public life. Rather we ought to set the moral virtues as the standard of service in Government and to restore confidence in Government.

FRED MARSHALL.

In Memory of the Greatest American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, it has been the fortune of our Nation to have had great leaders come to the fore in the times of crisis. Six years ago tomorrow the free world mourned the death of one of the great leaders of all time—Franklin D. Roosevelt. He came to us when our Nation was in the midst of a terrible depression. He warned against fear and made the decisions which led us out of the depths of economic distress. He was ready when the Nazi monster unleashed war on our world. His decisions and his leadership led the free world to victory.

Six years ago tomorrow his successor, President Harry S. Truman, stepped into Roosevelt's shoes. President Truman has had to make great decisions during his 6 years in office. Every decision he has made has been made in the desire and in the great wish that it will take us farther down the road to eventual peace and security. President Truman had a tremendous decision to make on the question of using the atomic bomb. He made his decision resolutely.

He had a decision to make as to whether our Nation would give its unfailing support to the international cause of the United Nations. His critics, those men of little faith fought him, but he has not turned back.

He fought for the Truman doctrine, he gave his wholehearted support to make the Marshall plan work. His was a guiding hand in bringing the North Atlantic Pact into being.

Last year he was faced with an invasion of the Republic of Korea by the forces of the Kremlin. He made the decision that the Kremlin had gone far enough. The people of the free world have applauded his decision. His decision was made in the belief that it was another contribution to peace.

It is not easy to make controversial decisions in the time of great crisis when emotions and partisanship are running rampant. History only will record the correctness of the decision which is made, and history will record that the great decisions which have been made in the first 6 years of President Truman's administration have been made in the interest of peace for our generation and for generations to come.

Sometime in today's early hours President Truman had to make another controversial decision of high moment to the world; and, knowing the storm of abuse which would fall on him, he made that decision resolutely: To relieve Gen. Douglas MacArthur of his command functions.

This was a decision as painful as any ever made by President Roosevelt; and it may be as great in its impact on the world's future.

I remember vividly the sense of loss that I felt myself when I learned of President Roosevelt's death; I know that almost every man and woman in the free world felt the same sharp sense of personal desolation; and I know that Harry Truman, taking his sacred oath of office in the midst of the world's greatest war was not immune.

He has told us so; humbly and honestly, he has told the world that his only hope was to so conduct his office that he would not be ashamed to face his predecessor.

Surely today we need to hark back to the days of Franklin D. Roosevelt and his calm assurance. We need to remember his most striking phrase: "All we have to fear is fear itself."

Rev. Joseph Murgas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to represent in this House the Eleventh Pennsylvania District, comprising the county of Luzerne in the State of Pennsylvania, with Wilkes-Barre as the county seat. And further I have the distinction of living in that part of the city of Wilkes-Barre—up in North Wilkes-Barre—within the very parish so satisfactorily served by that great and beloved priest, distinguished scholar and scientist, Rev. Joseph Murgas.

And so on this day in April I use this great forum of democracy and freedom to pay tribute to his memory and I read from the book written by Mr. Stephen J. Palickar, an excellent biography of Father Murgas:

REV. JOSEPH MURGAS

As a servant in the vineyard of Christ, a humanitarian, and a man of science, Rev. Joseph Murgas' immutable characteristic was his intense love of truth and accuracy. A conspicuous manifestation of his quality in his life is traced to the early days of his priesthood when, as an austere art critic in his native Slovakia, he pointed to the false interpretation of a painting in the Hungarian House of Parliament by a famous Magyar artist who attempted to portray a certain historical event in the life of two nations. The circumstances which followed the daring performance of Father Murgas brought him to America where, as a priest, he continued to spread the truth of the gospel to his countrymen, a task he was aptly qualified to fulfill because of his sympathetic understanding of the human heart and a firm belief in the immortality of the soul.

His keen intellect and the blessing of his theological training helped in providing him with a sound scientific grounding which not only added to his lore, but also proved beneficial to civilization. In this category his fertile brain enabled him to emerge as a pioneer inventor in the field of wireless telegraphy and radio, and as a result of his work in this realm of science, he gained an aura of glamour which since has been denied him.

In addition to his religious, social, artistic, political and naturalistic accomplishments, Father Murgas' creative ability led him to invent a new and faster method of wireless communication known as the "Tone-system" by which, instead of the "dot" and "dash" spark impulse used in the Morse method, a musical effect arranged in different tones representing each letter of the alphabet was used to dispatch messages by wireless telegraphy.

Rev. Joseph Murgas further delved, and was the first to succeed in transmitting voice sounds by means of wireless which contributed toward making his device the forerunner of present-day radio.

An Ex-Artillery Captain Fires a General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, an ex-artillery captain has achieved the ultimate. He has fired the general.

I wonder what Hiss counseled this.

The supreme irony is that Mr. Truman invokes the Constitution as the basis of his action. This is the same Constitution which Mr. Truman flouted when he plunged the Nation into war without the authority of the Congress.

History records that one famous American general was fired—Gen. George McClellan—because he would not fight. Not until this morning, however, has an American general been fired because he insisted upon fighting a war he had been ordered to prosecute.

The President complains that MacArthur "is unable to give wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and of the United Nations."

He spoke more truly than he realized.

Certainly MacArthur has been unable to give his wholehearted support to the tragic absurdity that it is possible to repel and defeat aggression without defeating the aggressor and without using every military resource to accomplish that defeat.

He has been unable to give his wholehearted support to a blockade of Formosa which denies the Nationalist Chinese Government the right to fulfill its United Nations obligation to resist aggression.

He has been unable to give his wholehearted support to failure to provide South Koreans with arms to resist the invaders of their homeland and thereby save countless American lives.

He has been unable to give his wholehearted support to policies which prevented his carrying the war to the enemy's supply bases.

He has been unable to give his wholehearted support to the perpetuation of a futile stalemate in an aimless war which already has cost nearly 60,000 American casualties.

He has been unable to give his wholehearted support to policies which can have no ultimate outcome but appeasement.

If that is insubordination, then millions of MacArthur's fellow Americans are insubordinate.

Will the ex-artillery captain fire them, too?

Operation Statesmen—Increased Enrollment at Military Colleges Points Up Need for an Air Force Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, a recent issue of Newsweek Magazine carries on the cover a picture of West Point cadets in the historic dress uniforms that are a heritage from the earliest days of the United States Military Academy. Out of date though these uniforms of 1802 seem in the year 1951, there is nothing old-fashioned, out-of-date, or superfluous about the training the cadets at the Academy are receiving today. These picked young men, being educated at public expense, are being educated to become public leaders. As the author of the article states:

> In the present (or Kremlin-spooked) world it was apparent that, whether all Americans liked it or not, military leadership was playing and would continue to play a vital part in Government policy and administration. As Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, recently put it: "Today, in this half peace, half war, neither the soldier nor the diplomat alone can lead the American people in a wise course of international action. Both voices must be heard if American policy is to be realistic and effective."

Facing the realities of this period of tension in which we live, the West Point Military Academy is giving its hand-picked men the best education for all eventualities—and for service to their country as soldiers and leaders.

What is happening at West Point is also happening at Annapolis, at the Coast Guard Academy at New London, and at eight civilian schools specifically recognized by the Department of Defense as preferred sources for officer procurement. New courses are preparing men for new responsibilities. Increased applications are permitting new and even higher standards of selection. But new quotas are also permitting larger graduation classes. The military schools of the country are girding to face an emergency, and are in every way proving their own sense of responsibility to the citizens of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, in this Newsweek article on what the military academies are doing to turn out the best men, mentally, morally, and physically, to serve our country in any eventuality, one important fact is conspicuous by its absence There is no Air Force Academy. There is nowhere in the United States an academy that trains leaders for our United States Air Force in the way in which other schools train leaders for our Army, our Navy, and our Coast Guard.

The Air Force, it is true, has its own cadets—and trains them to be pilots, navigators, and bombardiers. But their Air Force training is technical and begins only after their required civilian and academic training has been completed. The Air Force has no opportunities and no facilities for taking young men just out of high school and giving them the sort of intensified training in leadership that the other services are giving other young men who will become leaders.

This deficiency is being met, after a fashion, by taking 25 percent of both Annapolis and West Point graduates for the Air Force—an expedient that creates a situation that is at once unfair to the Air Force and to the other services. It deprives both the Army and the Navy of leaders trained for the respective needs of these services, whereas it gives to the Air Force officers primarily trained in fields other than those involving basically Air Force requirements. Basically, the training that must be given an Army officer is training in civil engineering, and West Point graduates have built most of our harbors, many of our bridges, and our great Panama Canal. Basically, the training that must be given a naval officer is training in mechanical engineering, and Navy Academy graduates are outstanding among men who follow the sea. But what the Air Force requires is officers trained in aeronautical engineering—for the mastery of a third element, that is neither sea nor land.

The unfairness of the existing situation points up the pressing need for an Air Force Academy, but the need is now greater than the need of a single service for military leaders. In this air age, in which our survival may depend on our ability to retain control of the air, not only over the United States but over any lands where freedom is threatened, the need is for strategists who are educated in the problems, the tactics, the responsibilities and the science of the air.

The forces with which we are confronted in the world today demand that we seek perfection in our armed force. We must rely on quality rather than quantity, on the effective use of technical equipment rather than on manpower. Along with other essential qualities our officer corps must have a high intelligence and educational level. All of them should, in fact, have a full college education as a minimum requirement.

If an Air Academy could be opened in the summer of 1952, its first contribution to an increase in the officer corps of the three services would not occur before 1956. The first full strength class of graduates could not reasonably be produced earlier than 1960. Hence, it is perfectly true that an Air Force Academy, even if authorized today, would have little or no effect on the specific emergency with which we are now confronted. But the tensions that disturb the peace today may well last through the lifetime of most of us, and through future generations. We must build our defenses not merely for 1951, but for 1961, and for all the years ahead. An Air Force Academy at this time is necessary as part of our long-range insurance, not merely to build up the Air Force but the Army and the Navy as well, since West Point and Annapolis do not actually meet the needs of Army and Navy, much less those of the Air Force.

We must remember the stern warning of Winston Churchill, who said:

For good or ill, air mastery is today the supreme expression of military power.

If the United States is to retain leadership in the world, and hence in the air, it becomes the responsibility of American citizens and of the American Congress to establish an Air Force Academy that will produce the leaders qualified to win and maintain for us military mastery in this element which Americans were the first to conquer.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the article, Operation Statesmen, from the March 25, 1951, issue of Newsweek magazine.

The article is as follows:

WEST POINT PRODUCING SOLDIER STATESMEN AS MILITARY COLLEGES FACE BIGGEST BOOM

The rush was on. There hadn't been anything like it since 1942. While many college leaders in America deplored the loss of boys to the services and predicted declines in enrollment of up to 40 percent, military colleges braced themselves for the biggest boom in their history.

The three service Academies—West Point, Annapolis, and the Coast Guard Academy at New London, Conn.—are limited by law in their enrollments. They were turning away more applicants than ever before. Most of the eight "tin colleges," civilian schools especially recognized by the Pentagon for their strict military training, were getting about two or three times as many applications as they could accept. The eight: Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Clemson Agricultural College, the Citadel, Virginia Military Institute, Norwich University, Pennsylvania Military College, and North Georgia College. In Army slang they are called "tin" to differentiate the "brass," or top officer personnel, which traditionally comes from the official schools. Gen. George Marshall, top Army officer of the Second World War and present Secretary of Defense, is a graduate of VMI.

The tin colleges, whose enrollments now total some 13,000, could expect the pressure on them to get heavier. Since the schools require virtually all male students to take ROTC and live a military life in uniform, the recent Senate draft bill (Newsweek, March 19) grants the ROTC men of these eight colleges the same deferments as service-Academy students. The House bill, up for an early vote, contains the same provision. And the 100 Regular and 400 Reserve Army commissions that usually go to these 8 schools will be more than doubled this June.

ACADEMY RUSH

At Annapolis, largest of the service Academies, 3,600 middies were crammed into huge Bancroft Hall's space for 2,900. The present student body is the largest in the 106-year existence of the Naval Academy.

The Coast Guard Academy, smallest (with an enrollment of 500) and youngest (75 years old) of the federally supported Academies, had room for only 1 out of every 30 men who qualified mentally. In February, 6,201 tooks its exams; only 200 were picked.

West Point, oldest of the three official military schools, was taking the boom most calmly. Celebrating the start of its one hundred and fiftieth year last week, the great gray fortress above the Hudson maintained the same enrollment that it had 5 years ago—the authorized 2,496. But for last year's 14 Presidential appointments, 310 had competed. Some 1,500 Regular Army personnel applied for the Point; 50 applicants took exams, and 12 were selected. Congressmen and Senators appoint 85 percent of the cadets and 60 percent of Annapolis' middies. Some reported 100 applicants for each of the 4 Point and 5 Annapolis appointments which they may have attending at the same time.

Military instructors saw only one reason for the boom. Thousands of boys preferred several years in a military school, followed by an officer's commission, to a drafted private's job in the Infantry. As for the service Academies, by initial selection, training, and constant culling in the course of the free education they give their students, they still produced most of the cream of the country's military leadership. And of a significantly different kind.

In the present (or Kremlin-spooked) world it was apparent that, whether all Americans liked it or not, military leadership was playing and would continue to play a vital part in Government policy and administration. As Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, recently put it: "Today, in this half peace, half war, neither the soldier nor the diplomat alone can lead the American people in a wise course of international action. Both voices must be heard if American policy is to be realistic and effective."

There was no question that the voice of the military was being heard in statesmanship. George C. Marshall, Virginia Military Institute, 1901; Dwight D. Eisenhower and Bradley, United States Military Academy, 1915, were clearly helping to shape the vital foreign-policy decisions of the Republic. Gen. Douglas MacArthur, United States Military Academy, 1903, could not stay out of the dire headlines from Asia even if he wanted to. Fleet Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, United States Naval Academy, 1905, headed up the ticklish work of the Presidential Commission on Internal Security and Individual Rights.

LEADERSHIP

Both Annapolis and West Point have realized the new trend in military education. Since the end of the Second World War, both have established new departments of "leadership." Of the approximately 3,000 hours each West Point cadet spends in study and recitation during his 4 years, roughly 40 percent are now devoted to social-humanistic studies. (Cadets take an additional 2,000 hours of military training, mostly in the summer.)

Old-time Pointers might frown on such newfangled ideas. These were certainly different from the original concept of a United States Military Academy when it was founded as an engineering school under Maj. Jonathan Williams in 1802. The original 5 officers and 10 cadets had dwindled to 1 of each by 1812, when the war with England brought new strength to the United States Military Academy. In the nineteenth century, Pointers built all the Nation's main and cross-country railroad lines and mapped and surveyed the coasts and frontiers. Later they completed such major engineering projects as the Panama Canal.

Something like that atmosphere has returned to the Point. Under its 1945 Superintendent, Maj. Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, geography was restored after a 50-year absence from the curriculum; history of the Far East, Russia, and Latin America, and United States diplomatic history were modernized. Subjects like economics of security now give first classmen (seniors) training in resources and manpower and their capability of conversion to a wartime economy. Student conferences with other colleges bring cadets in contact with their civilian brothers.

In international relations, contemporary problems are studied. In part of the course—Operation Statesman, begun in 1947—first classmen finish their international-relations training by studying a major United States foreign problem. In groups of 18, they examine and report on such thorny projects as writing a peace treaty for Japan or Germany, implementing the point 4 program, or proposing United States policy toward the disposition of Italy's former African colonies.

JETS AND ATOMS

Each cadet must take a language—the only choice he has in the curriculum—and 180 hours of English. In the scientific-engineering side of his liberal education, the Pointer studies atomic energy and electronics via oversize machines and demonstrations. The principles of jet propulsion can be learned firsthand from an F-80 jet engine donated last January by the Air Force, whither, incidentally, 25 percent of the cadets and of the Annapolis middies go on graduation. The $180,000 gift is the only such bodiless engine outside research laboratories and roars its exhaust out over the Hudson River, much to the consternation of nearby Cold Springs, N. Y., residents.

The department of military psychology and leadership, suggested in 1946 by General Eisenhower, proposes to the cadets such concrete problems as how to tell an incipient squad leader that he is about to be sent to cooks-and-bakers school instead, how to cope with a pregnant girl who accuses a soldier in your company of fatherhood, or what to tell your roommate when he breaks a fighter-plane formation which you command. (Annapolis has a similar course.) Military psychology and leadership also oversees the aptitude system whereby each man grades the 100 men of all classes in his company on leadership qualities. Each cadet is rated 9 times in his point career. If he consistently ends up at the bottom of the list, he gets advice from his superiors and the staff psychologist. If this does not help, he is advised to resign without disgrace because of his lack of leadership qualities. (Annapolis aptitude ratings do not permit a middie to rate a man above him.)

PLEBES AND RULES

Military psychology and leadership also takes the plebes (freshmen) under its wing. Hazing and the miseries of "bracing" (sucking in the chin and stomach, throwing out the chest and shoulders) were long the tradition at the Point. Today the plebe need never brace in public and physical hazing is forbidden. As one first classman puts it, "instead of driving the plebes we're leaving them alone. That old stuff was nonsense." Plebes each have an officer adviser among the 310 faculty members. These advisers invite the plebes to their homes and listen to their worries.

Bound by duty and honor, cadets are now allowed to drink in uniform 25 miles from the Academy (formerly they never could drink in uniform). While the new Point Superintendent, Maj. Gen. Frederick A. Irving, who took over in January,[1] is willing to trust his men with less discipline under the honor system, Annapolis is now undergoing a tightening-up of already strict rules. Vice Adm. Harry W. Hill, Superintendent since last April, felt the middies were having it too soft. First classmen who in years past enjoyed every other week end off have suddenly found that they now have only four or five a semester. Annapolis plebes may not "drag" (date) except on rare occasions.

Civilians may wonder at the purpose of such training. But it is part of the Academies' attempt to turn out the very best men mentally, morally, and physically.

About half of each Coast Guard class "bilges out" before graduation, as the heavy engineering course is a tough one. Some 25 out of every 100 middies don't make it. West Point has managed to cut its "foundlings" from 50 percent 100 years ago to the present 20 percent. At the eight tin colleges drop-outs are much lower, with Texas A. & M.'s 11 percent unusually high.

Training for peacetime governmental service, as well as possible war command, has put a tremendous responsibility on the military academies and colleges. Out of a wave of applicants they have had to choose not only the good men. They have had to pick the best—and give them the best education for all eventualities—to wit, "Operation statesmen."

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER E. CAPEHART
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, in connection with the recall early this morning of General MacArthur, an editorial entitled "What Now, Mr. President?" published today in the Washington News.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT NOW, MR. PRESIDENT?

Now, Mr. President, that you have fired General MacArthur, what next?

You have appointed General Ridgway as his successor to all United States and UN Far East commands.

Yet, 2 days ago, General Ridgway said:

"I see no end to the military operations unless there is a political settlement. I have no personal knowledge of negotiations for a political settlement. * * * There is nothing transitory, nothing temporary, about this situation we are in so far as a fight against communism is concerned. For Communist leaders this is a life and death struggle. The Communists will not vary their objectives. These fellows are out to destroy us no matter how long it takes."

Isn't that the same thing that General MacArthur has been saying?

By firing General MacArthur, Mr. President, have you come any closer to winning or ending the war in Korea?

That, eventually, is the test you must meet.

Serving General MacArthur's head up on a platter may temporarily appease the yapping yahoos of the British Socialist Government. But Britain has only 13,000 ground troops in Korea.

It may bring a frenzied delight to Prime Minister Nehru of India. But India has sent only an ambulance unit and some gunny sacks to Korea.

It may give some satisfaction to the French, but they have only 600 men in Korea.

Yet, what word goes to the 250,000 Americans alive and fighting in Korea? What is to be done in retribution for the 60,000 American casualties, including the 9,000 American dead—what assurance that their bleeding and dying shall not have been in vain?

General MacArthur has been sacked because, it is said, he was insubordinate.

General MacArthur's crime is that he saw no sense in fighting a losing or a futile war.

He insisted that we get this war over with—by victory, as has been the American habit.

To do the job, he asked for reinforcements—from all members of the United Nations—and a free hand to mount the maximum counter-offensive against the enemy. He asked that the 500,000 troops of Nationalist China be permitted to fight on our side.

He asked for these things because he wanted to win the war so that our troops could come home.

Secretary of State Acheson and the British Socialists and Nehru have won a great victory. They have got General MacArthur's scalp—which has been their goal for many months.

But now that the diplomats and the politicians have taken over this war, what are they going to do with it?

The President's order relieving General MacArthur of his command authorized him to issue such travel orders as he wishes to go any place he sees fit. But that does not apply to the 250,000 American troops under his command. They are left in Korea.

What is to be done about these men?

What about Korea?

What about the rest of Asia?

Centralization of Military Apparent Aim of Vinson UMT Proposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, there is strong evidence to support the conviction that the UMT proposal submitted by Secretary of Defense Marshall represented one more attempt in the series of efforts to centralize all military power in the Federal Government.

The most ominous feature of the UMT issue will be missed completely if this factor is overlooked or minimized.

The fact that both the Senate UMT bill, as finally adopted, and the House bill, now under consideration, modify the original Marshall bill provisions to some degree, particularly so far as the status of the National Guard is concerned, does not alter the facts as to the apparent intent of General Marshall and the Pentagon to move substantially closer to complete centralization of military power.

Unless there is constant alertness to this aspect of the UMT proposal, there is still no assurance that this further centralization will not be an effect of UMT legislation.

The original Marshall bill puts Congress on notice as to the Pentagon's intent and continued desire on this score. It puts Congress on notice that there has been no serious effort to approach the problem of preparedness through the decentralized National Guard approach. And it certainly puts Congress on notice that it can expect stubborn resistance and obstruction, so far as the Pentagon is concerned, to any attempt to make that approach.

THE GRAY BOARD'S KIDNAPING PLAN

There are strong grounds for believing that the Marshall UMT bill was an attempt to accomplish, through the back door, what it hoped to achieve by the 1948 proposal to kidnap the National Guard.

It is important, for background purposes, to review the essential facts of this kidnaping effort, represented by the recommendation of the Committee on Civilian Components, commonly called the Gray Board, in its report of June 30, 1948.

On October 13, 1945—just prior to the retirement of General Marshall as Army Chief of Staff—a statement of approved War Department policies affecting the National Guard of the United States and the Organized Reserve Corps was issued by the War Department. This plan contemplated an M-day force, to comprise the Nation's first line of defense, made up of approximately 850,000 men in the Regular Army and Air Force, another 680,000 men in the National Guard, and approximately 220,000 men in the Organized Reserve, for a total of 1,750,000 men capable of immediate mobilization in the event of aggression.

In 1947 the Committee on Civilian Components was brought into being. Its report of June 30, 1948, included certain findings and recommendations which added up to a proposal that the National Guard be brought directly under control of the Federal Government.

Before these findings and recommendations are cited, however, attention should be called to the constitutional provisions regarding a decentralized militia which, today, is the National Guard of the several States.

THE PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides:

The Congress shall have power—

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

The Constitution, in the same article and section, also provides:

The Congress shall have power—

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years.

[1] General Irving succeeded Maj. Gen. Bryant E. Moore, General Taylor's successor in 1949. General Moore recently died in Korea after a helicopter accident.

The significance of these two provisions is a twofold balancing of powers, responsibilities, and authority so far as the Armed Forces of the Nation and the States are concerned:

First. The Federal Government was given the power to provide for a standing Army, subject to the 2-year appropriation limitation; the Federal Government also was given authority to prescribe the discipline to govern the State militia.

Second. The States were assured the support of the Federal Government for its militia—National Guard—since the Federal Government would organize and arm these State troops; at the same time the States retained control over the militia through its power to appoint the officers and train the troops comprising the militia.

This, then, is a provision for effective decentralization of military control and authority except (a) for Federal control of the standing Army; (b) Federal control of the militia when called into the service of the United States.

Thus the Constitution did not contemplate (a) a permanent, peacetime Federal Militia; (b) the right of the Federal Government to federalize the militia in peacetime—that is, at any time other than when necessary "to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

GRAY REPORT PROPOSAL

The Gray report held that "the National Guard must be directly under Federal control" in order to accomplish its accepted national role or mission as defined in the October 13, 1945, War Department policies.

The report further recommended specifically:

1. Establishing the Reserve forces of the Army under the Army clause of the Constitution.
2. Establishing the Reserve forces of the Air Force under appropriate (Federal) legal authority.
3. Incorporating the National Guard and the Organized Reserve Corps into the Army Reserve force under the name of the "National Guard of the United States."
4. Incorporating the Air National Guard and Air Reserve into the Air Force Reserve under the name of the "United States Air Force Reserve."

Subsequently the Secretary of Defense, on December 15, 1948, recommended to the President, among other things, the federalization of the Air National Guard, and greater Federal control over the personnel, equipment, facilities, and allocation of moneys to the States.

PROTESTS MADE BY STATE LEGISLATURES

These developments brought vigorous protests from the States. Memorials to Congress were adopted opposing the proposed federalization. Besides the Michigan Legislature, acting under dates of April 29 and May 17, 1949, similar action was taken by the States of South Carolina, Maryland, South Dakota, Indiana, Massachusetts, Utah, Arkansas, Maine, Minnesota, and Oregon, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Michigan resolution stated, among other things:

Such federalization would violate the principle of State's rights.

* * * Federalization * * * would violate existing agreements between the Federal Government and the sovereign States whereby the States accepted in good faith the allotments made by the War Department in 1945, and have completed the organization of such allotments, insofar as authorized by the Congress and for which funds have been provided. * * *

* * * Federalization would destroy at one blow the Nation Guard as it now exists * * * and would result in the centralization of all military power in the Federal Government and ultimately in the hands of a few, and thus pave the way for the establishment of a dictatorship, military or otherwise, in this country. * * *

* * * The States * * * would be compelled to organize and maintain State troops at great cost to the States with the result that there would thus be maintained a Federal reserve and State military force, creating a great duplication of effort and expense. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 95, pt. 6, pp. 7214–7215.)

The resolutions adopted by the other States contained similar statements as to the consequence of proposed federalization of the National Guard.

STATEMENTS BY GEN. JULIUS KLEIN

In an address at Bloomington, Ill., January 27, 1949, Brig. Gen. Julius Klein, commander of One Hundred and Ninth Antiaircraft Artillery Brigade, Thirty-third Division, Illinois National Guard, made these statements regarding the proposed federalization of the National Guard:

From time to time, powerful groups of individuals have sought to destroy the traditional principles upon which the National Guard was founded and has been maintained throughout our history. They have repeatedly attempted to kidnap the Guard from the States and place it directly under control of the Federal Government. The latest assault on the National Guard, and the rights of States, has been launched under the cloak of so-called unification of the Armed Forces by the Committee on Civilian Components.

General Klein quoted former Governor Green, of Illinois, as saying:

I am sure that I voice the sentiments of the Governors of almost all States when I say that we will fight to the last ditch against this proposal. National Guard officers and men have proven themselves superior to the fighting men of the strongest militaristic nations of the world. They are ready for effective action sooner than officers and men in the Federal Reserves which were organized after World War I. * * * I believe * * * the War Department records will reveal that in World War II not a single unit of the Organized Reserve Corps was called into Federal service as a unit—a record not conducive to capturing the trust and confidence of the Nation.

General Klein then added:

The Federal Government has also had direct Federal control of the Organized Reserve Corps since the end of World War II and has had the opportunity to make the Organized Reserve Corps as efficient as the National Guard is under State control, but has failed to do so. Thirty years of apparent failure with the ORC prior to World War II and continued failure since World War II is a poor recommendation. What assurance has the Nation that the Army, with the National Guard under Federal control, will be more successful than the States have been?

General Klein pointed out that the concern of the Gray board over delay in putting the National Guard into Federal service and transfer of Federal property could be corrected by an amendment to the National Defense Act "which would automatically place the National Guard under Federal control the instant Congress declares a National Emergency." He said such a recommendation had been submitted to the Defense Department some time ago.

Then General Klein gave this warning:

It is not too difficult to visualize that at some future time an ambitious, selfish individual, group or organization would be able to use this great power to continue its control of the Government, or endeavor to seize such control. This one possibility alone is enough to condemn forever this great centralization of power, which one day might place this, the last free nation in the world, in jeopardy of losing the freedom for which so many of our people died.

* * * The National Guard system, comprising as it does—citizen soldiers—has always been a bulwark against the concentration of military power in our Federal Government. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 95, pt. 2, pp. 1493–94.)

General Klein cited as one further argument against federalization the fact that in event of an atomic attack wiping out Washington, it would be tremendously important to continue military decentralization "of, if you please, a continuation of the present National Guard system." In such an emergency, he pointed out:

The only remaining recognized authority in such a crisis would be the governors of the sovereign States. If the National Guard were federalized * * * these governors would be without the legal power to employ the troops.

COLLIER'S EDITORIAL ON FEDERALIZATION

The March 26, 1949, Collier's carried a vigorous editorial opposing the federalization of the National Guard. Its argument is summed up as follows:

Ours is a Federal and not a National Government. The difference is far more than a matter of words. It is the difference between a Nazi or a Communist state and a free state. * * *

* * * Let's not federalize the National Guard or any other governmental enterprise that can be successfully operated by State or local governments. (Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 95, pt. 13, p. A1987.)

GENERAL MARSHALL'S ADMISSION OF FAILURE

Apropos of what General Klein said, above—and Governor Green—regarding the failure of the Federal Government to develop an effective Reserve system, note the following statement by General Marshall, quoted in the April 13, 1951, United States News and World Report, page 31:

We started in June from a state of bankruptcy as to available trained reserves. Whatever Reserve organizations we had were only 40 or 50 percent of strength, and that strength only partially trained. * * * What we are now trying to do is overcome this complete deficiency of trained men that we've had.

While this may be in part an attempt to belittle the National Guard, although Marshall said, page 28, "the National Guard as part of" the "Reserve system have the equivalent of 34 divisions of ground troops with 50 percent strength," it obviously applies particularly to the Organized Reserve Corps.

Insofar as what Marshall says is true it is an admission of the Pentagon's failure to obey the orders of the President issued October 15, 1948—Executive Order No. 10,007, Federal Register, volume 13, October 19, 1948, page 6099.

Included in this order was the following:

The Secretary of Defense, and the head of each Department in the National Military Establishment, shall proceed without delay, utilizing every practicable resource of the regular components of the Armed Forces, to organize all Reserve component units, and to train such additional individuals now or hereafter members of the Active Reserve, as may be required for the national security; and to establish vigorous and progressive programs of appropriate instruction and training for all elements of the Reserve components, including the National Guard.

FAILURE TO ACTIVATE THE NATIONAL GUARD

In this connection, it is interesting to note the criticism voiced in the House on April 14, 1948, by Congressman Keefe. After pointing out that the War Department had spent or obligated only a little over $30,000,000 after making a showing of need for $143,000,000, which was appropriated, Mr. Keefe said:

The National Guard units have not been recruited and have not been made attractive to the boys who would otherwise enlist in the National Guard. They have not been given the equipment that they ought to have in order to make it attractive to enlistees to go into the National Guard. In the face of the Army's contention that they need more young men in the armed services to the extent that they are carrying on a constant campaign for universal military training, it seems to me there may be some logical connection between their failure to lay emphasis on activation of the National Guard until they get the UMT put over. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 94, pt. 4, p. 4444.)

Mr. Andrews, of New York, pointed out, further—and this was 3 years ago—that under the selective-service provisions for exemption of men who signed up with the National Guard—

It will add enough men to the National Guard so that they will have all that they possibly can use, and they will be under World War II officers if the Government recognizes them in a way they should be recognized (ibid., p. 4448).

WARNING WAS GIVEN IN JANUARY 1948

General Marshall now complains of the state of bankruptcy so far as trained reserves is concerned. The Pentagon has no one but itself to blame. As long ago as January 15, 1948, Congressman SIKES said this in the House. After pointing out that "a very small percentage" of the military budget had been used for the Reserves, he continued:

I believe the departments received all they requested from Congress for Reserve and National Guard activities. * * *

* * * The strength allotted to the National Guard by the Departments of Army and Air is close to 700,000 officers and men. Today in fact the National Guard is made up of skeleton units, partially equipped, which total about 200,000 men. Can we afford to allow the National Guard to remain as skeleton units awaiting possible passage of UMT legislation? Is it not more practical to inaugurate a drive of sufficient amount to bring these units up to usable strength, to equip and train them for modern warfare, as War Department blueprints long ago envisioned?

The Organized Reserve, in which over a million wartime officers and men signified their interest by joining, is today anything but an effective security force. Only a small percentage of its officers have received assignment to actual functioning units. The enlisted reserves, about 600,000 of them, are altogether too small in number. * * *

* * * Certainly 2½ years is sufficient time for the leaders of our Armed Forces to realize that something should have been done with our citizen components to effectively weld them into the proper kind of security forces. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 94, pt. 1, p. 223.)

Yet today Marshall scolds the American people for letting down in peacetime. He insists on UMT to build an enduring posture of defense.

On April 8 of the same year, Congressman Mathews charged that the Defense Department was failing to use funds voted by Congress and at the same time there were rumors that "the Army says it does not have the funds to finance the field training of the National Guard." And Mathews asked:

Is the high brass of the Army again sabotaging the National Guard? (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 94, pt. 3, p. 4252.)

GENERAL WALSH TESTIMONY BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE

Here is the pattern: An attempt by the Pentagon to take over, "kidnap" the National Guard. At the same time neglect of the National Guard as now constituted; neglect of the Organized Reserve; and still complaint, as of April 1951, over the bankruptcy of the present Reserve set-up when desperately needed in June 1950.

Now does not the situation highlighted by the testimony of Gen. E. A. Walsh, president of the National Guard Association of the United States, before the Senate Armed Services Committee, January 19, 1951, fit into this same Pentagon policy of "rule or ruin"?

First. Walsh said National Guard Association officials had not seen a copy of the Marshall bill until the afternoon before they were called on to testify.

Second. Walsh said the bill "did little" for the National Guard and "may, in effect, mark the end of the Army and Air National Guard."

Third. He charged that the bill was before the committee illegally since there had been a failure to bring the matter before a War Department committee on which National Guard was represented, as required by law.

Fourth. He said it had never been contemplated by the National Guard that UMT would be tied to a draft-extension bill.

Fifth. He warned that the service called for under this hyphenated bill "will accrue to the Regular Armed Forces" rather than to "organized units of the civilian components"—including the National Guard.

Sixth. He said:

The National Guard is most dubious that under the provisions contained in this bill, it will obtain any substantial numbers and anywhere near sufficient to maintain its required strength. If this proves to be the case, and we think it will, then the Army and Air National Guard will wither and die.

Seventh. He charged that the Marshall bill eliminated the exemption from the draft of present and potential National Guard personnel, cutting off the guard's source of manpower.

Eighth. He said the bill omitted the declaration of Congress' intent that when units and organizations are needed in excess of the regular forces, the guard shall be ordered to active service. I believe this item is the one Marshall told the House committee was omitted by oversight due to the Defense Department working until 2 or 3 in the morning. It was added to both the Senate and House bills. Are we sure this oversight was unintentional?

Ninth. Walsh complained that the National Guard had not been activated except for a few units and added:

The sounder approach to the problem would be, in our opinion, to order into the active military service of the United States all of the Army and Air National Guard * * * which is not now in * * * active service * * * on the basis of a phased mobilization. (P. 718, Senate hearings.)

Tenth. Walsh ridiculed the argument that prospective draftees were using the National Guard to hide from the draft, pointing out that they wouldn't be hiding from the draft if the Defense Department called the guard to active duty.

Eleventh. Walsh asked that if only half of the 18-year-olds were going to be taken for active service with the Regular forces, could not they be used as a source of added manpower for the National Guard?

Twelfth. He further charged:

We are being in a large measure reduced in efficiency rather than having our efficiency increased at this time, because a lot of our equipment is being taken from us, some of our enlisted men and * * * officers have been permitted to volunteer for active service, and all those things reduce the efficiency of the National Guard as a reserve ready for mobilization.

Thirteenth. It is apparent that Walsh later gave his endorsement to the House bill because he felt that it restored the omissions he objected to, corrected many of the weaknesses of the Marshall bill, and provided for UMT, which he favors.

CONCLUSION

The fact remains that the intent of General Marshall and the Pentagon seems clear. The kindest thing that can be said is that it was not their intent to strengthen and safeguard and utilize to the maximum the National Guard as now constituted.

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that having been stymied in their effort to kidnap the National Guard they propose to starve it to death, weaken it as a competitor to the Pentagon-controlled Organized Reserve.

Certainly the basic consideration in any approach to UMT must be a complete reversal of emphasis and interest—from that of empire building by the Pentagon which is on record through its effort to centralize military control to development of decentralized, citizen-type reserves and military training program.

Certainly the Pentagon has given ample notice within the past few years of the need for the Congress and the American people to be vigilant.

The Barden substitute to S. 1 must be adopted.

Legion Head Urges Korean Decisions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, current press reports indicate that National Commander Erle Cocke, Jr., of the American Legion, has offended the White House by a statement that, "General MacArthur has been fighting the Korean war with both hands tied behind his back." This conclusion is not entirely new so far as Commander Cocke is concerned. Under leave to extend my remarks I quote here extract from a report written by Mr. Cocke following his recent visit to the Korean front as published in the March 29 issue of the National Tribune—the Stars and Stripes:

From private and from command officers with multiple stars on their shoulders I received queries as to what Washington was going to resolve on the Korean situation and when. I could not answer that query, but countered by asking them what they thought should be done.

They were not hesitant in their answers, posed in various ways but all adding up to: "Send us more men. Decide upon what our ultimate goal is to be. Realize that even to win a stalemate additional strength must be sent and sent soon."

That from these men, wise in military lore, gave me pause.

As darkness precluded further visits we returned to General Ridgway's headquarters and batted the breeze, as old soldiers will. I found that this grenade-toting ex-paratrooper worries over the questions asked, too. He is striving to find the answers. But the answers, it seem to me, are not at Army level. They lie in the much higher echelon. But answers there must be. There is a limit to human endurance, and that limit is reached much quicker when one doesn't even know what the ultimate goal is.

We have crossed and recrossed the Han River many times. Now it is ours again. The thirty-eighth parallel is close by. Is that to be our digging-in place, or are we going back to the Yalu River again? Who is going to decide whether the Manchurian border, across which the enemy brazenly stores matériel of war and masses his troops, is to be inviolate again? General MacArthur's communiques have stopped hinting that it is within his province to order our planes across that line. Yet, if we are to be successful in this war, we cannot afford to allow the enemy to mass his strength and thumb his nose at us while we sit on this side of the border and await permission to cut the cancer at its source.

Wars are not won that way.

There definitely is a crying need for replacements and, if we are to be successful in even accomplishing a stalemate and maintaining it, there must be some definite goal established.

Whether that goal be the thirty-eighth parallel or whether we must strike at the root of the enemy's supply bases, is a question that General MacArthur says is beyond his authority.

But someone's authority it is. Is it President Truman? Is it the United Nations secretariat? Is it the free nations as a unit, or is it the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Frankly, I do not know, but an answer must be given and a decision made—and soon.

Midland Cooperative Wholesale of Minneapolis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, April 11 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the State of Minnesota takes great pride in the success and growth of its cooperative movement and associations. One of the outstanding examples of effective cooperative enterprise is the Midland Cooperative Wholesale of Minneapolis. Recently this organization celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. Mr. Russell Aslesen, staff writer for the Minneapolis Tribune, has described the growth of the Midland Cooperative Wholesale in an article in the Minneapolis Tribune, March 25, 1951. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIDLAND CO-OP SUCCESS EXCEEDS ROSY DREAMS OF EARLY BACKERS

A handful of discontented Minnesota farmers met at the old State Capitol Building in St. Paul September 8, 1926.

Most were directors of local cooperative oil companies which were springing up in the area and trying to weather the financial storm.

Like the rest of the Nation, these men had been watching—or taking part in—the successful fight of Minnesota's dairy interests to unite local cooperatives into the area-wide marketing associations.

"If you can carry cooperation in a milk can, you can carry it in a gasoline can," said more than one riled-up southern Minnesota farmer.

After the mutterings against "obstinate petroleum industry" and "exorbitant profit margins" died down, the farmers formally signed articles of incorporation for the world's first wholesale oil cooperative.

It was thus that Midland Cooperative Wholesale of Minneapolis was born.

Even its most rabid backers, like A. P. Bartsch, Owatonna, Minn., first president, had no idea they were starting the modern miracle of cooperative success.

The most fanatic would have hesitated to predict that in 25 years, the cooperative would have a volume of business totaling $29,460,995 or facilities worth $3,411,788. Or have returned $5,483,843 to patrons over the 25-year period.

That is the success story Midland officers will carry to their membership at the silver anniversary meeting Monday through Wednesday in Nicollet Hotel, Minneapolis.

From a rented desk, a dynamic manager and an idea 25 years ago, Midland has mushroomed into an organization owned by some 600 local co-ops and serving 300,000 families in Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Wisconsin, and Iowa.

It no longer distributes only oil and gas. It has a line of food and farm supplies, in many cases manufacturing them. Either outright or with other co-op partners, it owns oil wells in Oklahoma, refineries in Texas, Louisiana, and Oklahoma; mills in Minnesota and Wisconsin; fertilizer plants in Idaho; farm machinery manufacturing plants in Ohio, Indiana, and Minnesota; and food plants in Indiana.

Midland often has been referred to as "an idea whose time had come."

The "co-operative ground," well fertilized by failures, was ready to produce.

Farmers at that time had watched the sharp price breaks following World War I and later watched farm credit shrinking.

A group of farmers at Cottonwood, Minn., in 1921 had applied the basic principles found successful in their co-op creameries and shipping associations—and gone into the gas and oil business.

Not long afterward, Casco, New London, Van Dyne, and Manawa, Wis., had organizations distributing petroleum products on a cooperative basis.

The idea came of age when Marshall, Jackson, Owatonna, Redwood Falls, Dawson, and Albert Lea, Minn., soon followed and by 1926 co-op bulk plants and filling stations were being put up all over both States.

They bought their products from the "old line" companies, an arrangement they found unsatisfactory at times. The idea of a central organization to wholesale their own oil began to take form.

There were other unrecorded preliminaries that culminated in the St. Paul meeting to draw up articles for the wholesale oil co-op, then called the Minnesota Co-op Oil Co.

At that point, they had the cooperative. But they had no capital, no manager or facilities.

That was the situation that faced E. G. Cort, Freeborn County agent, late in November 1926, when the board of directors "hired" him.

Cort, a dynamic worker, was obsessed with the cooperative idea and to demonstrate his faith in that idea, "gambled" with the board. He was hired without salary, with salary to be discussed if he made good.

So it was that on January 2, 1927, Cort slid behind a desk in an office at 3300 East Hennepin Avenue he shared with another firm. He was manager of a corporation without working capital or capital stock.

Cort was a pioneer in trail blazing the program to put more ownership into the hands of more people. A graduate of Iowa State College in 1911, he had taught school and farmed in Chippewa County, Minn., before going to Albert Lea as county agent in 1923. While county agent, he became active in the cooperative movement and helped form the Freeborn County oil cooperative.

With no angel to underwrite the enterprise, the new co-op led a hand-to-mouth existence. It was set up on a membership basis with a local co-op becoming a member by paying annual membership fees of $20 for the first bulk station and $5 for each additional bulk or service station.

It also is recorded that the local co-ops paid in advance for cars of gasoline.

Cort was a driving force but a quiet, unassuming man named F. H. Osborne, Albert Lea, the first secretary-treasurer, provided an ideal balance wheel to him. Osborne worked behind the scenes, advising Cort in a fatherly fashion and husbanding the meager resources. He was a businessman turned farmer, who knew farm problems could not be solved on an individual basis.

The first year's operation showed net savings of $3,473 on a volume of almost $270,000. It spurred the men of Midland to increase their tempo and the successes of the first few years may have produced a confidence not completely justified.

Achievements did not come without compensation or opposition but by the end of 10 years, the volume grew to more than $3,000,000.

The co-op got a permanent home at 739 Northeast Johnson Street in 1931 when it bought a World War I chemical plant, idle since hostilities. They paid $9,000 for the building and land now valued at more than $150,000.

Present responsibilities of Midland management rest on the shoulders of 6-foot 4-inch A. J. Smaby, a Minnesotan of Scandinavian ancestry. He was manager of the Tri-County Co-op Oil Association in Rushford, Minn., before coming to Midland in 1936 as credit manager. He became manager in 1941 when Cort suffered a heart attack.

J. F. Shea, Pickett, Wis., now is president of the board.

Under this management, sales hit a record high of $29,549,000 and net savings of $2,276,000 in 1948.

Midland, although having interests in oil wells and refineries, still isn't self-sufficient in crude oil. As a result of a squeeze of crude and refinery prices of petroleum products in 1949, the firm was in the red for the first time in history and lost $197,164.

It bounced back in 1950 with net savings of $1,064,332.

Here are some other highlights in its rise:

1933: Sales reach $1,000,000.

1934: Change name to Midland Co-op Wholesale and change from membership organization to capital-stock firm.

1935: Second largest distributor of petroleum products in Minnesota.

1941: Teamed with Indiana Farm Bureau Co-op to get fertilizer plant at Hartsdale.

1943: The year of going into production. Authorized purchase of refinery at Cushing, Okla., for $1,000,000; also with other co-ops bought refinery at McPherson, Kans., and Ohio Cultivator Co., at Bellevue, Ohio; and bought Burkhardt Milling Co. and started to process feed.

1944: Bought $200,000 warehouse at Northwest terminal, Minneapolis.

1945: Organized Northwest Co-op Mills along with Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association, Farmers Union Central Exchange, and Central Cooperative Wholesale.

1946: Bought 21 producing oil wells in Oklahoma. With others helped organize Millers Creek Coal Co-op.

1948: One of three firms in Premier Petroleum Co. with four refineries in Texas and one in Louisiana.

Midland points with pride to a record of $195,642,430 in sales in 25 years and its gross margin of $24,452,671.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, the summary dismissal of General MacArthur is shocking and dictatorial. Before taking any such drastic steps, General MacArthur should have been recalled for consultation with congressional leaders and given the opportunity to present his views in person.

No man in the service of the American Government knows more about the Far East than General MacArthur. No man in current history has done more to secure the safety of our country. No man in our entire history has done so much to establish American prestige in the most important area of the Asiatic world, the islands of Japan.

Dismissing him from his command shakes the confidence of the entire Far East in American policy and destroys what he has built up for the American people during a liftime of devoted, faithful service to our Government, and all that America represents in the world today.

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, on leave to extend my remarks, I want to include several documents pertaining to the action early this morning by the President in relieving General MacArthur of his Far East command. These are important documents and must be carefully considered by every American.

The first document is a statement by the President announcing that he had relieved the general. The second document is his order to General MacArthur relieving him. The third document appoints Lieutenant General Ridgway as General MacArthur's successor. The remaining documents were issued by the White House to indicate the background which made the President's actions imperative. They show that General MacArthur had been fully cognizant of the desires of the President and that in spite of this knowledge he had continued to act without regard for the President's wishes. One group of these releases show that despite the fact that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had proposed armament for the South Korean military forces, General MacArthur had tried to get the arms for the Japanese police forces.

The documents follow:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT, APRIL 10, 1951

With deep regret I have concluded that General of the Army Douglas MacArthur is unable to give his wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and of the United Nations in matters pertaining to his official duties. In view of the specific responsibilities imposed upon me by the Constitution of the United States and the added responsibility which has been entrusted to me by the United Nations, I have decided that I must make a change of command in the Far East. I have, therefore, relieved General MacArthur of his commands and have designated Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway as his successor.

Full and vigorous debate on matters of national policy is a vital element in the constitutional system of our free democracy. It is fundamental, however, that military commanders must be governed by the policies and directives issued to them in the manner provided by our laws and Constitution. In time of crisis, this consideration is particularly compelling.

General MacArthur's place in history as one of our greatest commanders is fully established. The Nation owes him a debt of gratitude for the distinguished and exceptional service which he has rendered his country in posts of great responsibility. For that reason I repeat my regret at the necessity for the action I feel compelled to take in his case.

ORDER TO GENERAL MACARTHUR FROM THE PRESIDENT, APRIL 10, 1951

I deeply regret that it becomes my duty as President and Commander in Chief of the United States military forces to replace you as Supreme Commander, Allied Powers; Commander in Chief, United Nations Command; Commander in Chief, Far East; and Commanding General, United States Army, Far East.

You will turn over your commands, effective at once, to Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway. You are authorized to have issued such orders as are necessary to complete desired travel to such place as you select.

My reasons for your replacement will be made public concurrently with the delivery to you of the foregoing order and are contained in the next following message. (See attached statement by the President.)

APRIL 10, 1951.

ORDER TO LT. GEN. MATTHEW B. RIDGWAY FROM GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

The President has decided to relieve General MacArthur and appoint you as his successor as Supreme Commander, Allied Powers; Commander in Chief, United Nations Command; Commander in Chief, Far East; and Commanding General, United States Army, Far East.

It is realized that your presence in Korea in the immediate future is highly important, but we are sure you can make the proper distribution of your time until you can turn over active command of the Eighth Army to its new commander. For this purpose, Lt. Gen. James A. Van Fleet is en route to report to you for such duties as you may direct.

DECEMBER 6, 1950.

From: Joint Chiefs of Staff.
To: Commander in Chief, Far East, Tokyo, Japan (and Other Commanders).

1. The President, as of December 5, forwarded a memo to all cabinet members and to the chairman, NSRB; administrator, ECA; director, CIA; administrator, ESA; and director Selective Service, which reads as follows:

"In the light of the present critical international situation, and until further written notice from me, I wish that each one of you would take immediate steps to reduce the number of public speeches pertaining to foreign or military policy made by officials of the departments and agencies of the executive branch. This applies to officials in the field as well as those in Washington.

"No speech, press release, or other public statement concerning foreign policy should be released until it has received clearance from the Department of State.

"No speech, press release, or other public statement concerning military policy should be released until it has received clearance from the Department of Defense.

"In addition to the copies submitted to the Departments of State or Defense for clearance, advance copies of speeches and press releases concerning foreign policy or military policy should be submitted to the White House for information.

"The purpose of this memorandum is not to curtail the flow of information to the American people, but rather to insure that the information made public is accurate and fully in accord with the policies of the United States Government."

2. He also forwarded the following to the Secretary of State and Secretary of Defense:

"In addition to the policy expressed in my memorandum of this date to the heads of departments, concerning the clearance of speeches and statements, I wish the following steps to be taken:

"Officials overseas, including military commanders and diplomatic representatives, should be ordered to exercise extreme caution in public statements, to clear all but routine statements with their departments, and to refrain from direct communication on military or foreign policy with newspapers, magazines, or other publicity media in the United States."

3. The above is transmitted to you for guidance and appropriate action.

MARCH 20, 1951.

To: Commander in Chief, Far East, Tokyo, Japan.

From: Joint Chiefs of Staff.

State planning Presidential announcement shortly that, with clearing of bulk of South Korea of aggressors, United Nations now prepared to discuss conditions of settlement in Korea. Strong U. N. feeling persists that further diplomatic effort toward settlement should be made before any advance with major forces north of thirty-eighth parallel. Time will be required to determine diplomatic reactions and permit new negotiations that may develop. Recognizing that parallel has no military significance, State has asked JCS what authority you should have to permit sufficient freedom of action for next few weeks to provide security for U. N. forces and maintain contact with enemy. Your recommendations desired.

[From the New York Times of March 25, 1951]

TEXT OF GENERAL MACARTHUR'S STATEMENT

TOKYO.—Operations continue according to schedule and plan. We have now substantially cleared South Korea of organized Communist forces. It is becoming increasingly evident that the heavy destruction along the enemy's lines of supply, caused by our 'round-the-clock massive air and naval bombardment, has left his troops in the forward battle area deficient in requirements to sustain his operations.

This weakness is being brilliantly exploited by our ground forces. The enemy's human wave tactics definitely failed him as our own forces become seasoned to this form of warfare; his tactics of infiltration are but contributing to his piecemeal losses, and he is showing less stamina than our own troops under rigors of climate, terrain, and battle.

Of even greater significance than our tactical success has been the clear revelation that this new enemy, Red China, of such exaggerated and vaunted military power, lacks the industrial capacity to provide adequately many critical items essential to the conduct of modern war.

He lacks manufacturing bases and those raw materials needed to produce, maintain and operate even moderate air and naval power, and he cannot provide the essentials for successful ground operations, such as tanks, heavy artillery, and other refinements science has introduced into the conduct of military campaigns.

Formerly his great numerical potential might well have filled this gap, but with the development of existing methods of mass destruction, numbers alone do not offset vulnerability inherent in such deficiencies. Control of the sea and air, which in turn means control over supplies, communications and transportation, are no less essential and decisive now than in the past.

When this control exists as in our case and is coupled with the inferiority of ground firepower, as in the enemy's case, the resulting disparity is such that it cannot be overcome by bravery, however fanatical, or the most gross indifference to human loss.

These military weaknesses have been clearly and definitely revealed since Red China entered upon its undeclared war in Korea. Even under inhibitions which now restrict activity of the United Nations forces and the corresponding military advantages which accrue to Red China, it has been shown its complete inability to accomplish by force of arms the conquest of Korea.

The enemy therefore must by now be painfully aware that a decision of the United Nations to depart from its tolerant effort to contain the war to the area of Korea through expansion of our military operations to his coastal areas and interior bases would doom Red China to the risk of imminent military collapse.

These basic facts being established, there should be no insuperable difficulty arriving at decisions on the Korean problem if the issues are resolved on their own merits without being burdened by extraneous matters not directly related to Korea, such as Formosa and China's seat in the United Nations.

The Korean Nation and people which have been so cruelly ravaged must not be sacrificed. That is the paramount concern. Apart from the military area of the problem where the issues are resolved in the course of combat, the fundamental questions continue to be political in nature and must find their answer in the diplomatic sphere.

Within the area of my authority as military commander, however, it should be needless to say I stand ready at any time to confer in the field with the commander in chief of the enemy forces in an earnest effort to find any military means whereby the realization of the political objectives of the United Nations in Korea, to which no nation may justly take exceptions, might be accomplished without further bloodshed.

MARCH 24, 1951.

To: Commander in Chief, Far East, Tokyo, Japan.

From: Joint Chiefs of Staff, personal for MacArthur.

The President has directed that your attention be called to his order as transmitted December 6, 1950. In view of the information given you March 20, 1951, any further statements by you must be coordinated as prescribed in the order of December 6.

The President has also directed that in the event Communist military leaders request an armistice in the field; you immediately report that fact to the JCS for instructions.

JANUARY 4, 1951.

To: Commander in Chief, United Nations Command, Tokyo, Japan.

From: Joint Chiefs of Staff.

1. The problem of arming additional ROK manpower is under consideration by JCS. Following information is furnished:

(a) No machine guns, mortars, antitank guns, or artillery can be made available from the ZI; however, the following can be made available in a reasonably short time:

(1) 160,000 model 1903 rifles, with a backup of spare parts for 50,000.

(2) 70,000 submachine guns.

(3) 150,000 M1 carbines.

(4) 8,000 model 1918 Browning automatic rifles.

(b) Ammunition supply for the M3 submachine guns, the Browning automatic rifles, 100,000 model 1903 rifles, and 100,000 M1 carbines is feasible.

2. Based on availability of above weapons it appears that ROK forces could be increased by from 200,000 to 300,000 men, armed with rifles, automatic rifles, carbines and submachine guns. However, unless used in part to form new divisions, which would be relatively ineffective due to lack of infantry-supporting weapons and artillery, it is probably that only on the order of 75,000 can be effectively utilized initially, with an ultimate build-up to approximately 100,000 in the following type organizations:

(a) Augment the rifle strength of ROK divisions and other U. N. forces.

(b) Form special units for guarding lines of communication and for operations against Communist guerrillas.

(c) Conduct guerrilla operations in Communist-held territory.

3. JCS are of the opinion that recruitment for new units should include, but not be limited to, the membership of the Korean Youth Corps and/or any other group in the ROK. Arms should be issued only to organized units under the control and discipline of the military authorities in Korea.

4. Request your comments and recommendations to include:

(a) Total number of additional ROK personnel that can be profitably employed.

(b) Method of employment, namely, new divisions, additional strength in current divisions, etc.

(c) Length of time required to organize and train additional manpower.

(d) Other points in connection with current problem.

JANUARY 6, 1951.

From: Commander in Chief, Far East, Tokyo, Japan.

To: Department of the Army for the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Considered here that influence of past and possible future events is of importance equal to or greater than matériel availability in analyzing problem of arming additional ROK manpower.

Continued effort has been made since June 25, 1950, to effect the most practicable utilization of Korean personnel. In addition to materially augmenting the ROK army, members of the Youth Corps and other qualified males have been supplied with significant quantities of small arms for the purpose of strengthening police units, antiguerrilla security elements, and creation of special organizations to operate in enemy-held territory. Despite the relatively large number of nonarmy personnel now under arms, enemy guerrilla units continue to operate effectively in many widely scattered regions of South Korea. Friendly guerrilla forces, however, have accomplished little in Communist rear areas—primarily due to lack of strong willed leadership.

The type and quantity of weapons indicated by JCS as being currently available would have equal application to equipping the National Police Reserve of Japan, the immediate requirements for which were stated. Unless the quantities listed in JCS message are in excess of the current and foreseeable needs of the NPRJ, it is possible that the over-all interests of the United States will be better served by making these weapons available to increase the security of Japan rather than arming additional ROK forces.

In view of the probable restricted size of the battlefield in which we may operate in the near future, and the high priority of NPRJ requirements, the value of attempting to organize, train, and arm additional ROK forces in the immediate future appears questionable. It is considered that the short-range requirement can best be met by utilizing available manpower to replace losses in existing ROK units rather than creating new organizations. The long-range requirement for or desirability of arming additional ROK personnel appears to be dependent primarily upon determination of the future United States military position with respect to both the Korean campaign and the generally critical situation in the Far East.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 5, 1951]

LETTER TO REPRESENTATIVE MARTIN OF MASSACHUSETTS

MARCH 20, 1951.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MARTIN: I am most grateful for your note of the 8th forwarding me a copy of your address of February 12. The latter I have read with much interest and find that with the passage of years you have certainly lost none of your old-time punch.

My views and recommendations with respect to the situation created by Red China's entry into war against us in Korea have been submitted to Washington in most complete detail. Generally these views are well known and clearly understood, as they follow the conventional pattern of meeting force with maximum counter force as we have never failed to do in the past. Your view with respect to the utilization of the Chinese forces on Formosa is in conflict with neither logic nor this tradition.

It seems strangely difficult for some to realize that here in Asia is where the Communist conspirators have elected to make their play for global conquest, and that we have joined the issue thus raised on the battlefield; that here we fight Europe's war with arms while the diplomats there still fight it with words; that if we lose the war to communism in Asia the fall of Europe is inevitable, win it and Europe most probably would avoid war and yet preserve freedom. As you point out we must win. There is no substitute for victory.

With renewed thanks and expressions of most cordial regard, I am

Faithfully yours,

DOUGLAS MACARTHUR.

Resolution by City Council of the City of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to direct the attention of the House to the following resolution introduced in the city council of the city of New York by Hon. Edward Vogel, the councilman representing my own district:

Whereas a bill was introduced in the Congress of the United States, H. R. 2156, by Hon. ABRAHAM J. MULTER, Congressman of the Fourteenth New York District, to provide for a Christopher Columbus memorial arbor in the District of Columbia; and

Whereas the act provides, "The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to receive, through the Citizens Committee for a Christopher Columbus Memorial Arbor, donations of 52 trees and 52 bronze plaques each inscribed with the name of one of the States;" and

Whereas the act provides that said row of trees shall be known as the Christopher Columbus memorial arbor; and

Whereas the act further provides that said row of trees shall be maintained by the National Park Service "in honor of Christopher Columbus, the discoverer of America, and as a perpetual tribute to those members of the Armed Forces of the United States who gave their lives in Italy during World War II, for the preservation of freedom in America and the liberation of Italy": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the council of the city of New York, does hereby memorialize the New York delegation of Congress to support this act and does hereby memorialize Congress to enact this measure at its present session.

British Mercenary China Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Chicago Daily News by Jay Franklin:

BRITISH MERCENARY CHINA POLICY

(By Jay Franklin)

American observers recently returned from Britain report that British policy in the Far East is concentrated on the object of collaring as much as possible of the China trade for the benefit of the United Kingdom.

They point out that it was the British officials in Asia who did most to circulate the report that the Chinese Communists were only agrarian reformers and who also did their best to undermine the Nationalist Government of Chiang Kai-shek.

The benefit to Britain promised to be enormous: By underwriting the overthrow of Chiang, the British would not only get the good will of the Communist regime but we would automatically be stripped of the prestige we had earned by liberating China from the Japanese and staking Chiang to control of China.

Chief operating force in this policy is said to have been the famous British shipping and trading concern of Jardine, Matthieson which traditionally is allowed by the foreign office to determine British policy in China.

Hence the bitterness of the British against Chiang's naval blockade of Shanghai until President Truman obligingly compelled Chiang to withdraw his squadron under the pretense of defending Formosa. Hence, too, the fury of the Hong Kong merchants at the American embargo on shipments of contraband of war to that British colony on the China coast.

The Korean war has placed this British policy under a severe strain. American public opinion has no use for a policy of appeasement toward the Chinese Communists. British attempts to persuade us to go slow in Asia have boomeranged against the natural British desire to have us continue to support their military and economic position in Europe.

This is what lies behind the British fuss over whether our forces shall pass the thirty-eighth parallel. Since that imaginary line did not stop the Chinese troops that General Mao poured across the Yalu River last fall, it is hard to see why we should regard it as an obstacle to our military operations, provided, of course, we can get north of it again.

Truth is, the fight we have put up in Korea has increased our prestige in Asia, and since trade follows military prestige as day follows night, the problem that confronts London has become more difficult. Before the game is played out, the British may decide that they let themselves be played for suckers by the Chinese Reds in the hope of lining their commercial pockets at our expense.

Committee of One Hundred, of Birmingham, Ala.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am including an article on a very important job that is being done in my district.

It is with pride as a member of the Committee of One Hundred, of Birmingham, Ala., that I insert the following news story in the RECORD. This article, by Birmingham News staff writer Robert Kincey, tells of the awakened community spirit abroad in our district as a result of the fine work of the Committee of One Hundred in a campaign to promote our area. We owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Clarence B. Hanson, Jr., chairman of the Committee of One Hundred, and William P. Engle, president of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, who were in Washington with us today in connection with this challenging project. We are also indebted to their coworkers at home, Clarence Lloyd, committee director; Hugh Bigler, executive vice president of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce; and W. W. French, Jr., chairman of the campaign which has far exceeded at this time the $552,362 raised at the time the following story was written:

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) News of April 8, 1951]

THEY'LL TELL THE WORLD—COMMITTEE OF ONE HUNDRED, ARMED WITH $552,362, TO "SELL" BIRMINGHAM—CAMPAIGN GOES OVER TOP AND KEEPS RIGHT ON GOING

(By Robert W. Kincey)

Birmingham's Committee of One Hundred was all armed Saturday night for the biggest game hunt Alabama has ever known.

They're going to beat the bushes from Maine to California and from the Gulf to the Lakes in a Nation-wide advertising and promotion campaign for which business, industry, and individuals of Jefferson County have made a cool $552,362 available.

And in setting a record for the community with the most spectacular successful campaign of all time, the committee stands ready to tell the world:

"That's typical of the way it's done in Birmingham."

This is a city, they will point out from the records, that doesn't fail in its own undertakings. What it starts it finishes.

That's the way it is in Birmingham; the way it will be for those who get themselves a slice of the biggest cake ever to be cut in the community.

SHORTEST, SWEETEST

The campaign is far and away over the top, with pledges still coming in, most of them on a voluntary basis.

The campaign, the shortest and sweetest in the history of the community, has shattered every box-office record Birmingham and Jefferson County have ever known.

And it's going to play an extended engagement because of popular demand.

The advisory committee of the Committee of One Hundred will hold open house at the chamber of commerce for all who want to ride the bandwagon, but, thus far, had not been able to get a seat.

The standing-room-only sign was hung up Friday while the committee solicitors and the auditing staff were counting the cash and rounding up eleventh-hour prospects.

OVER TOP, FOR SURE

"The drive is definitely and measurably over the top," said W. W. French, Jr., chairman. "But we cannot and we will not close the door in the face of these firms and individuals who have not had an opportunity to participate. It is their town as much as it is ours. We've already set what looks like a national record in such undertakings. We might as well make it even more spectacular."

To which Clarence B. Hanson, Jr., chairman of the Committee of One Hundred, and William P. Engel, president of the chamber of commerce, added:

"The more money we get, the better job we can and will do. This community effort has attracted Nation-wide attention. It is unequaled, so far as we know, in the history of American cities. It is a magnificent tribute to the awakened spirit of Birmingham and its Jefferson County neighbors.

"This is not and never has been a campaign in the ordinary sense of the word. It is a demonstration that the people of this great county are determined to exploit to the fullest the fabulous resources in these rugged hills and valleys."

PURE INVESTMENT

"This national advertising fund is exactly what we have emphasized from the start. It is not a contribution to pay someone's salary down at the chamber of commerce. It is not a contribution of any sort. It is a cold dollars-and-cents investment in Birmingham and Jefferson County.

"And to the everlasting credit of Birmingham and its neighboring communities, we have reached the point where we have put aside petty differences and jealousies and can pull together for the utmost development of the greatest county in all the land.

"The response has been so enthusiastic, spontaneous, and contagious it is amazing. There is a new spirit abroad in Jefferson County today. This most sensational of all campaigns is ample testimonial to that.

"Birmingham and Jefferson County now have no records to break but their own. We invite every citizen, every firm, and every industry to participate. We could scarcely do less in view of the tremendous and heartwarming response. Nothing even approaching it has ever happened in this community before."

WHEELS ARE ROLLING

And the wheels of the advertising campaign already have started to roll, even while the money continues to come in.

Approved yesterday afternoon was an advertisement in the New York Times to tell the world what Birmingham has done. Press associations were asking for the story before the money had been counted. They are that much interested in what the biggest city on earth for its age has done, the like of which probably never has been done before.

It all started a year ago in January when the now famous Committee of One Hundred came into being at a meeting at the Tutwiler Hotel.

That meeting was remarkable for the fact that not a man declined his appointment. The committee rolled up a collective sleeve and went to work. And 1950 was a spectacular year in Birmingham. Mr. Engel, a member of the original Committee of One Hundred, assumed the presidency of the Chamber of Commerce a year later.

Subsequently he made his talk-of-the-town "Hold That Steel" address to the Kiwanis Club. That address, which had repercussions over the length and breadth of the land, further fired the imagination and the enthusiasm of the entire county.

THINGS ARE POPPING

Mr. Engel then and there predicted nothing but the district's ineptitude stood between it and a population of 1,000,000 by 1970. He envisioned great things for the district. And those things have started to happen.

Not the least of which, the city's leaders are agreed, is the half million campaign. There was scarcely a "no" to an assigned quota to business firms or individuals. There was hardly a suggestion that an assigned quota be lowered. There were many instances in which they were voluntarily raised.

Nest egg for the $500,000 advertising fund came from the Alabama Power Co., whose board chairman, Thomas W. Martin, swept the annual meeting of the chamber of commerce off its feet in January when he said Alabama Power Co. would make available $100,000 of a half million dollar fund to advertise the district nationally provided the community raised $400,000, payable over a 5-year period.

Mr. Engel then and there accepted the challenge. The campaign was carefully mapped. First meeting was a week ago Friday. Solicitors did not take the field until Monday afternoon of last week.

They found many ardent Birmingham boosters out of the city. Others still have to clear the matter through regular routine. All that is to be taken into account when the effort is stamped "finis" and the books closed.

OTHERS CHIME IN

Illustrative of the country-wide enthusiasm was a quick announcement that the Bessemer Chamber of Commerce would heartily join hands with Birmingham and put $25,000 in the pot.

Along came the Tarrant Chamber of Commerce with $5,000 and the Fairfield Chamber of Commerce with another $7,500, all unsolicited.

From the Shades Valley Chamber of Commerce Saturday came pledge cards bearing the signatures of every merchant in Homewood.

And that's the reason it's a county-wide proposition and an extended engagement has been ordered. So that everybody who wants in on a good thing can do it and do it to his heart's content.

Removal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement regarding the removal of General MacArthur:

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN RALPH W. GWINN, OF NEW YORK, REGARDING REMOVAL OF GENERAL MACARTHUR

MacArthur has been busted out with Wedemeyer, Chennault, Hurley, Denfeld, and Cromelin, because our own popular-front Communist-dominated Government does not really want to win the war in Korea. It refuses to answer MacArthur's questions on that point. He has asked for the help of the 2,000,000 men now in China and Korea. He asked for the help of the Japanese. Our Government refused. It would not even feed and supply 400,000 reservists now in training camps in Korea to relieve the pressure on our own boys, fighting and dying in Korea.

Thus the program mapped out by Alger Hiss and Owen Lattimore in 1945 to deliver the Asiatic people to godless communism is working out according to plan. They destroyed Chiang Kai-shek and his forces. They are determined to destroy Syngman Rhee and leave him no organized forces against communism.

Now with MacArthur out of the way Red China can be added to the family of nations and Formosa delivered to it. What is more with MacArthur out of Japan the floodgates are open to the organization of the Communist Party there. The Japanese people who made such a magnificent recovery under MacArthur—in fact all of the forces of freedom, have been let down into what looks like a red sea surrounding the whole of Asia.

This conduct of our foreign affairs in Asia and the refusal to give MacArthur help throws light on the European situation. We are sending ground forces to Europe to fight unequal ground forces from Russia. The commander in chief of these forces in Europe speaks freely as a military and political leader on both military and political subjects without censure. MacArthur confined his remarks to military affairs and was busted for that alone. Will our popular-front Communist-dominated Government in European policy deliver our forces in Europe to Moscow in the same way it has delivered them in Asia? This is the terrifying question growing out of the MacArthur incident.

Possibly nothing short of the setting of the stage for impeachment proceedings will bring out the tragic corruption in the management of our foreign affairs. It greatly exceeds our domestic corruption and its consequences are more damaging. Out of such a proceeding the people might organize an honest Government and offset the notion in the Kremlin that America will not fight communism at home, in Asia or in Europe.

It is depressing beyond words that the Communist-dominated government in Britain was ready to blast the news, almost before we got it, that the victory had been won—MacArthur was out—Red China would be recognized and Formosa delivered to it.

Our Country, MacArthur, Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that the Republicans, having no issue with which to go before the American people, are stopping at nothing to gain some publicity in the hope that it may aid them in the 1952 campaign. In their conference this morning called by the minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], they saw fit to criticize the President's action in relieving MacArthur of his imperialistic and czarish activities and are making a political issue of it. Some of the Republican newspapers, of course, will hail this attack against the President with glee. However, I feel that the Republicans have overplayed their hand as to impeachment. I did not quite gather from the verbal explanation of the statement given me today whether it was the impeachment of MacArthur or the President that was suggested. Perhaps, if any action is to be taken, it should be a court martial of General MacArthur for deliberately and willfully disobeying orders of his superiors.

Mr. Speaker, now, who is General MacArthur about whom there is such a hullabaloo? I recall that in 1932 former servicemen came to Washington to plead with President Hoover and the administration for food and relief. These veterans, without funds either for cheap hotel accommodations or rooming quarters, were obliged to sleep in the parks or on Government properties in the vicinity of the Capitol and the Mall, and it was President Hoover who gave orders to move them from the premises they occupied. General MacArthur, head of the Military District of Washington, brought Fort Myer troops to effect their dispersal. When some of the veterans did not move fast enough, it was General MacArthur who issued orders to fire. Instead of obtaining work or bread they sought, he fed them with lead. Several were killed, one from my congressional district, and many were wounded.

Several of the large Republican newspapers have been building up General MacArthur as a great general and a legendary figure in military prowess. I, myself, have known him only from the time that he was part of the drastic and outrageous action against Gen. Billy Mitchell who ventured the opinion in an address or magazine article that airplanes could destroy battleships. The resulting court martial and his forced resignation from the Air Force hastened General Mitchell's death. Congress posthumously elevated him to the rank of a general officer.

Today our President, after long and careful consideration given to the problem, has finally removed Five Star Gen. Douglas MacArthur from all Far East commands.

This action on the part of the President has been long awaited by the country and is long overdue. It is elementary that a private who disobeys his commanding officer may be court martialed, and if found guilty, will be dismissed for the good of the service.

The President's statement clearly sets forth the necessity for taking action. It follows in part:

> With deep regret I have concluded that General of the Army Douglas MacArthur is unable to give his wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and of the United Nations in matters pertaining to his official duties.
> Full and vigorous debate on matters of national policy is a vital element in the constitutional system of our free democracy. It is fundamental, however, that military commanders must be governed by the policies and directives issued to them in the manner provided by our laws and Constitution. In time of crisis, this consideration is particularly compelling.

Now let us briefly take up the President's reasons. We must remember that the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the United States military forces and keep this fact in mind throughout the discussion. We must not let our bias and prejudice make us forget this paramount constitutional provision.

I stated before that the private who disobeys his commanding officer is subject to court martial and dismissal if not death, depending on the situation. Let us take MacArthur's case, for, after all, his is a case just like that of the doughboy, the corporal, or the sergeant.

The statement "Formosa Must Be Defended," which MacArthur made and sent to the national convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars in Chicago last September, was certainly one calculated and designed to stir up contention and controversy in the country. It was not his prerogative nor within his official duties as a military man to talk about "misconceptions currently voiced concerning the relationship of Formosa to our strategic potential in the Pacific," nor was he required "in the public interest to avail myself of this opportunity to state my views thereon."

Did he not consider for one moment that as the leader of the United Nations military forces, he was also subject to the requirements of the diplomatic and military considerations which devolved only upon that body and its officials?

Was it proper, becoming, and wise for him, in the same message, to continue in the following view:

> Nothing could be more fallacious than the threadbare arguments by those who advocate appeasement and defeatism in the Pacific that if we defend Formosa, we alienate continental Asia.

And following in further critical language against administration policies:

> Those who speak thus do not understand the Orient.

Only the general understands the Orient. The President does not know what is going on there, the State Department, and the other agencies of the Government, with their various officials who have been in the Orient for many years, who have been studying and are intimately acquainted with these questions, do not know what is going on. The astute orientals who form part of the United Nations—they, too, know nothing about the Orient, although they have lived with their problems during a lifetime—they also do not understand though they themselves are orientals.

And then, as if to further embarrass those directing our policies in the Far East, MacArthur grows more sarcastic and belligerent when he states that—

> They do not grasp that it is in the pattern of oriental psychology to respect and follow aggressive, resolute, and dynamic leadership to quickly turn from a leadership characterized by timidity or vacillation—and they underestimate the oriental mentality.

Now, I ask, under what process of logical reasoning could any fair-minded aid unbiased thinking person come to the conclusion that MacArthur was within his rights as a military man, commanding military forces, to make and publish these observations? All the Veterans of Foreign Wars asked MacArthur to do was to extend greetings in response to those sent him by the organization.

Now if this were MacArthur's first outburst on the subject, we might pass it off as coming from a soldier under constant and steady pressure letting off steam. But no; this not the case of a first time.

In December of 1949 the general, surrounded by his Republican friends, a group of Republican Senators visiting in Tokyo, divested himself of some unauthorized remarks concerning sending United States arms and troops to Formosa. As a result, heated debates were touched off in Congress between the partisan minded Formosan interventionists and the administration supporters—all of which, it is clear, had nothing to do with MacArthur's duties and responsibility as a military commander of troops of all nations, including our own in the Far East. Of course the Republicans howled and cried out that the general was gagged by the administration which they charged was keeping the truth from the American people. If ever a man deserved a reprimand certainly MacArthur deserved that one.

It may have escaped the memory of some, but certainly not mine, that just about a year ago, the general, with no reason at all for being in Formosa—no doubt for the purpose of giving greater publicity to his position in regard to Formosa—allowed himself to be photographed kissing the hand of Madame Chiang Kai-shek. She is the wife of a general allegedly the most questionable of all Chinese war overlords. At the same time he publicly supported the policy of building Formosa as a base of operations. Again MacArthur knew full well at the time he made the statement that he was running at cross purposes with the Government's position. Yet he chose to sound off regardless of the consequences which his unauthorized remarks might produce, since he considers himself the sole authority both in matters military and diplomatic relating to the Orient, and more than often on subjects covering the entire world.

We all remember shortly after the incident of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, that MacArthur himself met on Wake Island with W. Averell Harriman, who acted as the President's special representative, and agreed implicitly that he would refrain from making declarations on policy unless he received Washington clearance. He broke his promise. Why? I will develop that later because I want to bring to your attention the hostile attitude which he demonstrated toward the President, his Commander in Chief, shortly after the Harriman conference on the occasion of the President's special visit to MacArthur on Wake Island. The press reports told us that MacArthur arrived late for the meeting, failed to accord the proper courtesy he owed the office of his superior and, most important of all, had neglected to prepare himself for the conference, with experts and others who might supplement his, MacArthur's, views. The newspapers further reported that the President believing this an important meeting, for he had traveled thousands of miles under great physical inconvenience, had brought with him the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and a number of experts on the Far East for discussional purposes. Nevertheless, the President came away from the short meeting, no doubt planned for a longer period, apparently satisfied that General MacArthur would stay "hitched" to his military duties.

Another disagreement came to light as a result of last November's dash into Northern Korea which resulted in disastrous UN military defeat and, instead of "Home by Christmas" which he had publicly proclaimed to the troops, we are still in Korea and have been obliged to send additional troops and replacements. We are informed that on several occasions prior to this march to the Manchurian border, he had been officially informed that the Chinese were massed for attack and that warnings from the French, from India, and the British had come to him to the same effect. Yet he went on his own and incurred severe losses in men and equipment as well as causing loss of our prestige among the Asiatics and in the United Nations. I believe this action might have had an appreciable effect upon the fall elections.

It is further reported that on the occasion of the State Department's public statement assuring the Chinese that the large dams supplying water and power to Manchuria would not be bombed, MacArthur cabled a curt "Do not concur."

And, as if all these headstrong and unwise actions were not sufficient to overturn our Nation's policy to contain the war in Korea and avoid a general war in China with its terrific and disastrous consequences, we find the general divesting himself of a most incendiary statement, namely, that sent a few days ago to the minority leader of the House, Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

It is beyond my comprehension that such a letter containing so much dynamite and calculated to upset the equilibrium of our diplomatic course should have been made public. It could only serve to do harm wherever and whenever it might be publicized in view of the nature of the writing.

First. It was unauthorized and was in the nature of a special pleading—a pleading for the MacArthur cause to win the war in the Far East at all costs and unmindful of the over-all position in Europe and of the world.

Second. It was political in nature—its only purpose being to choose up sides and bring on a highly controversial subject, the discussion of which would be harmful to and create disunity in the country.

Third. Militarily, the use of National Chinese troops to fight the Chinese Communists would not necessarily bring victory and would, of course, involve us in an all-out war, which the President and the Nation are seeking to avoid, and thereby bringing about a lasting and enduring world-wide peace.

Mr. Speaker, I have many interesting and factual newspaper articles and editorials which have appeared in impartial and independent publications which have the real interest of our country's welfare at heart. However, I do not wish to unduly encumber the record by inserting all of them, but under the leave given me to extend my remarks I shall include an editorial entitled "Mac and Political Policy," which appeared in the April 8 issue of the Chicago Sun-Times, an outstanding metropolitan daily. This editorial, in all likelihood, together with other forceful articles and editorials appearing in the press throughout the country express the views and opinions of the vast majority of the people of our Nation, and contributed in some degree in aiding the President to reach the conclusion that he should demand the resignation of General MacArthur. The editorial is as follows:

MAC AND POLITICAL POLICY

We have called frequent attention to a saying of Clemenceau, French "Tiger" of World War I and Versailles, to the effect that war is too important a business to be left to the generals.

That's a good maxim for any democracy which is unfortunate enough to be engaged in war, as we are in Korea at this moment. Nobody likes war, least of all the people who live in a democracy. When the people of a real democracy engage in war, it is only to preserve their free way of life. They have no aggressive designs, no lust for conquest.

The American people want to avoid a general war with China—or any other country. But powerful forces are moving to bring on such a conflagration, intentionally or not. Senator TAFT, Senate Republican chief, and House GOP Leader MARTIN have joined the parade. MARTIN was first, advocating in a recent speech that Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist troops be used to open a second front on the Chinese mainland. TAFT jumped into line yesterday, urging that Chiang's forces be let loose to conduct raids on the mainland.

Ostensibly, either action would relieve Red Chinese pressure in Korea. But realistically, either maneuver could easily fan the Korean action into a major war before the free world is strong enough to fight such a war.

There was a big wave of excitement the other day when General MacArthur told MARTIN that he was right. Actually, MacArthur himself for a long time has been agitating for a big push aimed at the heart of China. MARTIN and other Republican lawmakers in Washington who have been spouting that line are merely following MacArthur's lead.

They are pleased to do so, not because they really want more war—for most of those Republicans are isolationists—but because they feel it is one way of embarrassing the Truman administration. They think that pitting MacArthur against President Truman is sound policies in the year preceding the 1952 Presidential election.

Administration policy, which is the official policy of the United States, is to keep the war in the Far East localized in Korea if at all possible. The policy also places the greater stress on rearming Western Europe and helping defend it against possible Communist aggression.

Along with most American military experts and diplomats, Mr. Truman and Secretary Acheson believe that the grand prize in Russia's eyes is not the conquest of Asia at this moment. The consensus is that what Russia wants is Iranian oil and the rich industrial plant of Western Europe to produce the steel and the machines of war needed for Soviet domination of the world.

MacArthur does not agree. He is far away from Europe and contends that the world stands at the crossroads in Asia. He says that if Asia is lost, Western Europe is bound to be easy prey for the Russians. He apparently believes that all Russia needs is the raw materials of Asia rather than the industrial might of Western Europe.

MacArthur sees only one side of the world picture. Certainly the raw materials of Asia are as vital to us as they are to Russia and should be kept out of Communist hands if possible. But there is a difference between the policy of keeping the Communists pent up where they now are and the MacArthur proposal to throw Communists out of huge land masses that they now occupy.

We do not blame MacArthur unduly for his zeal in his cause. Any good general—and MacArthur is a great general—wants to win the war on his front. That is the job of a professional soldier.

But it should be part of the job of a professional soldier serving under the flag of a democracy to respect our institutions and traditions. One of those traditions is that military authority is subordinate to civilian authority. Our civilian authorities make the political decisions in times of war and our military authorities do their best to carry out those decisions.

If MacArthur wants to belabor the political decisions which have been made by our civilian authorities, we believe he has a perfect right to do so—as a civilian.

But so long as he remains as commander of the United Nations forces in Korea he should address his political statements and views to UN officials and to Mr. Truman.

MacArthur's stature is hurt when he engages in subterfuge and ruse in an attempt to get across a political point.

Government Waste

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, the administration is spending considerable time in trying to find a new source of tax revenue. On the other hand, little effort is being made to curtail expenditures. The handling of veterans' hospitals is a national scandal, and in southern California we have a fine example of that. We all know how the Birmingham Veterans' Administration Hospital in Van Nuys was closed in May 1950 and moved to Long Beach merely to help a Democratic Congressman. Now, since the Navy needs a hospital in Long Beach, the Navy intends to build another one instead of the Veterans' Administration moving back and reactivating the Birmingham hospital which is not in use.

I am attaching a letter from Mayor Bowron, of Los Angeles, calling my attention to that very matter:

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
Los Angeles, Calif., April 4, 1951.

Hon. NORRIS POULSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN POULSON: It has come to my attention that consideration is being given to the construction of a new naval hospital building in Long Beach.

As you may recall, I registered a protest in behalf of the citizens of Los Angeles against the closing of the Birmingham Veterans' Administration Hospital in Van Nuys in May 1950, and the moving of several hundred patients to the present naval hospital in Long Beach, allegedly for reasons of economy.

Now it is proposed to build another hospital in Long Beach for the Navy, with the Veterans' Administration continuing to use the present naval hospital, which is not equipped to provide for paraplegics or tubercular patients.

Would it not be more logical and economical to return the present Long Beach hospital to the Navy Department and remodel the Birmingham hospital in Van Nuys, a site which is ideally suited for the treatment and care of paraplegics and those suffering from respiratory conditions? It is believed that this would accomplish the desired objectives at a considerable saving to the Government and with greater consideration for the needs of the veterans.

I strongly urge that you do all in your power to bring about this suggested change in planning for Federal hospitals in the Los Angeles metropolitan area.

Sincerely yours,

FLETCHER BOWRON, Mayor.

Some Questions, Mr. Andrews

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times for Tuesday, April 3, 1951:

SOME QUESTIONS, MR. ANDREWS

Mr. BERT ANDREWS,
Gridiron Speaker, Memorial Union.

DEAR MR. ANDREWS: As principal speaker at the gridiron banquet tonight, you will undoubtedly discuss some of the aspects of the current Washington scene as it relates to the newspaper profession. We wonder if you will touch upon a point which has lately disturbed us.

For years the organizations which are supposed to be the spokesmen for the profession of journalism have been pinning medals on themselves as the unswerving defenders of a free press. The American Publishers' Association, the Inland Press, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, the Associated Press, and the others gather at their periodic conventions, roll their eyes, beat their stuffed shirts, and intone their solemn vows to uphold and defend freedom of the press. They talk sanctimoniously of their sacred obligation to guard against any invasion of the freedom of the press.

For all this preening and strutting, for all the loud and brave talk, it has become increasingly apparent in the last decade that the American press is abdicating its responsibility to fight for a truly free press in America. Its spokesmen recite the pompous clichés of the past and rededicate themselves to defending freedom of the press in the abstract. But when they face a specific case of a dangerous assault on the free press, they are indifferent or are busy throwing editorial thunderbolts at some violation of the right of a free press in a far away Afghanistan or Argentina.

We are currently witnessing a typical example of this. The outrageous silencing of La Prensa by the Argentine Dictator Peron is engaging the attention of the American press. But when the same kind of an assault is made on the freedom of the press in this country a brooding silence lies over the editorial rooms of our big newspapers.

We refer to the assault made on Drew Pearson by Senator JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin. In the 40 years of our newspaper experience we have not seen a more dangerous attempt to subvert the freedom of the press than was made by the political mountebank who now serves this State in the United States Senate.

We saw in this assault an attempt on the part of MCCARTHY to use the power of his place in the United States Senate and the privilege of his immunity to destroy a newspaperman with whose views he disagreed. Hiding behind the official immunity granted him by the Government of the United States he sought to silence Pearson by smearing his reputation and by calling for a boycott against Pearson by radio sponsors and newspaper publishers.

What is the difference between his technique and that employed by Peron? Both seek to use government power for their ends. Peron to destroy La Prensa. MCCARTHY to destroy Pearson.

If MCCARTHY can use the power of his public office in this way, then every other member of the United States Senate can do likewise. If every Member of the Senate can use this type of terrorism, then every Member of the House of Representatives can use the power of his office to silence newspapers and newspapermen who disagree with them. Members of the State legislatures can do the same. The fruits of McCarthyism are already ripening in the Wisconsin Legislature where we see the watch fob McCarthy's following the Senator's lead in their irresponsible and slanderous attacks on people with whom they disagree.

If McCarthyism goes unchallenged, then officialdom, the Government, has found the way to use the Peron technique in silencing the radio and the press in the United States. Think what it would mean if every Member of Congress and every member of every State legislature, operating from foxholes of legislative immunity, could attack and urge a boycott of every newspaperman or radio commentator who criticized a Member of Congress or a legislator. Today we are witnessing a trend in which McCarthyism is using a system of political terrorism and intimidation to establish a system of thought control and conformity. McCarthyism may be the forerunner of a totalitarianism which will be a threat to the American free way of life. And the American press continues to remain silent in the face of this dangerous assault.

MCCARTHY is a politician who has shown nothing but contempt for the laws and traditions of this State, whose veracity has been publicly challenged by the State supreme court, who has been charged by his profession and found guilty by the highest court of violating the laws and the constitution, the moral code, and his oath as an attorney and a judge. This is the kind of a man who can make a dangerous attack on a basic American freedom and go unchallenged by the press of this country.

None of the organizations which are supposed to speak for the press has challenged the McCarthy assault on Pearson. None of the spokesmen for the schools of journalism, which are supposed to be teaching our students their future responsibilities as custodians of the traditions of the free press, have spoken out against the dangerous precedent set by MCCARTHY in his demand for a boycott against an American writer and radio commentator.

This dereliction of responsibility and this spineless surrender to the loud-mouth demagogs promoting the current hysteria has sickened us of these publishers pow-wows, journalistic banquets, and gridiron shindigs at which the professionals get together for an orgy of undeserved self-praise.

It was in 1948, Mr. Andrews, that you won the Pulitzer price and the Heywood Broun memorial award for your splendid expose of the Washington witch hunting which, given new life by the lies of MCCARTHY, has made a cowardly cabal out of a great profession. What about you, Mr. Andrews? Have you got the stamina to stand up like you did in 1948 or does MCCARTHY have you joining the ranks of conformity, too?

Have you got the courage to tell the newspaper people in Wisconsin what they need to hear or will you speak from under the bed and tell them what they want to hear? Will you tell them that McCarthyism is a dangerous threat to a free press and a free radio?

Sincerely yours,

THE CAPITAL TIMES.

Post Office in Lawrence, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 3, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to authorize the construction of a Federal building in the city of Lawrence

Whereas the city of Lawrence is sorely in need of increased post-office facilities; and

Whereas the presently existing building housing the post office in said city is inadequate for the purposes of said office and for the offices of other agencies of the Federal Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts memorializes the Congress of the United States to authorize the construction of a new Federal building in the city of Lawrence to house the post office and other Federal offices; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith by the state secretary to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officer of each branch of Congress, and to Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

In senate, adopted March 28, 1951.

IRVING N. HAYDEN, Clerk.

In house of representatives, adopted in concurrence April 2, 1951.

LAWRENCE R. GROVE, Clerk.

A true copy.
Attest:

EDWARD J. CRONIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The President's Radio Address on Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the text of a radio address by the President of the United States:

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S RADIO ADDRESS ON KOREA, UNITED STATES FAR EASTERN POLICY

I want to talk plainly to you tonight about what we are doing in Korea and about our policy in the Far East.

In the simplest terms what we are doing in Korea is this: We are trying to prevent a third world war.

I think most people in this country recognized that fact last June. And they warmly supported the decision of the Government to help the Republic of Korea against the Communist aggressors. Now, many persons, even some who applauded our decision to defend Korea, have forgotten the basic reason for our action.

It is right for us to be in Korea. It was right last June. It is right today.

I want to remind you why this is true.

The Communists in the Kremlin are engaged in a monstrous conspiracy to stamp out freedom all over the world. If they were to succeed, the United States would be numbered among their principal victims. It must be clear to everyone that the United States cannot—and will not—sit idly by and await foreign conquest. The only question is: When is the best time to meet the threat and how?

The best time to meet the threat is in the beginning. It is easier to put out a fire in the beginning when it is small than after it has become a roaring blaze.

And the best way to meet the threat of aggression is for the peace-loving nations to act together. If they don't act together, they are likely to be picked off, one by one.

ASSAILS INACTION OF THIRTIES

If they had followed the right policies in the 1930's—if the free countries had acted together, to crush the aggression of the dictators, and if they had acted in the beginning, when the aggression was small—there probably would have been no World War II.

If history has taught us anything, it is that aggression anywhere in the world is a threat to peace everywhere in the world. When that aggression is supported by the cruel and selfish rulers of a powerful nation who are bent on conquest, it becomes a clear and present danger to the security and independence of every free nation.

This is a lesson that most people in this country have learned thoroughly. This is the basic reason why we joined in creating the United Nations. And, since the end of World War II, we have been putting that lesson into practice—we have been working with other free nations to check the aggressive designs of the Soviet Union before they can result in a third world war.

That is what we did in Greece, when that nation was threatened by the aggression of international communism.

The attack against Greece could have led to general war. But this country came to the aid of Greece. The United Nations supported Greek resistance. With our help, the determination and efforts of the Greek people defeated the attack on the spot.

Another big Communist threat to peace was the Berlin blockade. That, too, could have led to war. But again it was settled because free men would not back down in an emergency.

The aggression against Korea is the boldest and most dangerous move the Communists have yet made.

The attack on Korea was part of a greater plan for conquering all of Asia.

I would like to read to you from a secret intelligence report which came to us after the attack. It is a report of a speech a Communist Army officer in North Korea gave to a group of spies and saboteurs last May, one month before South Korea was invaded. The report shows in great detail how this invasion was part of a carefully prepared plot. Here is part of what the Communist officer, who had been trained in Moscow, told his men:

"Our forces," he said, "are scheduled to attack South Korean forces about the middle of June . . . The coming attack on South Korea marks the first step toward the liberation of Asia."

Notice that he used the word "liberation." That is Communist double-talk meaning "conquest."

QUOTES ANOTHER SECRET REPORT

I have another secret intelligence report here. This one tells what another Communist officer in the Far East told his men several months before the invasion of Korea. Here is what he said: "In order to successfully undertake the long awaited world revolution, we must first unify Asia . . . Java, Indochina, Malaya, India, Tibet, Thailand, Philippines, and Japan are our ultimate targets . . . The United States is the only obstacle on our road for the liberation of all countries in Southeast Asia. In other words, we must unify the people of Asia and crush the United States."

That is what the Communist leaders are telling their people, and that is what they have been trying to do.

They want to control all Asia from the Kremlin.

This plan of conquest is in flat contradiction to what we believe. We believe that Korea belongs to the Koreans, that India belongs to the Indians—that all the nations of Asia should be free to work out their affairs in their own way. This is the basis of peace in the Far East and everywhere else.

The whole Communist imperialism is back of the attack on peace in the Far East. It was the Soviet Union that trained and equipped the North Koreans for aggression. The Chinese Communists massed 44 well-trained and well-equipped divisions on the Korean frontier. These were the troops they threw into battle when the North Korean Communists were beaten.

The question we have had to face is whether the Communist plan of conquest can be stopped without general war. Our Government and other countries associated with us in the United Nations believe that the best chance of stopping it without war is to meet the attack in Korea and defeat it there.

That is what we have been doing. It is a difficult and bitter task.

But so far it has been successful.

So far, we have prevented world war III.

So far, by fighting a limited war in Korea, we have prevented aggression from succeeding, and bringing on a general war. And the ability of the whole free world to resist Communist aggression has been greatly improved.

SAYS FOES HAVE RECEIVED LESSON

We have taught the enemy a lesson. He has found out that aggression is not cheap or easy. Moreover, men all over the world who want to remain free have been given new courage and new hope. They know now that the champions of freedom can stand up and fight and that they will stand up and fight.

Our resolute stand in Korea is helping the forces of freedom now fighting in Indochina and other countries in that part of the world. It has already slowed down the timetable of conquest.

In Korea itself, there are signs that the enemy is building up his ground forces for a new mass offensive. We also know that there have been large increases in the enemy's available air forces.

If a new attack comes, I feel confident it will be turned back. The United Nations fighting forces are tough and able and well equipped. They are fighting for a just cause. They are proving to all the world that the principle of collective security will work. We are proud of all these forces for the magnificent job they have done against heavy odds. We pray that their efforts may succeed, for upon their success may hinge the peace of the world.

The Communist side must now choose its course of action. The Communist rulers may press the attack against us. They may take further action which will spread the conflict. They have that choice, and with it the awful responsibility for what may follow. The Communists also have the choice of a peaceful settlement which could lead to a general relaxation of tensions in the Far East. The decision is theirs, because the forces of the United Nations will strive to limit the conflict if possible.

We do not want to see the conflict in Korea extended. We are trying to prevent a world war—not to start one. The best way to do that is to make it plain that we and the other free countries will continue to resist the attack.

But you may ask, why can't we take other steps to punish the aggressor? Why don't we bomb Manchuria and China itself? Why don't we assist Chinese Nationalist troops to land on the mainland of China?

POINTS TO RISK OF WORLD WAR

If we were to do these things we would be running a very grave risk of starting a general war. If that were to happen, we would have brought about the exact situation we are trying to prevent.

If we were to do these things we would become entangled in a vast conflict on the continent of Asia and our task would become immeasurably more difficult all over the world.

What would suit the ambitions of the Kremlin better than for our military forces to be committed to a full-scale war with Red China?

It may well be that, in spite of our best efforts, the Communists may spread the war. But it would be wrong—tragically wrong—for us to take the initiative in extending the war.

The dangers are great. Make no mistake about it. Behind the North Koreans and Chinese Communists in the front lines stand additional millions of Chinese soldiers. And behind the Chinese stand the tanks, the planes, the submarines, the soldiers, and the scheming rulers of the Soviet Union.

Our aim is to avoid the spread of the conflict.

The course we have been following is the one best calculated to avoid an all-out war. It is the course consistent that our obligation to do all we can to maintain international peace and security. Our experience in Greece and Berlin shows that it is the most effective course of action we can follow.

First of all, it is clear that our efforts in Korea can blunt the will of the Chinese Communists to continue the struggle. The United Nations forces have put up a tremendous fight in Korea and have inflicted very heavy casualties on the enemy. Our forces are stronger now than they have been before. These are plain facts which may discourage the Chinese Communists from continuing their attack.

Second, the free world as a whole is growing in military strength every day. In the United States, in Western Europe, and throughout the world, freemen are alert to the Soviet threat and are building their defenses. This may discourage the Communist rulers from continuing the war in Korea—and from undertaking new acts of aggression elsewhere.

ASSERTS DOOR TO PEACE IS OPEN

If the Communist authorities realize they cannot defeat us in Korea, if they realize it would be foolhardy to widen the hostilities beyond Korea, then they may recognize the folly of continuing their aggression. A peaceful settlement may then be possible. The door is always open.

Then we may achieve a settlement in Korea which will not compromise the principles and purposes of the United Nations.

I have thought long and hard about this question of extending the war in Asia. I have discussed it many times with the ablest military advisers in the country. I believe with all my heart that the course we are following is the best course.

I believe that we must try to limit the war to Korea for these vital reasons: To make sure that the precious lives of our fighting men are not wasted; to see that the security of our country and the free world is not needlessly jeopardized; and to prevent a third world war.

A number of events have made it evident that General MacArthur did not agree with that policy. I have, therefore, considered it essential to relieve General MacArthur so that there would be no doubt or confusion as to the real purpose and aim of our policy.

It was with the deepest personal regret that I found myself compelled to take this action. General MacArthur is one of our greatest military commanders. But the cause of world peace is more important than any individual.

The change in commands in the Far East means no change whatever in the policy of the United States. We will carry on the fight in Korea with vigor and determination in an effort to bring the war to a speedy and successful conclusion.

We are ready, at any time, to negotiate for a restoration of peace in the area. But we will not engage in appeasement. We are only interested in real peace.

GIVES BASIS FOR PEACE

Real peace can be achieved through a settlement based on the following factors:

1. The fighting must stop.

2. Concrete steps must be taken to insure that the fighting will not break out again.

3. There must be an end of the aggression.

A settlement founded upon these elements would open the way for the unification of Korea and the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

In the meantime, I want to be clear about our military objective. We are fighting to resist an outrageous aggression in Korea. We are trying to keep the Korean conflict from spreading to other areas. But at the same time we must conduct our military activities so as to insure the security of our forces. This is essential if they are to continue the fight until the enemy abandons its ruthless attempt to destroy the Republic of Korea.

That is our military objective—to repel attack and to restore peace.

In the hard fighting in Korea, we are proving that collective action among nations is not only a high principle but a workable means of resisting aggression. Defeat of aggression in Korea may be the turning point in the world's search for a practical way of achieving peace and security.

The struggle of the United Nations in Korea is a struggle for peace.

The free nations have united their strength in an effort to prevent a third world war.

That war can come if the Communist leaders want it to come. But this Nation and its allies will not be responsible for its coming.

We do not want to widen the conflict. We will use every effort to prevent that disaster. And in so doing, we know that we are following the great principles of peace, freedom, and justice.

Salary Raises for Postal Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. O'NEILL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following address of Henry J. Mahady, Latrobe, Pa., State commander of American Veterans of World War II—AMVETS—before Clyde Kelly Branch, No. 84, National Association of Letter Carriers, at Pittsburgh:

Each year I look forward to meeting my old friends from the Pittsburgh post office. On such social occasions one ordinarily does not discuss weighty or serious matters. This year, with your permission, I will yield to the necessity of the times and take up a matter which from the viewpoint of the public and yourselves needs immediate attention and consideration.

I have received many letters from my many friends in the postal service. Some have given up their jobs with Uncle Sam and joined the ranks of industrial workers. Some have surrendered the hard-earned seniority and earned credits toward retirement while others were younger but promising top-flight men, of the type that merit the reputation the postal workers have earned so well and have gone into other work. Why has this occurred?

Their letters have explained why they have so acted, or were planning to so act. Economic necessity is the only way you can sum up the reasons given. One couldn't afford to "set up" his own home. Another couldn't support his family as rising prices plus his fixed obligations were forcing him deeper and deeper into debt and into the hands of creditors.

Inflation has pressured our Government and postal workers into leaving their chosen work to go into other fields because their fixed income couldn't stand the demands of rising prices.

How can we keep our career men? How can we stop this flight of top-grade men into other fields? How can we continue to attract top-grade men into postal service? Only by forwarding that legislation which will adjust their wages to the changed cost of living caused by inflationary pressure. One of the inequities caused by inflationary pressures is the fact that white-collar and Government workers and pensioners bear the brunt of it and generally they are a class who are least able to bear it.

Veterans who went into service are least able to stand this pressure. I am sure that dignified assertion of your demands to Congress will show them your necessity. I am sure that the public when it is pointed out to them will back legislation like H. R. 244 and S. bill 355.

I knew that there were many veterans among you. However, I never realized that there were so many veterans in the postal ranks until this last 2 months. I am proud of that fact. The armed services and postal employment are both services to the public as a whole. In both you keep the society functioning. In both you have a duty. Where there are so many veterans and so many high-type men as in the postal service we know communism is at a minimum and its doctrines will be given short shift.

I know there is a limit to patience where one's family is denied economic necessities and debts are piling up. But you as citizens must be patient. These times of crisis and adjustment require that the Government be strong. You are not only an arm of the Government but a necessary link in the industrial system. You must keep the postal service strong.

There are a number of bills before the Congress of the United States providing for raises in pay. H. R. 244 and Senate bill 355 are but two which strive to bring your pay in line with remuneration in other fields. You must have faith. You must have patience. Your lawmakers are alerted to your needs and I feel sure that you will not be disappointed.

You must realize that there are a class of people who think that anyone who has a Government job has a sinecure. They do not know of your problems. Little do they realize that you compete for jobs; that you are on your feet for many hours; that you must please the public no matter what the difficulty; that mail delayed by strikes or weather or holiday rush must be delivered on time; that you get sick and tired and worn out even as others do; that your children cry at night and disturb your rest; and finally that your wages must keep pace with prices.

Your reputation for delivering the goods and as citizens is good. You have earned this reputation by sacrifice and hard work, patience at this time will keep it.

I have examined charts, statistics, articles, arguments, and countless releases. The story is clear, the need apparent. Reasonable men cannot long deny apparent and obvious need. You must have confidence in your elected officials. They are reasonable men and should act promptly. I have no doubt that your matter will be given every consideration at an early date.

We, in AMVETS, feel that service to the community is the prime aim of our organization. We salute you as you have proved and will continue to prove that this is the prime objective of your organization. I apologize for talking shop at a social function, but you must pardon me. I and others are much concerned over the matter.

The St. Lawrence Seaway and Power Project Will Ruin the Bituminous Coal Industry in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and West Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the evil effect of the St. Lawrence seaway project on the bituminous coal industry is evidenced by the following resolution adopted by the Central Pennsylvania Coal Producers' Association and the Eastern Bituminous Coal Association.

Every Member of Congress should read the following resolution because it proves conclusively that the St. Lawrence seaway and power project is a menace not only to the economy of our Nation but principally to the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and West Virginia.

The resolution follows:

"Whereas—

"1. The members of the Central Pennsylvania Coal Producers' Association and Eastern Bituminous Coal Association are producers of bituminous coal from mines located in the central district of Pennsylvania, the State of Maryland, and the counties of Grant, Mineral, and Tucker in West Virginia.

"2. The production of bituminous coal is by far the major industry in this area and its economy is largely dependent upon production and transportation of coal and many communities are solely dependent upon them. In 1950 the area produced 46,250,000 tons of bituminous coal and employed more than 47,000 miners to whom it paid more than $130,000,000 in wages. The market value of its coal product was more than $230,000,000.

"3. Approximately 85 percent of the coal produced in the area is transported from the mines by rail and delivered to those portions of the United States and Canada lying east of a north-south line drawn through Buffalo, N. Y., and north of an east-west line drawn through Washington, D. C. Large quantities of coal produced in the area are shipped to points in northern New York and in eastern Ontario.

"4. The entire bituminous coal industry of the United States, which in 1950 produced more than 500,000,000 tons of coal, employed approximately 425,000 miners to whom it paid more than $1,200,000,000 in wages, will be adversely affected by the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and hydroelectric project, because

"(a) It will make accessible to foreign-produced fuel an area which currently consumes large quantities of coal of which, it is reliably estimated, more than 35,000,000 tons of coal per annum, the equivalent in domestic coal production of 544,000 man-days, may well be displaced by foreign fuel. Without the seaway, this area cannot be reached by foreign fuel in significant quantities because of prohibitive transportation costs from the seacoast;

"(b) The hydropower development on the St. Lawrence River, estimated at from 570,000 to 750,000 kilowatts of firm power, will displace (or prevent its future use) an average of 2,500,000 tons of coal per annum, the equivalent in domestic coal production of 38,880 man-days;

"(c) The loss of employment in the railroad industry will equal that of the coal industry, for it requires a man-day of railroad labor to transport a man-day of coal production.

"5. Aside from the loss of employment and loss of invested capital in the coal and railroad industries, and the adverse effect upon the economy of the communities dependent thereon, the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and hydroelectric project is not in the Nation's interest because

"(a) The Nation cannot afford to pile the cost of the seaway, estimated at $1,500,000,000, on top of the tremendous cost of the current defense program which now strains the national economy, nor can it afford to divert manpower and materials to a project which because of the length of time required for its construction (at least 7 years) cannot be of immediate aid to defense;

"(b) if the country needs more electric power, it can obtain it more speedily and at less capital cost by the construction of steam-operated plants, and at less operating cost unless the public project be subsidized by the taxpayers;

"(c) the seaway is of doubtful value in time of war (it would be unnavigable 5 months of every year) and would be difficult to defend (the bombing of its locks would put it completely out of commission);

"(d) the seaway is of value in time of peace only to a small segment of the total economy of the Nation and will do much damage to many other segments, not only to the coal and railroad industries, but also to the American merchant marine, the established coastal ports, and others: Now, therefore be it

"Resolved, That the directors of the Central Pennsylvania Coal Producers' Association and Eastern Bituminous Coal Association, in joint session assembled, do hereby record their opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway and hydroelectric project and do hereby petition the Congress of the United States to oppose the same; and further

"Resolved, That the executive director of these associations be and he hereby is authorized and directed to transmit copies of these resolutions to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the President of the Senate, to the chairman and each member of the Committee on Public Works of the House of Representatives, to each of Pennsylvania's Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to such other persons as he may deem advisable."

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolutions adopted unanimously on March 29, 1951, by the boards of directors of the Central Pennsylvania Coal Producers' Association and Eastern Bituminous Coal Association in joint session.

R. T. LAING, Secretary.

What the People Think

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I feel fortunate today, to be able to present this House of Representatives with some figures, reflecting the state of public opinion in the Seventeenth Michigan Congressional District, concerning the very issues raised by President Truman's action, which only yesterday shocked and alarmed every patriotic American.

The action I refer to, of course, was the tragically misguided, and possibly disastrous, order issued by the President, relieving Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur of his American and United Nations commands in the Far East.

In presenting these figures, representing a poll taken in my behalf by two fine newspapers, the Pontiac Daily Press and the Royal Oak Daily Tribune, perhaps I should mention the fact that the Seventeenth Michigan Congressional District is one of the largest in the Nation, from the standpoint of population.

Located within the Seventeenth District are several great industrial areas, extensive farming areas, commercial areas, and a tremendous concentration of homes, from the wealthiest to the poorest, whose owners have their places of business and employment variously, throughout the Detroit metropolitan area.

I think I can say without question, that the Seventeenth District offers a cross-section of the thinking, political and economic, which prevails everywhere in the great American Middle West. And more than that, too, because of recent years Detroit's vast industrial expansion has drawn to the Seventeenth Congressional District, literally scores of thousands of Americans, of all races and creeds, from every State in the Union.

The public opinion poll, which I am about to give you the results, was taken by means of a questionnaire, published for 2 days on the front pages of the newspapers I have mentioned. The questionnaire contained 10 questions, as follows:

1. Do you favor the administration's foreign policies?
2. Do you favor arming North and South America?
3. Are you in favor of all-out mobilization?
4. Do you favor strong defenses in the Atlantic?
5. Do you favor sending troops to Europe?
6. Do you favor keeping troops in Korea?
7. Do you favor military aid to Chiang Kai-shek?
8. Should our foreign policies be reexamined?
9. Do you think Mr. Acheson should resign?
10. Should nonessential civilian expenditures be reduced?

Of the 697 newspaper readers voting on question No. 1—do you favor the administration's foreign policies?—645 voted "no." Only 52 voted "yes."

Of the 689 voting on question No. 2—do you favor arming North and South America?—488 voted "yes." Only 201 voted "no."

Of the 690 voting on question No. 3—are you in favor of all-out mobilization?—400 voted "no." Those voting "yes" numbered 290.

Of the 696 voting on question No. 4—do you favor strong defenses in the Atlantic?—609 voted "yes." Only 87 voted "no."

Of the 673 voting on question No. 5—do you favor sending troops to Europe?—456 voted "no." Only 217 voted "yes."

Of the 708 voting on question No. 6—do you favor keeping troops in Korea?—474 voted "no." Only 234 voted "yes."

Of the 703 who voted on question No. 7—do you favor military aid to Chiang Kai-shek?—406 voted "yes." Those who voted "no" numbered 297.

Of the 732 who voted on question No. 8—should our foreign policies be reexamined?—692 voted "yes." Only 40 voted "no."

Of the 708 who voted on question No. 9—do you think Mr. Acheson should resign?—582 voted "yes." Only 126 voted "no."

Of the 722 who voted on question No. 10—do you think nonessential civilian spending should be reduced?—647 voted "yes." Only 75 voted "no."

From the foregoing, which I trust has not proved tedious, it may be concluded that public opinion in the Seventeenth Michigan Congressional District, as a cross-section of Middle Western thought, if not that of the entire Nation, inclines as follows:

First. Strongly against the Truman administration's foreign policies.

Second. Strongly in favor of arming North and South America, as recommended by former President Herbert Hoover.

Third. Slightly against all-out mobilization at this time.

Fourth. Strongly in favor of adequate defenses in the Atlantic.

Fifth. Strongly against sending troops to Europe, presumably at least until European nations of the west show a real disposition to rearm and resist Communist aggression.

Sixth. Approximately 2 to 1 against keeping troops in Korea.

Seventh. Rather strongly in favor of extending military aid to Chiang Kai-shek, the ratio in favor being about 4 to 3.

Eighth. Almost unanimously in favor of reexamining the foreign policies of the Truman administration.

Ninth. Very strongly, indeed, that Mr. Acheson should resign, the ratio being almost 5 to 1 in favor of his resignation.

Tenth. Almost unanimously in favor of a drastic reduction in all nonessential civilian spending by the Government, the ratio being nearly 10 to 1.

It is my conviction that anybody who will consider the results of this public-opinion poll, as I have given them to you, can conclude in the light of common sense, only that the American people, not only in Michigan but throughout the Nation, overwhelmingly support the ideas of former President Herbert Hoover and Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur.

And now I hope you will bear with me, while I repeat something I said earlier.

The action of President Truman in removing Gen. Douglas MacArthur of the far-eastern command is one of the most tragic events in American history. There is no precedent for it.

Lincoln removed several generals in the Union Army during the War Between the States because of incompetence. This is not the case with General MacArthur.

The President demanded the impossible; namely, the support of a virtually nonexistent foreign policy with respect to Asia. MacArthur is a great general and a great statesman. Because he sought to fill a void, where no real policy, either of the United States or the United Nations, was in existence, he has been sacrificed on the altar of politics.

President Truman has liquidated communism's greatest enemy, in the person of General MacArthur, who has served so long, so nobly, and so well. The President's action has gone far to destroy what little confidence the American people, the people of Japan, and the other peoples of the Far East ever have had in the objectives and purposes of the Truman administration.

It has been well said that today there is rejoicing in the Kremlin, as the Red dictator and his regime arrive at the natural conclusion, that preparations are in progress for a new appeasement—another Munich—in the Far East.

Railroad Retirement System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT CROSSER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, ever since the inauguration of the railroad retirement system, it has been my earnest desire to make it the best retirement system in the world. The insufficiency and financial instability of the old private so-called pension systems prevailing on the railroads led me, in the latter part of the Hoover administration, to introduce the first bill for the protection of railroad workers. My interest in the subject continued and has continued to the present time.

I, therefore, sponsored the Railroad Retirement Act of 1934, the 1935 act, the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, and all important amendments to these acts up to the present time.

There is a general desire among railroad workers at the present time for amendments which would increase the benefits to which the railroad workers should be entitled. This is not an unnatural desire when we realize that the purchasing power of a dollar has lessened very substantially since the enactment of the provisions of the railroad retirement law. Among railroad workers, there is also an even more general feeling of opposition to the increase in assessments for the purpose of providing more liberal benefits. It is easy to see, therefore, that the problem confronting us in the effort to be of assistance to the railroad workers is not an easy one.

Any true friend of the railroad men of the United States who understands the requirements of a sound railroad retirement system must first of all be certain that what is proposed will not jeopardize the financial soundness of the system. For many months, I have been making a very careful study of the whole situation and have been in consultation with those who are most competent to advise in regard to the matter and who are most familiar with the problem as at present presented.

After many consultations with experts of the Railroad Retirement Board and officials of the Railway Labor Executives Association, I have introduced a bill, H. R. 3669, which I believe will afford substantial help and, at the same time, will not jeopardize the financial stability of the retirement system. I may say here that already during the few months of the present Congress approximately 30 bills have been introduced for the purpose of increasing the benefits payable under the retirement law. Practically all of these measures, if enacted into law, would menace the soundness of the system, if not immediately wreck it. I am anxious above all other considerations to avoid any such disaster as the destruction of the financial soundness of the system. I am more than pleased with the good will evidenced by many of the bills, but I am sure that their authors will understand that they will be of greater help to the railroad workers by cooperating in the passage of this measure which will result in the increase of benefits and in no way harm the system.

I hope that we can arrange for hearings on my bill at the earliest possible date available to our committee. At that time, we shall be glad to hear well qualified witnesses in regard to the different aspects of the problem.

Maturing War Bonds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TIMOTHY P. SHEEHAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many people who are concerned with what to do about their maturing war bonds. If they cash them in at the present time, they must report a profit for income-tax purposes and will lose a part of their increased value. On the other hand, many people are concerned about holding on to their bonds for a greater period of time because of the depreciation of the dollar over the past 10 years.

This depreciation is most readily seen in the following case: If a man in 1941 bought a brand-new low-priced car instead of a war bond for $750, he could have enjoyed a moderate use of that car over a 10-year period. If he invested it in war bonds, he would now get back $1,000 from the Government, of which he would have to pay, say, an average of 30 percent income tax on the $250 increment. Therefore, the citizen would have a net amount of $925 available to date. However, if he went to buy a new low-priced car today of the same make as he bought in 1941, he could not touch it for much less than $2,000.

The above example holds true for practically any other commodity one would care to select. Therefore, it can be seen that many people are quite concerned with this problem and the various answers to the problem were very well brought out in the following article by Robert P. Vanderpoel, financial editor of the Chicago Sun-Times:

WAR BONDS MATURING; PUBLIC ASKS: "WHAT SHALL I DO?"

(By Robert P. Vanderpoel)

On every hand one hears the question: "My first war bonds soon will be maturing. What shall I do?"

Many of those who bought war bonds never made any other investments. Consequently they lack the experience needed to decide wisely.

First, let us examine the alternatives. Anyone who owns series E savings bonds purchased after May 1, 1941, has, on their maturity, three choices.

He may turn the bonds in at his bank or at the Federal Reserve bank and receive the full redemption price, $25 for a bond originally bought for $18.75; $50 for the $37.50 bond; $100 for the $75 bond; $500 for the $375 bond; and $1,000 for the $750 bond.

In such case he will have to include in his income when he files his return next year the entire interest accrued on the bond, as for example the $25 on a $100 bond. In short, he will have to pay back to the Government in the form of taxes, depending on his income bracket, from 20 percent to 91 percent of the interest he receives for the 10-year loan of his money. This, despite the fact that the purchasing power of the $100 he receives today is substantially less than the $75 he invested 10 years ago.

Bondholders can escape temporarily this tax charge by accepting the second alternative. This involves doing nothing. The owner can just hold on to his bonds. He can do this deliberately or simply through negligence or forgetfulness and the result is the same.

The bonds will automatically be extended indefinitely up to a maximum of 10 years. Interest will accrue at a straight 2½ percent rate for the first 7½ years and then at an accelerated rate so that if held for a full 10 years the return would approximate 2.9 percent compounded semiannually.

Such bonds can be cashed in at any time and the interest obtained to the nearest 6 months' period prior to the date of cashing.

INTEREST ADDED EVERY 6 MONTHS

In other words, during the first 6 months no additional interest would be payable but after that each half year 1¼ per cent would be added to the original redemption value of the bond until 7½ years elapsed. After that, the interest would be at an accelerated rate and if a $100 bond is held for the full 10 years the additional interest would be $33.33.

When the bond is cashed, the interest for both the first 10 years and the subsequent period must be reported as income for Federal tax purposes.

The third option is to exchange maturing E bonds for registered series G bonds. These will bear interest at the flat rate of 2½ percent per annum payable semiannually from the issue date until their maturity in 12 years. The minimum denomination, however, is $500. Until such a total is reached, maturing E bonds may be accumulated over any 12 consecutive calendar months and presented for exchange not later than two calendar months after the month of maturity of the last bond in the group.

These G bonds may be redeemed at par at any time after 6 months upon one calendar month's notice. However, the privilege of deferring taxes on the interest of the E bonds (also the interest each 6 months on the new G bonds) does not apply if this exchange is made.

I repeat what I have said many times before: That as long as the purchasing value of the dollar has depreciated substantially during the period covered by this loan of money to the Government and particularly inasmuch as this decline in the value of the dollar has occurred largely as a result of Government policies, it does not strike me as fair that the patriotic buyers of their country's bonds should have to pay taxes on an income which in terms of purchasing power is actually a loss rather than a gain.

However, until or unless Congress changes the law that is the situation.

Which of the three alternatives should the bondholder decide upon? This depends upon individual circumstances and individual conclusions as to the outlook.

DELAYING TAX MAY BE ADVANTAGEOUS

For an individual above the age of 55 and anticipating retirement at 65 and a consequent sharp decline in his income, postponing the date when the tax collector must be paid holds certain obvious advantages. If one believes that the tax rates will be lower some time during the 10 years ahead, again there are obvious advantages in postponing the year in which the taxes on these investments will be paid.

On the other hand, if one feels that the Government will have no better success than it has had in stopping inflation, the depreciation in the true value of the dollar is such as to make any fixed-income investment (all bonds, saving accounts, insurance, annuities, preferred stocks, mortgages, etc.) unprofitable.

If such a conclusion is reached, the bondholder is faced with other problems. First of all, should he hold the bonds as a duty of citizenship? Second, should he hold them as part of the fight against inflation? Any other course would probably add to the inflationary pressures. Third, if his duty as a citizen rests lightly and he cares little for his responsibility to fight inflation, what will he choose to do with the funds obtained from his maturing bonds? Go on a spending spree at today's all-time high prices, adding fuel to the fires of inflation? Or shall he invest in other things, stocks, perchance, also already selling at around the highest prices in history, or real estate where inflation has sent values soaring?

The choice, it will be seen, is not an easy one. Many other individual factors will govern the decision.

The average citizen, I suspect, will follow the easiest course of doing nothing, which, in effect, means extending the bonds. He should do something more—write another and still another letter to his Senators and his Congressman demanding more effective action against inflation than anything witnessed thus far.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY P. O'NEILL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial from the Scranton Times, Scranton, Pa., dated April 11, 1951, entitled "MacArthur Ousted":

MACARTHUR OUSTED

That there would be a show-down with General MacArthur over his policies and pronouncements with regard to the war in the Far East was inevitable. What happened early this morning—relief of General MacArthur of his command by President Truman—should have been no great surprise. Mr. Truman says his action was based on General MacArthur's inability to give "his wholehearted support to United States and United Nations policies." In a nutshell, General MacArthur not only wanted to direct the shooting war but the diplomatic war as well. Had he confined himself to his own particular field, the one for which he was trained—the shooting war—he would have been immeasurably better off and President Truman would not have been forced to take such drastic action as relieving him of his command. In World War I, General Pershing did just that and in World War II General Eisenhower stuck to fighting and left diplomacy to those who were delegated to attend to diplomatic missions.

As the New York Herald Tribune said only yesterday, and the Times quoted that declaration, "there must be unity of command and if General MacArthur cannot accommodate himself to the basic strategy of his Commander in Chief—President Truman—his further usefulness as a general must necessarily come in question." General MacArthur had unfortunately allowed himself to become a disturbing element in a political as well as a military sense. His pronouncements of policy as regards the Far East, apparently without consulting the State Department or the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were embarrassing and annoying. While many will take sides with him, some merely because they are against the Truman administration and can see political advantage in a disturbed situation, the great majority of the American people will conclude there must be one commander in chief, that his decisions should be accepted and those refusing to abide by them should retire from active service.

It can hardly be said President Truman acted hastily in relieving General MacArthur of his command. Months ago Mr. Truman made a long journey to the mid-Pacific to confer with General MacArthur. Emissaries of the administration have gone to Tokyo and met with the general. Only a few days ago Army Secretary Pace conferred with MacArthur. As of yesterday it was announced from Tokyo that General MacArthur made it plain to his superiors that he intended to keep right on fighting for a freer hand in the Korean War.

General MacArthur, it has long been contended, is Asia-minded. He sees the future of the world decided upon the soil of Asia rather than of Europe. His pronouncements, it is contended, have embarrassed General Eisenhower in the latter's efforts to build up the defenses of Europe. Now the situation has been resolved, unfortunately but nontheless necessarily, through relief of General MacArthur of his command. He has been succeeded by Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway, who is all soldier and who since he was put in command of the Eighth Army in Korea has done a great job. It is expected General Ridgway will stick to his knitting—that is fighting.

President Truman expressed his regret that he had to relieve General MacArthur of his command. He said at the same time that MacArthur's place in history "as one of our greatest commanders is fully established" and that "the Nation owes him a debt of gratitude for the distinguished and exceptional service which he has rendered his country in posts of great responsibility."

President Truman is not the first Chief Executive faced with situations similar in many respects to the controversy which has raged around General MacArthur. Lincoln and other chiefs had to act summarily and relieve commanders who assumed too much authority and who insisted on acting on their own. There was great hubbub at those times and efforts made to gain political advantage over the action, just as there is today, with President Truman's opponents dragging the whole thing down into the swamps of petty politics. Whatever way you look at it the present situation is not nice. To General MacArthur it is humiliating. He brought it on himself by talking too much and too often.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Walter Winchell:

WALTER WINCHELL IN NEW YORK

MACARTHUR—THE STORY BEHIND THE STORY

The greatest scandal in American history is now out in the open. The scandal is not the dismissal of General MacArthur; it is the foreign policy which made it inevitable. General MacArthur and Secretary Acheson are only symbols in a titanic struggle going on behind the scenes. The forces which caused MacArthur's dismissal are not in Washington. They are in London. The administration, faced with the break-up of the Atlantic Pact by Great Britain unless it appeases Red China, took the step of double appeasement (of both Moscow and London) by firing MacArthur.

These are the facts: Secretary Acheson, as recently as last summer, attempted to honor his secret commitment to Great Britain to recognize Red China and admit her to the United Nations. He is on record as stating we would not veto Red China if she succeeded in getting a majority vote. Great Britain, as Red China's floor leader, attempted to get the majority. As another step, Secretary Acheson initiated a deliberate program to play down the importance of Formosa. Senator KNOWLAND, of California, produced documentary evidence that Secretary Acheson had secretly instructed all State Department policy makers to minimize the strategic importance of Formosa. In short, the Chinese Nationalist government, by secret agreement between the United States and Britain, was to be thrown to the wolves. American public opinion stopped this also. MacArthur, of course, opposed it throughout.

The President and Secretary Acheson, until public opinion reversed them, took the view that since Asia has no industry, that continent would never be a factor in the next war. The Acheson formula called for the virtual abandonment of Asia. It was, of course, heavily supported by those who believe communism can be appeased. The American public did not subscribe to the view. It became impossible for the administration to force its secret agreement through the Senate. After practically declaring Korea could not be defended, the President ordered the troops in when Acheson's appeasement failed again. The same action followed in Indochina. After refusing arms, the President sent them.

The reason Great Britain is desperate is that Red China is even more so. The whole of South China is in a virtual state of insurrection. Guerrillas, to the extent of more than a million, are in operation on the Chinese mainland. Until Formosa is liquidated, until Chiang's army is out of existence, Red China will always be on the brink of civil war. The Reds realize this so much that they are prepared to vacate South China, if attacked there. Thus, Formosa and Chiang Kai-shek are at the heart of the Far East question, and not Korea. MacArthur favors using them. Acheson's commitments to Great Britain forbid it. As an example, a shipment of rubber is being loaded at Singapore, destination the Red forces.

MacArthur, contrary to the general impression, is within his rights even as a soldier in defying the President. His oath is to the Constitution and to the men under his command. If he deems the orders of his superiors in conflict with them, he is under a duty to make known his objections. The President, by the same token, has a right to relieve him but he cannot punish. Under the Constitution General MacArthur cannot be dishonorably dismissed from the United States Army for adhering to his oath to the Constitution as he sees it.

It is well that the struggle is at last out in the open. The deadlock of the forces behind the scene was strangling the Nation. Because the truth is that while MacArthur has just been relieved by the President, the United States Senate has long ago dismissed Secretary Acheson for all practical purposes. Acheson is Secretary of State in title only by whim of the President and not by will of the people. Both the Democratic and Republican Senate leaderships have repudiated him. They have put all foreign nations on notice that the Secretary is without power to reach any agreement without their consent. And that consent is not forthcoming.

As recently as last week, Acheson's Voice of America appropriation was cut 90 percent which is a repeated demand that he resign. Nor is the rebellion against Acheson confined to the Senate. General Eisenhower has abruptly ended the efforts of Secretary Acheson to name his political advisers. The ECA Administration, the Marshall plan—ignores the State Department, to its intense rage—and carries on its own foreign policy. Since this bureau deals out the goods, it has far higher prestige than the State Department. Its domestic policy is very clear: It avoids Acheson because it doesn't want its appropriation cut, too. Thus, the United States has three foreign policies: One military, one economic, and the third, a poor loser, the diplomatic one.

It is not the struggle between MacArthur and Acheson which is paramount. The first consideration is the welfare of the Nation. Paradoxically, General MacArthur has been relieved but not dismissed with dishonor. Secretary Acheson has been dismissed, practically with dishonor by the United States Senate, but has not been relieved by the President. It is only natural, therefore, that the Nation itself is dividing into two camps.

By purely objective reporting standards, the country has never been so divided since Fort Sumter. All thinking Americans must realize the division within the action is far more serious than any personality involved. General MacArthur's removal has its chief meaning in its political repercussions. General Ridgway is an able soldier; he is capable of carrying on the command. But the blocking of the President and Acheson by the Senate has resulted in the stoppage of universal military training and a general desire to limit the personalities of the administration as much as possible. In this, the Congress as a whole reflects the will of the American people. They simply will not trust their sons to State Department policies under Secretary Acheson. Experts call them reversals when leaders contradict themselves in diplomacy. But reporters call them massacres when it happens on the battlefield.

The administration would never have fired MacArthur if left to itself. The mighty pressure necessary to dismiss the general came from the West, and not from the East. It is this simple. London blackmailed the White House with threats of breaking up the Atlantic alliance. The White House caved in. The great struggle between the President and the Senate has reached final showdown. It is the Senate's move; in removing General MacArthur the President has defied the Senate to impeach Secretary Acheson. It is put up or shut up now.

To Clean Up the Ohio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRENT SPENCE
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial entitled "To Clean Up the Ohio," which appeared in the New York Times this morning:

TO CLEAN UP THE OHIO

A long stride forward in the control of river pollution has been insured by a notable decision this week of the Supreme Court. Many more spectacular cases may have a less permanent effect than this one on the welfare of our country, for pollution of streams and rivers has become a national problem of the first importance.

In a far-seeing attempt to do something about the increasingly intolerable pollution of the waters of the Ohio River Basin, the eight States of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Ohio, Virginia, and West Virginia in 1948 joined together in a compact establishing the Ohio River Valley Water Sanitation Commission. They recognized, as the Court says, "that they were faced with one of the problems of Government that are defined by natural rather than political boundaries." Interstate action was essential to clean up the waters of an area covering about 155,000 square miles, waters into which some 1,100 cities and towns drained their sewage and waste; and interstate action was taken. But then the Supreme Court of West Virginia held that that State legislature's adherence to the compact was invalid, as it violated the State constitution. It is this ruling that the Supreme Court of the United States overturned, thus firmly establishing the Ohio River compact as a workable method of interstate cooperation.

"The compact involves a reasonable and carefully limited delegation of power to an interstate agency," Justice Frankfurter noted; and Justice Jackson added that "if the compact system is to have vitality and integrity" West Virginia may not unilaterally "read herself out" of this interstate obligation. As an official of the sanitation commission has said, the Court's decision confirms the right of the various States "to join together to develop a more effective campaign to promote clean streams." It should give encouragement to other States that may be considering this method of attacking a problem that is general throughout the country and that cries out for remedial action.

Slovaks Protest Against Religious Persecution in Slovakia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an appeal sent by Mr. Philip A. Hrobak, president of the Slovak League of America, to the President and the Congress of the United States:

SLOVAKS PROTEST AGAINST RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN SLOVAKIA

To the President and Congress of the United States of America:

As Americans of Slovak descent we protest against the imprisonment of Bishop John Vojtassak, Bishop Michael Buzalka, and Bishop Paul Gojdic. We have been profoundly shocked by the mock trial and by the harsh, unjust, and inhuman treatment they have been subjected to by the Communist regime of Gottwald.

The travesty of justice, as manifested in the trial and verdict of the three Slovak bishops, is merely another example of the persecution raging in every country where the Communists rule. We are convinced that the Slovak bishops—like Cardinal Mindszenty and Archbishop Stepinac—have been imprisoned because they, too, dared to oppose a totalitarian dictator for his suppression of religious freedom.

The Czechoslovakia of today would not exist except for the free flow of American blood and American dollars during the war. America cannot and must not stand idly by while Slovakia is being sacrificed to the Red Moloch of Moscow. Perverters of decency must not be permitted to destroy the forces of good without challenge by governments which call themselves Christian. The crimes committed in Slovakia are crimes not only against the unfortunate people living there, but crimes against ourselves as members of the human family.

We are so concerned about the injustice of the trial and the sentence of the three Slovak bishops not because we happen to be of Slovak descent, but primarily because we are Americans. The Slovak bishops represent each one of us. It is because in defending human rights, the inherent rights of their people to political and religious freedom, they are defending the rights of the individual person. They are defending our rights. And it was for those very rights that we toiled, suffered, and sacrificed so much during the war years.

The Czecho-Communist regime of Prague knows that the Slovak people rejected communism long ago. They know that the Slovaks have fought against it relentlessly for over a century. That explains why that regime is so determined to exterminate all Slovak political and religious leaders who oppose them and their brutal rule.

We urge the President and the Congress of the United States to make an official protest to the Czechoslovak Government against the imprisonment of the Slovak bishops and the persecution of religion in Slovakia. We also urge our President and our Congress to break all diplomatic relations with the Czecho-Communist regime of Prague which has sinned so grievously against humanity and the fundamental principles of freedom. Finally, we urge our President and our Congress to bring these crimes against humanity, the crimes against the Slovak nation, to the attention of the United Nations and request that body to investigate those crimes.

Today we protest before God and the world against the systematic torture and persecution of the Slovak bishops and the murder of the faithful whose lives already have been taken by the godless Reds of Prague.

PHILIP A. HROBAK,
President, the Slovak League of America.

Segregation Provision in Draft-UMT Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. FORRESTER
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent to me, and I believe to everyone here, that this motion to strike the segregation portion of the draft-UMT bill providing that any soldier might have the right to request that he serve in a unit of his own race is not made for the purpose of aiding the war effort, or to make us stronger, or to make an attack by Russia more remote, but to bring into play more agitation, more strife, and their partisan politics into a most serious matter. This provision is as fair provision as I ever saw. This provision simply allows our boys to cast a vote for their preference.

Much has been said on the floor here by the opposition to the effect if a boy is old enough to fight, he is old enough to vote, and then this opposition proceeds to try to deny these boys the right to vote on this important question. Those who want to be in unsegregated units need only express his desire to do so, and by the same token those who desire to serve in segregated units should be allowed to express their wish to do so. The people of the United States want this provision in this bill. The boys—and they are just boys—have the right to insist that you not require them to be guinea pigs for a social experiment and to make them the only people in this country that this experiment is tried out upon. It is a cruel thing to say to these boys that we will take you from your homes, we will put you in war, we will bury some of you, no doubt about that, but, nevertheless, we have some minorities we intend to honor at your expense.

If you will give this bill a try, you will find to your entire satisfaction that the Negroes, if let alone and are not high pressured by pressure groups, there will not be one Negro in a thousand that will ask to serve in a mixed unit where they will suffer complete embarrassment. If there be any person who insists upon legislation requiring another to associate with him, that insistence would prove an unmistakable sign of inferiority when one is not content to remain with his own race, then that person is inferior and a troublemaker. I respectfully ask that no consideration be given that silly prattle that to leave this portion in the bill will furnish propaganda to Russia. One of our main troubles here is that we have kowtowed to Russia and off-color groups too long, and we have too many times forgotten the rights of the old-fashioned Southerner and the old-fashioned Yankee.

I will tell you how to talk to Russia, and that is simply to talk to Russia in the only language she understands. That language is force and might. Let us tell Russia that we have had all the foolishness from her and her stripe, whether in Russia or in the United States, that we will tolerate; that peace is what we want if we can have it honorably, but if fight we must, we will do it, and so efficiently she will not rise to fight again.

Let us pass this bill just as it is, and let us do it now. This bill is a sobering thing, but it is life insurance to us and to our boys. It has been said it is fine to die for your country, but I declare it is much better to make the enemy die for his country. Let us tell Russia and the trouble makers at home that they are no longer the "Who's Who in America," but that they belong to that class of "Who's Through in America."

Aid for India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial printed in the San Francisco Chronicle for March 31, 1951, on the subject of the proposed shipment of grains to India. I want to express my own personal concern over the failure of Congress to act on this vital, humanitarian project. The editorial aptly expresses the feelings of, what I am sure is, the great majority of people in this country. It seems to me inexcusable that we should trifle with human lives by delaying action on H. R. 3017.

Further in regard to these proposed shipments I should like to comment on the various proposals and questions about methods of shipment. In my personal opinion, inasmuch as the wheat to be shipped will be in the nature of a gift from the people of the United States to the people of India, there is no reason why all of that wheat should not be carried in American owned and manned vessels as long as any such vessels are available. With our own merchant marine and seamen not fully employed, there is no justification for subsidizing any foreign shipping interests through payments for these shipments. In conformity with established practice on ECA and other similar goods, I shall support an amendment to H. R. 3017 requiring at least 50-percent carriage in American bottoms; however, I strongly urge all those concerned with administration of the program to use 100 percent of the available capacity in American vessels.

The editorial from the Chronicle follows:

DAWDLING IN INDIA AID

The Congressmen who for a month and a half have stalled American famine relief for India will no doubt have noticed the New Delhi report that in some villages inhabitants are eating one meal every other day. Also the news that the Indian Government has had to break its promise, made on the expectation of American generosity, to increase the 9-ounce daily food ration.

These news items do not take much space in the papers, but they do in the consciences of many Americans and in the attitudes of most Indians. The bank account of good will which the United States might have hoped to create by the gift of 2,000,000 tons of our surplus wheat is being squandered through delay.

Surely it is time for Congress to come to terms with a proposal that, as former President Hoover said, "has nothing to do with politics but with our fundamental Christian faith." It is not agreeable to see the United States, for the first time in its history, failing to answer the appeal of a famine-stricken people.

It is indefensible for Congressmen to withhold the gift out of pique over differences between Nehru's policy and their personal policy. It is unfortunate that some of them, from motives that they would be quick to condemn in foreign colonial relations, insist upon squeezing out payment for the wheat in Indian raw materials. The basic fact is that if India had the raw materials to get the dollars to buy the wheat, she would doubtless buy it and be done with it. As a matter of fact, India is buying 1,500,000 tons in the United States and Canadian markets; it is because she cannot pay dollars for the balance of 2,000,000 tons she needs that the administration has proposed a Marshall-plan kind of gift.

Russia is already in with an offer of wheat for India—a show-window offer, no doubt, and unlikely to be performed, but still more of an offer than we have yet made. We wonder what the Congressmen who are concerned about India's politics think about the politics in that?

The People of My Congressional District Resent the Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, since the dismissal of General MacArthur from his far-eastern command by President Truman I have received the greatest barrage of protests on any subject during my congressional career.

These protests come from people of all shades of political faith; and while they do not question the President's right as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces to relieve General MacArthur, they express indignation over the shabby manner in which he was treated, despite the fact that it is universally recognized that General MacArthur knows more about the Orient and its inhabitants than any other living American.

The people of my congressional district realize that the President's action against General MacArthur was motivated by the desire of the Chief Executive to uphold the policies that were formulated by the Truman-Acheson-Hiss regime.

In addition to the many long-distance telephone calls from my congressional district and the hundreds of letters and telegrams, I have not received one single communication supporting President Truman.

Here are only a few of the telegrams I received deploring the action of President Truman.

DuBois, Pa.: "As an American I resented the President's insult to the Marines a year ago. I resented the President's insinuation of red herring. I also have resented the manner in which the President of the United States has conducted himself through his letters and threats to individuals. I now resent his firing General MacArthur. I speak as an American and as a veteran of World War II, and I am in favor of impeachment and whatever you deem necessary, JIMMY, it's all right with me."

Claysburg, Pa.: "Removal of MacArthur most deplorable and dangerous action taken in years. Public sentiment here strong against Truman. Impeachment of Truman and Acheson demanded."

Altoona, Pa.: "Removal of MacArthur most deplorable and a tragic happening for America. Public opinion demands impeachment of Truman and removal of his henchmen in Washington."

Altoona, Pa.: "I recommend you impeach Truman and Acheson, the friends of Uncle Joe and Alger Hiss."

DuBois, Pa.: "Are you a Communist or an American. Impeachment."

DuBois, Pa.: "Moral and intelligence level of Chief Executive has become so low, see impeachment proceedings as only hope for future of United States."

Tyrone, Pa.: "Can't something be done to stop Truman's blunders. Dean Acheson's part in the MacArthur decision should not go unnoticed."

Clearfield, Pa.: "President Truman should be impeached. We need a capable, self-reliant man to head our Government."

State College, Pa.: "My family and I strongly object to removal of General MacArthur. Never could understand the reasons behind Korean War. If we are not fighting it to win we had better pull up stakes and come home. To summarize, we have no confidence in the present administration either here or abroad."

Snow Shoe, Pa.: "Would recommend MacArthur be reinstated and Truman impeached."

DuBois, Pa.: "Son-in-law in Korea doesn't like ousting MacArthur. Impeachment for Truman."

Altoona, Pa.: "We protest very vigorously treatment given MacArthur from across the pond and from those in high positions in Washington. Are we going to have another Billy Mitchell? We heartily agree General MacArthur should come home and tell the American people the true story of the situation in Asia." Adjutant, veterans' organizations.

State College, Pa.: "The British sneak attack on General MacArthur has made an isolationist out of me. I now take my place beside Colonel McCormack."

Altoona, Pa.: "Can't you fellows harness Harry? You have my support."

DuBois, Pa.: "We, the undersigned, highly resent the withdrawal of MacArthur. We urge the impeachment of the President of the United States" (signed by 15 constituents).

Altoona, Pa.: "The action of President Truman last night deserves the severest condemnation of all true citizens. By his dismissal of General MacArthur he has accomplished surrender of our country to the British and to appeasement-loving State Department officials. Hope that you will take the lead with vigorous action tending towards removal of these incompetents or worse from public office."

Clearfield, Pa.: "Approve your recent resolution recalling General MacArthur to appear before your session of Congress; inadequate military condition in Korea which has caused great international crisis should be aired to the country."

Tyrone, Pa.: "Following General MacArthur's dismissal, I demand the impeachment of President Truman."

Hollidaysburg, Pa.: "Things are going from worse to horrible. Impeach Truman."

Altoona, Pa.: "We demand immediate action on reinstatement of General MacArthur as commander of far eastern Armed Forces and immediate action on impeachment of Truman as President of the United States."

Altoona, Pa.: "Just heard the tragic news of MacArthur's dismissal. No tragedy could be greater to the future of our national welfare; would encourage the impeachment of Truman. Absolutely mentally incompetent and unfit for leadership in the hour of our greatest need."

Altoona, Pa.: "Time to impeach Truman and Acheson."

DuBois, Pa.: "For the sake of America. Vote to impeach Truman."

Bellefonte, Pa.: "Relieving of MacArthur was typical of an unsuccessful shirt salesman in a job too big for him."

Altoona, Pa.: "Impeach Truman, fire Acheson, and reinstate MacArthur."

DuBois, Pa.: "Highly resent removal of MacArthur. Urge impeachment of President."

DuBois, Pa.: "I consider it a national disgrace the firing of General MacArthur. Any man who has done so much with so little for his country has certainly earned retirement with the highest possible honor award. Should be called to Washington for first hand Far East information for Congress, State Department, and UN."

Altoona, Pa.: "As your constituents we ask you to do your utmost to have Truman impeached for his infamous action in relieving MacArthur of his command."

Altoona, Pa.: "We mothers disapprove of President Truman's action with General MacArthur. Stalin must be as happy as our boys in Korea and Japanese people are disillusioned." (Signed by 11 mothers.)

Clearfield, Pa.: "Feel MacArthur's removal is an infamous act. Suggest stopping all aid to England until they stop all aid and comfort to Red China."

State College, Pa.: "Feel that MacArthur in right. Who runs the war, the military or the political. Time something is done."

State College, Pa.: "Now is the time to put the ax on Harry. Impeach him now."

Altoona, Pa.: "Impeach Truman and Acheson."

DuBois, Pa.: "Am against dismissal of MacArthur. Want it corrected even if it means impeachment of Truman."

East Freedom, Pa.: "The people demand quick action from you and your fellow Congressmen. They want a sweeping clean-up at once of this disgraceful administration. Their only hope is action at once by the Congress."

State College, Pa.: "Violently opposed to MacArthur's dismissal. Letter of explanation to follow."

Altoona, Pa.: "Truman should be impeached, Acheson forced to resign, and MacArthur reinstated."

DuBois, Pa.: "Have son in Korea. Do not oust MacArthur. Impeach Truman."

DuBois, Pa.: "At times situations warrant drastic measures but from past performances the removal of General MacArthur is probably just another one of those mistakes. Why should the facts be hid from us if, repeat, if there are such facts. I would back you on the immediate suggestion of impeachment of the President." (Signed by four constituents.)

San Francisco Iron Curtain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit for inclusion in the RECORD an editorial published in the San Francisco Call Bulletin on April 9, 1951. The editorial deals with the crippling effect on maritime commerce through the port of San Francisco as a result of undermanning of the Customs Bureau staff and provision of insufficient funds for the Bureau to properly perform its functions in processing shipments through the port.

The editorial cites the fact that there are now 22,000 individual shipment entries at the port which are awaiting processing. The inevitable result of such a situation is to drive business away from the port of San Francisco. In view of the vital importance of the city as a link with the East in these troublous times, when so many critical imports are in urgent demand, and in view of the harmful effects to the city, the State of California, and to the Nation as a result of this serious situation I call the attention of Congress to the urgent need for providing an adequate staff for the Customs Bureau at San Francisco. I particularly wish to call the attention of the members of the Appropriations Subcommittee responsible for acting on Customs Bureau appropriations to this matter, and to urge that they investigate the San Francisco needs thoroughly with a view to correcting the situation, and permitting prompt and efficient service at the port.

The editorial follows:

SAN FRANCISCO IRON CURTAIN—CRIPPLING CUSTOMS SERVICE IS FALSE ECONOMY WHICH INJURES SHIPPING, ABETS SMUGGLING

A sort of inadvertent iron curtain of commerce has been dropped around the port of San Francisco.

It is, you might say, a "customs tailored" curtain. For it has to do with customs.

And if the general public does not realize the significance of this curtain, you may be sure that the people in maritime commerce, the traders and shippers and importers, do.

Prompt, efficient customs service is vitally important as a stimulus to increased shipping here—a goal for which all are striving.

Conversely, delays and slowdowns in the administration of the customs regulations and duties—and they are many and varied—tend to discourage shipping and shunt it away from this port.

However, such slowdowns and delays are inevitable when the Customs Bureau here is undermanned and when it is forced to skimp along on insufficient funds.

And that, at present, is the case. For instance, there are now some 22,000 entries at the port of San Francisco which have not yet been processed.

These consignments are shut out, in effect, by the afore-mentioned iron curtain. Customs agents simply haven't had enough time to get around to them.

Customs Collector Paul Leake and his staff are doing the best they can with what they've got, but the fact of the matter is they haven't got the wherewithal to do their best job.

The business which has to be done by the Customs Bureau here has, during the current fiscal year, increased 95 percent over the amount (as reflected in customs collections) during a comparable period during the preceding fiscal year.

Necessity for administering the export controls which prevent contraband shipments to Communists in the Far East, and the increasing menace of smuggled dope from the Orient, place additional burdens upon the customs men.

In the face of all this wouldn't it seem advisable and prudent that the allocations for customs service here be increased?

But Members of the House of Representatives, it seems, can't see it that way.

The Appropriations Committee, for example, chopped $800,000 out of the original Customs Bureau budget. Then the House itself whacked off another $675,000.

Governmental economy, of course, is essential in these times and always to be desired. But it should be real economy.

To log-roll through juicy pork-barrel items here and there and then make up for it by cutting down on essential services is not economy.

Penny-pinching which results in loss of customs revenue and which injures shipping is not economy.

Our backlog of 22,000 entries held up because of a shackled Customs Bureau is an example of how this kind of shortsightedness jams up shipping.

It is to be hoped that the Senate will see the importance of an adequate customs service, and that Congress in the future will see to it that this important service is given the attention it deserves.

Hard-Coal Miners Outproduce the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article taken from the Sunday Independent of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., for April 25, 1951:

HARD-COAL MINERS OUTPRODUCE THE WORLD

Pennsylvania's anthracite miners have the best production record of any coal diggers in the world.

The 75,377 of them average 2.87 tons, or 5,740 pounds, of coal each shift.

This is more than twice the output per man per shift for the miners of Great Britain, who turn out only 1.32 tons a shift.

BELGIANS FAR DOWN

And Belgium's miners, about whom much has been written on their ability to mine coal, average only 0.766 of a ton a shift. This is only 27 percent of the production of a Pennsylvania miner.

In Western Germany the miners average 1.14 tons and in France the production average per shift of a miner is 0.831 of a ton, or 146 pounds better than the Belgium average.

PLENTY OF HEAT

On the basis that a Pennsylvania hard-coal miner works about 200 days a year, it is estimated that each of them produces enough coal annually to heat the average home for 45 years.

Another interesting fact obtained from State department of mines statistical division concerned the use of 1.09 pounds of explosives for the production of every ton of coal.

In 1949 a total of 48,766,255 pounds of explosives—24,383 tons—was used. This tremendous amount of black powder, dynamite, and other permissible explosives is believed to equal the total amount of powder used during the entire Revolutionary War.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the action of the President in summarily dismissing General MacArthur creates a situation that causes deep concern to all thoughtful citizens. That he had the legal right to do so there is no question in my mind. However, I doubt the wisdom of his doing so at this time and in the manner in which he did so. This is no time for precipitous or impetuous action.

The situation is so involved that I think an opportunity should have been afforded for the fullest consideration and study. To that end, I think General MacArthur should have been requested to return and permitted to express his views based on his long and intimate knowledge of far-eastern affairs. For this reason I am fully in accord with a complete investigation of our military and foreign policy and an opportunity for full expression by General MacArthur of his views. I want the American people, as well as their Congress, to be fully informed.

On the basis of such facts as I now have, I am of the opinion that the President has committed a grievous error. It seems to me that his action in dismissing General MacArthur at this time plays right into the hands of the Communists and those nations, supposed to be our allies, who have recognized Red China and continued to ship strategic materials to them, that could and probably have been used against our boys fighting in Korea. When you consider that we have 250,000 men there at this time, and have had 60,000 casualties, as compared to a small handful from a few other nations of the United Nations, and no support in the way of men from upward of 45 nations, members of the United Nations, then I think our policies should be determined with due regard to our own interests and not those of nations who have contributed so little to support us in Korea.

The time has come when the lid should be taken off and the American people fully advised of what is going on—why our boys are called upon to die, and, whether our Nation is a party to the appeasement of Red China; I want the fullest possible disclosure of all the facts. Then our people and their Congress can determine, on the basis of such facts, what our course should be. In the meantime, I shall endeavor to be circumspect in word and act, and I will continually seek to ascertain every available fact pertinent to the entire subject.

President Truman Shocks and Injures the United States Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES S. GOLDEN

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. GOLDEN. Mr. Speaker, never before since I have been a Member of Congress, have I known the citizens in my district in Kentucky to be shocked so profoundly as they were on yesterday when they learned the sad and tragic news that President Truman had peremptorily removed Gen. Douglas MacArthur from his command of our troops in the Korean War and his position in occupied Japan. Citizens of all walks of life and members of both great political parties in our district in Kentucky were so stunned that it temporarily stopped and paralyzed the business life of various communities, and I have been informed by reliable persons that congregations and town meetings were held, groups were gathered together upon the streets, and almost a universal expression of protest went up against this sudden action of the President of the United States.

The people of America know that General MacArthur has made an outstanding success of the occupation of the island of Japan. They further know that this has cost the United States taxpayers very little money as compared to the outlay of billions of dollars of American money in the European theater since the close of World War II.

The average American citizen also knows that mainly through the efforts of General MacArthur and his wise and humane administration of our affairs in Japan since the fall of that country near the end of World War II, a great spirit of friendliness and cooperation has spread throughout the nation of Japan toward America. General MacArthur has been a wise administrator, he has built up good will, confidence, and respect among the Japanese people for the American way of life, for freedom and liberty and the worth of the individual. Nowhere in the world has a greater contribution been made upon behalf of free governments in their struggle against communism, dictatorship, and oppression, than MacArthur has made in Japan.

His sudden removal by our impetuous President leaves America with no man that can fully and adequately take his place.

We were upon the verge of signing a treaty with Japan and bringing her into the society of nations upon the side of decency, Christianity, and freedom, for which our great country is struggling.

For the President of the United States to suddenly remove Gen. Douglas MacArthur from the theater of operations in the Pacific, is a great shock, not only to the American people, but to the Japanese people, and I fear that it may open the door to an encroachment of communism on the islands of Japan and among the Japanese people.

Aside from this, with America engaged in a bloody war in Korea, the action of the President of the United States has suddenly removed from our side in that great struggle, the greatest military genius that America now possesses, and a man who understands and knows more about Korea, China, Japan, the Pacific and Asiatic theater than any other man in the United States.

The argument is heard that the President removed MacArthur because MacArthur had requested and urged the use of Nationalist Chinese troops on Formosa to help us fight the Korean War and to strike back at the continent of China and oppose the Red Chinese armies in China, so as to divert pressure from our own forces fighting in Korea.

When General MacArthur first suggested allowing Chiang Kai-shek and the Nationalist Army of half a million men, helping us, the argument by the present administration was advanced that it may cause Red China to come into Korea and assist north Korea against our forces. Well, this great Chinese army that would have been glad to assist us, was immobilized and prevented from coming in on our side, and the fear of the administration and Dean Acheson that we may make the Red Chinese armies mad, proved to be just one more mistake made along the appeasement road that has been followed so often by the State Department.

Red China came in anyhow, and has been killing American boys for weeks and months.

MacArthur took the position that we should blockade the coast of Red China and prevent much necessary war materials from reaching the enemy and he advocated, if necessary, to bomb the supply depots of the enemy, and apparently was of the opinion that no victory could be had in Korea by our forces unless we used the troops available to us in the Nationalist Chinese Army, and unless we used the power we possessed to stop and destroy the enemy.

It is my opinion that General MacArthur more nearly represented the sentiment of the American people when he, in substance, made the statement that we were suffering approximately 1,400 casualties a week and that we were accomplishing practically nothing, and that we had very little hope of ultimate victory, unless he were permitted to use some of the power that we have and use some of the friendly allies that were anxious to come in and fight with us.

Some fear among the leaders of the Truman administration has been expressed that the war in Korea may spread.

The fear which I now have, after the State Department has succeeded in inducing President Truman to remove MacArthur, and after the British Government has apparently caught the ear of the present administration with their appeasement arguments, is that we can accomplish nothing in Korea, that our only hope will be an appeasing compromise which will, in substance, be a defeat for our great Nation, that our chances to retrieve anything in China will be now forever lost, and I fear that the war may indeed spread to Japan and Formosa, and maybe to the Philippine Islands.

For the past 5 years, every time any sort of appeasement has been undertaken, instead of stopping Russia and communism, it has encouraged her and she has gone forward to conquer more free peoples.

Of course, the great principles of freedom and liberty and Christianity that America stands for, is far more important than the fortunes of any man; more important than Truman or Acheson or MacArthur, or anyone else.

This great country of ours has been floundering for five long years under the incompetent and weak leadership of the present Truman administration. Long and sincere efforts have been made by many of us to bring about unity of purpose in the United States, regardless of politics, in this time of crisis.

Nothing could have happened, that I know of, that will come nearer destroying the unity among our people than the sudden and peremptory dismissal of General MacArthur from his command in the Pacific.

Where do we go from here? Will we continue to listen to England, that has been the beneficiary of many billions of American dollars and who contributed only a handful—a token force—in the battle in Korea? Will we weaken further and give Formosa to Russia and the Red Chinese, so as to insure the domination of the entire Pacific by this monstrous enemy of mankind? Will we take the advice of England and some other vacillating nations, and grant to this barbaric aggressor, Red China, a seat at the council table in the United Nations? Will we continue to fight and spend a thousand or more American lives each week in Korea, without knowing where we are going or what our ultimate purposes are?

It is a terrible thing to contemplate, a great country, in possibly its darkest hour, to be under the leadership of a weak and impetuous man like our present President.

We heard on the radio this morning that more telegrams of protest are arriving in Washington addressed to Congressmen than ever before in the history of the Western Union Co. I believe this is true, because citizens from my own district are flooding my office with telegrams protesting this drastic action on the part of the President in removing a great commander at a crucial time, and while many of these telegrams express shock and bitterness and lack of confidence in the administration, it is perfectly apparent that the American people feel that a grave mistake has been made and that something should be done about it. I am including one of these telegrams which I received this morning from my home district. It follows:

HARLAN, KY., April 11, 1951.

Hon. JAMES S. GOLDEN,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

In the opinion of all that I have talked to regarding the dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. It should not have been done and some action should be taken. Evidently the wrong man was dismissed.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED G. AANDAHL
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. AANDAHL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a statement I have given to the press and used in reply to numerous communications deploring the dismissal of General MacArthur:

A long series of events, crystallizing in the recent unfortunate MacArthur incident has disturbed the American people to Nation-wide publicly expressed indignation.

The vindication of either of the principal participants, or the chastisement of the other, is of secondary importance. The foremost question is that of maximum protection for the members of our Armed Forces on the field of battle, and the influence of what we may do on the future peace of the world.

At a moment when outward congressional expressions follow a close party cleavage, it is hard to know where political color ends and true statesmanship prevails. Political opinions should be reserved in the back of our thinking for use at a subsequent time.

Most of the Members of Congress in both parties feel that General MacArthur should be invited to return to the United States and give a report to the American people. I feel very strongly that this should be done and am fully supporting the Republican resolution.

It will be many years before we can fully measure the impact of the MacArthur dismissal on the present war, and on the future peace, and we will never be able to know it with complete exactness, because we will not experience the result under the other condition. Calm judgment must prevail. Even then, carefully considered decision may result in drastic action.

In the dismissal of General MacArthur, we have certainly suffered an unwise loss of a colorful and able leader, one who held the respect and admiration of the Asiatic people, and who constantly exerted aggressive, forthright support of all that is truly American against the abusive wave of spreading communism.

Louisiana Is Proud of the Outstanding Career and Public Service of Col. Henry A. Rougon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article reproduced from the Pointe Coupee Banner which so vivdly describes the amazing public service for 22 years of one of Louisiana's most distinguished, unselfish, and outstanding citizens. The article is as follows:

Col. Henry A. Rougon, veteran employee of over 22 years of active service with the State, was retired by the Louisiana State Employees' Retirement System on December 31, 1950, having served Louisiana since September 15, 1928, in key positions with the department of highways, department of State police, secretary of state, and for the past 9 years as field auditor, corporation franchise tax division, State department of revenue, with headquarters in New Orleans.

From young manhood, Rougon has taken an active part in parish and State affairs and politics. A business and civic leader, he has always been on hand to accept public responsibilities. Rougon has been a member of the parish police jury from ward 8 since 1936, having served as president of that body for 8 years. He has also been a member of the Democratic State Central Committee since 1936, and is presently serving as First vice president of the Louisiana Police Jury Association of Louisiana.

His brilliant military service record is thus described in the Historical Encyclopedia of Louisiana: "Enlisted at the age of 28 on August 26, 1917, as a private in the Regular Army and detailed as a student officer to the Second Reserve Officers Training Camp at Camp Pike, Ark. Assigned to the Eighty-seventh Division, United States Army, and attached to the Personnel Force, Intelligence Section, with active military service in England and France. Due to his intimate knowledge of military science, he was later assigned with the Allied troops and received official recognition for meritorious service from the French, English, Belgian, and Italian Governments. He was a friend of Marshal F. Foch, generalissimo of the armies, and in 1927 personally represented the State of Louisiana on a diplomatic mission of good will to the Allied Nations, as the personal representative of the Governor of Louisiana and officials of the Louisiana Department of the American Legion to the Second American Expeditionary Force, and was officially received by the governments of France, England, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland, Luxemburg, and the territory of Germany. Colonel Rougon served as military aide and on the governors' staff of O. H. Simpson, Huey P. Long, Alvin O. King, Oscar K. Allen, James A. Noe, and Richard W. Leche. On his mission to France in 1927, he was presented by the French Republic, a special certificate of commemoration, signed by President Gaston Doumergue of France, and the military governor of Paris, Gen. Henri Gouraud. He was presented with a tableau de la reconnaissance nationale, 1914–18, by the Union Nationale des Combattante of France, the tableau representing the military leaders of the Allied nations of World War I, Colonel Rougon's picture being part of the group appearing on the tableau. He was received by King Albert of Belgium, and in the name of the Belgian Government was presented a parchment commemorating his service with the United States Army. Rougon was received by the President of France, Gaston Doumergue, and General Foch, and presented with the French Government's high military honor, The Meritorious French Legion of Honor.

The encyclopedia further records, "Colonel Rougon is one of the most beloved members of the American Legion in Louisiana, and for many years devoted the greater part of his time unselfishly, and wholly without compensation in behalf of former members of the American Expeditionary Force. He has filled many offices in the organization, and is in addition, a member of the Louisiana Society Des 40 Hommes et 8 Chevaux, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars."

When Miss Margaret Wilson, daughter of the late President, visited Europe to entertain the soldiers, Colonel Rougon served as her military aide for the period of the tour. At the Allied Peace Mission in Paris, in 1927, he was the choice of the Allied Nations, by special preference, to stand between Marshal Ferdinand Foch and Gen. John J. Pershing, during the passing in review of the Allied Nations parade, and at all official military receptions held.

Rougon was drafted into service for the first and second inaugurations of the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and pressed into active service with the United States Secret Service at the White House in Washington, D. C., remaining on active duty for a period of some 15 days upon each occasion.

His service with the State began in 1928 when Gov. Huey P. Long personally appointed him a captain inspector of the State police, and from September 15, 1928, to the time of Senator Long's assassination in the State capitol at Baton Rouge on the night of September 8, 1935, at 9:26 p. m., Rougon was an intimate of the late Senator. He was an eye witness of the shooting, having been only a few feet from the late Senator at the time of the assassination. Following the shooting, Rougon remained in charge of State police on duty at the capitol until the building was cleared of everyone. He was with Long when he died September 10, 1935, and on duty at the burial of the famed politician, September 12, 1935.

Colonel Rougon is an active member of many organizations. He has held membership in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks for the past 39 years, Woodmen of the World for the past 42 years, the American Legion since 1919, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Louisiana Society Des 40 Hommes et 8 Chevaux since 1920. He has been a fourth-degree Knight for 12 years, and a member of the Knights of Columbus for the past 16 years, and has held membership in the New Roads Lions Club for 12 years.

Colonel Rougon is joint owner with his sisters, Misses Ida and Itha Rougon of Austerlitz, Mathilda, and adjoining tracts of land, and as manager of the large plantation, has made a success of the operation of the place. Austerlitz, and the livestock farm rank among the outstanding farms of the parish. Rougon's home has been termed "the garden spot of Louisiana."

The 60-year old colonel had this to say, when queried as to what was next on his agenda: "Retired, I should say not. I am still young and in my prime, and ready to go, now that I have severed by State connection, it's my intention to devote most of my time to the affairs of my parish and State, and I expect to take an active part in politics in the coming parish election and that of the State gubernatorial primary and campaign to start during the latter part of the year."

The Civil Versus the Military Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to include two excerpts from Public Affairs Bulletin, No. 94, published by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress entitled "The Concept of Civil Supremacy Over the Military in the United States," by William R. Tansill.

The first excerpt is a statement by Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, setting forth the desirable and ideal relationship between the soldier and civilian in working out our world interests and responsibilities. Writing in Reader's Digest last October, General Bradley said:

The conduct of foreign affairs is a civilian responsibility. Military policy in our democratic America must always remain the servant of national arms. But today, amid new global dangers, neither the diplomat nor the soldier alone can lead the American people to wise international action. Both voices must be heard if the course pursued is to be realistic and effective.

The soldier can see strategic perils that the civilian might readily overlook. The soldier must not direct the civilian policy, but the civilian must never overcommit the soldier. We must never have a foreign policy that sends our Armed Forces to world tasks beyond their capabilities.

Mr. Speaker, the second excerpt from this bulletin which I wish to include in RECORD is a statement made by General Eisenhower to the Manchester Evening Leader on January 22, 1948, in explanation of why he was not available for nomination to high political office.

General Eisenhower wrote:

It is my conviction that the necessary and wise subordination of the military to civil power will be best sustained, and our people will have great confidence that it is so sustained, when lifelong-professional soldiers, in the absence of some obvious and overriding reasons, abstain from seeking high political office. This truth has a possible inverse application. I would regard it as unalloyed tragedy for our country if ever should come the day when military commanders might be selected with an eye to their future potentialities in the political field rather than exclusively upon judgment as to their military abilities.

Happenings in Washington—Program No. 38

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a release prepared by me, entitled "Happenings in Washington—Program No. 38," in the nature of a report to my constituents in Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON, PROGRAM No. 38

My fellow Pennsylvanians, this is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital and bringing you another discussion of happenings in Washington.

One of the most encouraging developments in recent years is the great wave of moral indignation now sweeping the country as a result of the Kefauver and Fulbright committee investigations.

The disclosures of crime, corruption, and bribery, in and out of government, have proven beyond any question, that the great majority of our citizens are on the side of law and order. They want to drive out dishonesty in public office, wherever it exists.

The impact of television on the public consciousness has been tremendous. Of course there are some who looked upon the television broadcasts as mere entertainment, but they were very much in the minority.

For the most part the decent, self-respecting citizens were shocked and outraged by the sordid story brought right into their own homes on the television screen.

It is not necessary for me to review the scandalous testimony unfolded on the witness stand before the Kefauver committee. Most of you have heard some of it or have read about it.

The question to be considered now is, What can be done about it?

That question logically splits up into four parts:

First, what can the President do about it? Second, what can Congress do about it?

Third, what can State and local government do about it?

Fourth, and most important of all—what can you—the general public—do about it?

As to the first question—what can the President do?—it has been traditional in our country to look to the White House for moral leadership.

The Presidency is a symbol of integrity, of resolute and unswerving devotion to the spirit, as well as the letter of the law and the highest ethical standards.

I have the deepest respect for Mr. Truman and the highest regard for his many admirable personal qualities. During World War II he was chairman of the Senate War Investigating Committee, and gained an outstanding reputation as an aggressive fighter against contract frauds and profiteering.

That is why it is so difficult to understand the protection with which he has surrounded those whose questionable, if not illegal dealings, have been brought to light by the investigation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

In the face of plain evidence that political influence and favoritism were bought and sold in the granting of loans running into millions of dollars, the President has taken no action. He has ignored demands from members of his own party that he clean house.

He has closed his eyes to the deep freeze deal, the mink coat episode, the free vacations at expensive Florida hotels, and the operations of influence peddlers who claimed close White House connections.

No word of condemnation or even criticism came from the President. He said the members of his staff are all honorable men. He insisted there was no evidence to prove they had done anything illegal.

Senator FULBRIGHT, chairman of the RFC investigating committee, took a different view. He put it this way, and I quote:

"It is bad enough to have corruption in our midst, but it is worse if it is to be condoned or accepted as inevitable."

It seems to me that the first thing the President can and should do is to have a spring house-cleaning—and when I say house-cleaning I mean a thorough housecleaning from the top floor to the basement.

He should welcome the opportunity to rid himself of those who have betrayed his confidence and trust.

By so doing he could help restore confidence in the integrity of his administration. He could set an example of official morality for every other department of the Government.

He could strike an effective blow at organized crime and racketeering by directing the Bureau of Internal Revenue to demand the same accurate and detailed income-tax returns from racketeers as are now required from decent people.

Why should a racketeer be allowed to file a return listing "miscellaneous income" while the ordinary citizen must show the nature of his business and reveal all the sources of his income?

It has been charged that the Government has been defrauded of millions of dollars by loose handling of income-tax returns from gamblers and other underworld characters.

The President has complete power to put an end to such practices. He can order the Bureau of Internal Revenue to carry on relentless war against these chiselers and tax dodgers.

The next question is concerned with what Congress can do.

It must be remembered that Congress has no power to legislate in local or State gambling. It has jurisdiction only over rackets operating across State lines.

In the last session Congress passed a law forbidding the interstate shipment of slot machines and other gambling devices, except into States where their use has been legalized.

Federal legislation should also make it a criminal offense to place or accept bets and transmit information across State lines to be used in gambling establishments.

Such legislation must be carefully drawn so as not to impair the fundamental right of the freedom of the press in the legitimate use of sports information for the benefit of newspaper readers.

Congress should give thought to the establishment of crime investigation commission to advise on further legislation needed to wipe out the activities of interstate crime syndicates.

We turn now to what State and local governments can do. Here we reach the foundation on which we must build good, decent government.

I cannot express as clearly or as forcefully the importance of State and local law enforcement as was done by J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI when he appeared before the Kefauver committee.

Here is what he said, and I quote:

"If the laws against gambling were earnestly vigorously enforced, organized gambling could be eliminated within 48 hours in any community in the land. * * *

"The local gambling czar stands at the very center of gambling in this country.

"He is the man who controls the so-called mobs, pays for or arranges for police protection and is the directing energy of the entire mob, of criminality which protects such activities in the local community."

Mr. Hoover continued:

"Without question, these local czars have common purposes and working tools, and may well have contacts with national figures in gambling. * * *

"But these same national figures are themselves dependent, in their operations, upon local gambling czars.

"If you would strike at the national ramifications of gambling, the only effective way I know to do the job permanently is to blast the foundation out from under them."

Mr. Hoover stated, and I agree with him whole-heartedly, that the law-enforcement officers of our Nation, for the most part, are honest and are anxious to do a good job. "Regardless of their personal honesty, however," Mr. Hoover said, "they are frequently powerless to act. If they are dominated by the criminal-alined politician, ruthless rackets and vice are inevitable."

From my own experience in State government I am convinced that the most successful battle against vice and racketeering must be fought at the local level.

Now, let us turn our attention to the fourth and most important phase—what can you, the general public, do?

I think it is generally understood that law enforcement in any community can only be as effective as the citizens demand.

The crime investigations will have served no useful purpose whatever if we say, "What's the use? We will always have corruption. We will always have racketeering."

In many cities definite steps have been launched for a more vigorous fight against organized crime.

But permanent results can be gained only by a new awakening of civic responsibility.

We can only hope that the citizens generally will be aroused to look upon participation in political affairs as a duty which must not be evaded or ignored.

If that condition is achieved, we can restore political management of both parties to the people.

It will serve notice that only men of character and integrity can be elected to public office. It will attract men of that caliber to present themselves as candidates.

We can drive out of power every politician who looks upon public office as a source of private profit.

We can smash, wherever it exists, the unholy alliance between the crooked politician and the slimy underworld racketeer.

These things can be done not by passing new laws, not by grand-jury action, not by the courts, but by the irresistible force of public opinion, translated into political action at the ballot box.

And when I speak of political action I am not pleading the cause of any particular party.

I have in mind the kind of politics in which every good citizen has an active part; that produces good government and promotes the welfare of all the people.

The ballot is the greatest weapon in defense of right, honor, and decency.

There are enough clean, decent, God-fearing people in the United States to destroy the evil influences that have brought us to a condition of moral depression.

But the citizen who fails to vote invites corruption by his indifference and neglect.

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

Federal Aid for Public School Teachers' Salaries

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on February 28, 1951, I introduced a bill, which is Senate bill 990, which would result in the extension of Federal aid to assist in raising public school teachers' salaries. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement explaining the bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JAMES E. MURRAY, OF MONTANA, RELATING TO S. 990, A BILL TO PROVIDE FEDERAL AID FOR PUBLIC SCHOOL TEACHERS' SALARIES

Mr. President, on February 28, 1951, I introduced a bill which would give Federal aid to help raise public-school teachers' salaries.

For over 30 years, Congress has been considering general Federal-aid-to-education bills. I, myself, have sponsored several comprehensive Federal aid bills, but no comprehensive Federal-aid-to-education program has passed Congress; not mine or anyone else's. Yet, the need for Federal aid to education continues to demand the Nation's attention.

There are many fields in which Federal aid is needed, but I am convinced that there are five fields in which the need is most pressing. These fields are:

1. Aid for public school teachers' salaries.
2. Aid for public school construction.
3. Aid to provide funds for scholarships and loans for worthy, needy students.
4. Aid to help eradicate adult illiteracy in United States.
5. Aid to provide essential services for all children in America to protect and promote their health and welfare.

While many Federal-aid bills, which have been before Congress, were of such general nature that any or all of these needs could have been met through these bills, only a few of the bills thus far introduced have specifically provided that each and all of these needs must be met, and have provided a special means through which to meet them. It is essential that each need to be met be expressly provided in the bill, lest any State decide to use all of the funds granted for one of these purposes, or for general maintenance. Actually, the bill which the Senate passed last year, did not assure a single teacher in the United States 1-cent increase in his or her pay. It did not assure a single service to any child in the United States.

Now I voted for the bill because it was the only Federal aid bill which I had a chance to vote on, and I hoped the House would write more specific provisions into it. Let me emphasize that the need for specific authorization for specific purposes must be set forth in the bill, or else the full sum may be used for any one purpose stated. I base this statement on the decision of the United States Supreme Court in a case arising in Washington State.

The case of King County, Washington v. Seattle School Board District (263 U. S. 361), establishes the need for specific legislative allotment for each specific purpose for which funds are desired. This case grew from a special Federal appropriation board, to the State of Washington, "for education, roads, and bridges." All three purposes were named in the bill, and at first, all three purposes were equally served from the Federal funds. However, soon thereafter, the practice was started of cutting down on the sum allowed for education, and later for bridges. Finally, not one cent of the money allocated in the total fund was given for education. The board of education decided to take the case to court, and carried the case to the United States Supreme Court. The Supreme Court ruled that if the State uses all of the funds for any one authorized item, it does not have to use any of the sum for the other two authorized purposes. By similar reasoning, it follows that if the bill authorizes funds for school maintenance and teachers' salaries, that the State may use all of the sum for school maintenance so as not to increase the State's appropriation for maintenance and deny the teachers 1 cent of increase.

It is not the intent, I believe, of the Members of the United States Senate, to support Federal aid for education to make it possible for any State to deny to the public-school teachers of any State, any increase in their salaries through a Federal aid bill. Yet, the only way to assure to the teachers that they will receive an increase in pay through a Federal aid appropriation, is to have the law expressly require such payments. This requirement is the basis of my bill.

Yet, judging from the action of our Congress, I now realize that while some Members may accept a general bill with specific purposes for the use of authorized funds precisely set forth, and many others would take a chance on letting the several States each allocate the funds as may be desired, that more and more Members are eager to have a chance to vote on each provision for which Federal aid is needed in a separate bill.

There is a growing feeling that each provision should be voted up or down on its own merits. I have, therefore, introduced the bill which appears to me to provide aid where it is sorely needed, to raise the salaries of public-school teachers. I can not see how the principle in such a bill can be controversial.

I had, in this bill, introduced another basic principle in relation to the distribution of funds.

I believe the funds given to each State should not only recognize the relative need of the State among the several States, but we should also serve as a means of help and requiring a State to more nearly equalize salaries within the States.

In some of our richest States today, teachers are paid less than $150; some even less than $100 a month. I am most concerned with helping raise the salaries of the lowest paid classroom teacher. Thus, the bill I am now introducing, will provide aid for just this group. As for the other four needs which I have mentioned, and I feel must be met, I believe they will be taken care of. I am happy to note that the emergency housing program bill provides aid for community facilities, including public-school construction.

Next, I note with pleasure that there are a number of bills in, already, to help provide aid for loans and scholarships for worthy, needy, American students. I think that even the American Medical Association will not, at this time, try again to stop legislation to help provide training for more doctors. Our Nation is keenly sensitive now, for utilizing and training our natural resources—human resources, I mean.

I shall, myself, later sponsor a separate bill, providing Federal aid for services, to protect and promote the health and welfare of every child in our America. Please note that I favor such aid for every child in our America, and not only for every American child, for today every child is sacred because he is a child, regardless of his race or creed, nationality or status, and every child in our America is today a great and magnificent responsibility of every American citizen.

The last of my five needs, I presume, will again be covered in a bill which I expect my good friend the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, Senator KILGORE, will sponsor. He has, for several years, spearheaded the fight to wipe out adult illiteracy. I shall help him in every way I can in that fight, but today I plead for American public-school teachers and the children whom they teach. I hope that we may soon have hearings on this bill.

Development of Public Opinion on International and Domestic Questions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a letter I have received from Mr. Frederick C. McKee, chairman of the Committee on National Affairs. I feel that the information contained in this letter is of such value and importance that it should be brought to the attention of the Congress.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL AFFAIRS,
New York, N. Y., April 6, 1951.

DEAR SENATOR IVES: The Committee on National Affairs seeks the development and the mobilization of an informed public opinion on international and domestic questions important to the welfare of the United States.

Its officers, directors, and membership represent a wide variety of political views, and it takes no public position upon any major issue without the consent of its executive committee.

The committee is dedicated to the maintenance of the civil liberties guaranteed under the Constitution, and to international political, military, and economic cooperation among freedom-loving peoples. It has vigorously supported the United Nations, the European recovery program, the Atlantic Pact, the military-assistance program, and the exposure of the dangers of Communist infiltration in this country and Communist aggression abroad.

In implementing its educational work the committee supports candidates for national office whenever a political campaign involves issues which the committee considers important to the national welfare. Among such candidates whom the committee has at one time or another supported are a number of Members of the present Congress of both major parties.

The committee believes that it is eminently proper that the citizens of all States should help to bring home to the voters in individual States the salient facts concerning the views and voting records of their candidates for Federal office, since obviously the welfare of every American citizen from Maine to California is affected by the caliber of the Members of Congress elected in each State. The vote of a Senator from Maine or a Representative from California touches the life of the citizen of New York and Florida, Illinois, and Texas as much as it does that of the citizen of the State or district he represents. Furthermore, the salaries of Members of Congress are paid by the Federal Government from the taxes levied upon all the people, not by the individual States.

The committee looks forward to devoting ever more vigorous and effective efforts to its objectives, believing that the organized activities of patriotic Americans to develop and mobilize public opinion represents a natural and desirable function in any progressive democracy.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK C. MCKEE.

Letter of Condolence to Family of Sam Durrance From Hon. Claude Pepper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a copy of a letter written by Hon. Claude Pepper, former United States Senator from Florida, to the family of a recently deceased rural minister who had spent a lifetime preaching and administering to the needs of humble people.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., March 27, 1951.

MRS. SAM DURRANCE AND FAMILY,
Zolfo Springs, Fla.

DEAR MRS. DURRANCE AND FAMILY: I was in Washington when Sam passed away and didn't know of it until Ches just got word to me. I wish I could have been in Florida so I could have personally attended his funeral and joined the other thousands there to pay tribute to your dear husband and father, my unfailing friend, this great man for God and good, Sam.

Ches was here yesterday and was telling me about the truckloads of flowers, as well as the thousands of friends at his funeral. It was a deserved reward, for Sam has spent a diligent lifetime serving and helping other people, as you so well know. It is encouraging to believe that a man who spent a lifetime doing good, attending the sick and the imprisoned, helping the needy, comforting the sorrowing, and inspiring the discouraged, who sacrificed nearly all material possessions to his high ministry, should have come to old age with enough material possessions to give comfort and security to him and his family and to have been so wonderfully and widely loved and honored as he was. So Sam's life was fittingly rewarded and he had the kind of a monument he most cherished.

A great emptiness has come into the world for me in losing Sam. I thought he was one of the finest men I ever knew. He was one of the most eloquent men I ever heard. My memory will never dim of the speeches I heard him make in the camp and in the company of good friends when we were all happily together. Sam was the people's minister and friend. The poor were his charge and his flock. Like the Christ he went about teaching and doing good. It was for them he cared and it was they who poured out their hearts in affection and gratitude to him.

I told Ches yesterday that I regretted that somehow I had failed to get an autographed photograph of Sam. Ches said he would get a photograph if he could.

Mrs. Pepper and I want you to know that we share your sorrow at Sam's passing; that we join the host who honored him, and we will ever be among the multitude to revere and to love him.

If I can ever be of any service to you, or to any member of the family, it will be a privilege to have you call upon me.

Warmest regards, and Always sincerely yours,

CLAUDE PEPPER.

Discovery of Oil in North Dakota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Welcome, Podner!" published in the Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune of April 9, 1951. This editorial deals with the discovery of oil in North Dakota. I particularly invite the attention of Senators to the fact that it contains a very pleasing reference to myself.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WELCOME "PODNER"

Oklahoma welcomes North Dakota, its twenty-sixth partner, into the oil-producing fraternity and ponders the change the completion of a thousand more successful wells would make in the Sioux State.

We hope the wells will come in flowing black gold. It is too early to tell, of course. Amerada's discovery last Thursday in the Williston Basin of northwestern North Dakota is full of significance, but it must be admitted that so far it isn't as commercially important as the stock traders make it. A well producing 350 barrels of 53-gravity oil a day from 11,660 feet is hardly a gusher, even when it is accompanied by steady gas pressure.

The significance lies in the fact that the well seems to have been completed in a new horizon, one which has hitherto been found to be unproductive. The structure is said to take in considerable area in North Dakota, Montana, and the province of Manitoba, in Canada, and it will now be tested throughout, so in thousands of ranch, farm, and village homes today they are singing the petroleum hymn that begins "Praise God from whom oil blessings flow."

There is more prosperity per pint in petroleum than in any other of Mother Nature's precious possessions. There is prosperity even in the search for petroleum though not a pint is found. The free-spending exploration and drilling crews give the locales they visit something to talk about for years afterward.

North Dakota can use a little more prosperity, and the United States needs another great oil field, for we are dependent now on imports to avoid rationing of gasoline. Wheat has always been the mainstay of the State's economy. It is first in the Nation in the spring and durum varieties. But wheat has its ups and down, and there have been times when North Dakotans suffered from crop failures or low prices or both and gave vent to their disappointment in disconcerting ways. The Nonpartisan League of the period 1910–20 was one outgrowth of such a disappointment. It socialized segments of private competitive business there and spread into Minnesota, where it also succeeded in putting a governor in office. It threatened for a time to set the prairies of the Midwest on fire politically as far south as Oklahoma.

It has since almost disappeared as a separate political force, though such colorful remnants remain before the public as United States Senator BILL LANGER, of North Dakota, who defies classification as anything but a flame-spurting economic rebel on the national scene. Some of the changes the league instituted in the name of reform remain woven in the fabric of the State, such as the powerful cooperatives. Others have been discarded after trials. But every device known to the rebellious farmer to snatch him from the wringer if circumstances should titillate him remain ready for use. It will be exciting to be in the oil business in North Dakota, where such divergent philosophies as the State and the industry have are bound to clash. The oil way will finally prevail. There is nothing so soothing of passion as a monthly production or royalty check.

The rugged honesty of the North Dakotans will make a hit with the oilmen. There is no doubt about the ruggedness of the old-timers there. One has to be of good material to wear through the winters on the vast, unprotected rolling plain that is the eastern part of the State. One has to be downright tough to make a living ranching in the Badlands in the western part, or to put up with the vagaries of the big Missouri River, which flows across the State from upper Montana toward its rendezvous with the Mississippi, and the smaller but equally flood-famous Red River, which parts North Dakota from Minnesota.

Honesty comes natural in rugged people who know and respect each other. And plenty of North Dakotans know nearly everyone of importance in their State. After all, there are only 616,000 of them, or were before the oil boom hit last week. Besides, if they have a traditional leader in North Dakota, it is Theodore Roosevelt, whose ghost gallops arcund Medora, one of the Badland towns. The great Roosevelt lived there once as a rancher and a park nearby is a memorial to him. Another park marks the starting point of Gen. George Custer's ill-fated expedition against Sitting Bull and his Sioux warriers. Still a third park in the Turtle Mountains on the international boundary celebrates the continuous peace between the United States and Canada.

North Dakota is apt to give the petroleum industry a new slogan. It may break out any day with the claim to being the oil center of the continent. There will be a certain justification for it. Oil does seem to be everywhere if only one will search long and deeply enough for it. And North Dakota is the geographic center of North America. The exact spot is in Pierce County, about 50 miles west of Devils Lake.

Tulsa, the oil capital of the world, won't mind the competitive slogan. The discovery in North Dakota has also widened our importance in the industry. Most of the companies with great acreage under lease there are directed from here. But even if they were not we would still wish North Dakotans a new oil well every day in the year and extra ones on holidays. Our word to them is: It's great to live in a State of fine people, good wheat, broad-backed cattle—and oil.

Can Security Be Socialized?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Can Security Be Socialized?" written by Asa V. Call, president of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., and published in the Journal of the American Society of Chartered Life Underwriters.

I think the article presents an issue with which we are to be faced very shortly. I have been receiving letters from mothers and fathers who now have to make social-security returns. They must sign applications if there is a maid working in the house. I have also received letters from farmers who have helpers. When we think of the thousands of persons whom the Government is going to reemploy, I believe that this article will throw light on the question whether security can be socialized.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAN SECURITY BE SOCIALIZED?

Less than 20 years ago few Americans favored any part of the program now called social security—known then as the dole.

Today, however, and despite the increased need of economy in a nation committed to a vast defense program, all too few appear ready to challenge the concept of socialized security and its staggering costs. Anyone who dares do so is likely to be confronted with, "But we cannot let people starve." This supposedly conclusive response is made with the implication that it is monstrous to think of leaving to voluntary effort the care of the indigent.

In fact, however, compulsion—government or private—is the surest way to bring about mass hunger and starvation. And the surest way to abolish hunger and famine is to establish freedom, including freedom to own and bestow goods obtained by production, trade, and thrift.

How can this restrictive pattern of life be changed? Only by individuals willing to risk persecution to keep what they produce and earn, using it for themselves or disposing of it as they see fit, without regard to collectivistic notions. Americans can help by maintaining their own freedom, so that they may show what a free, individualistic people can do. They can help by opposing those who would squander our Nation's wealth in collectivistic programs, which have impoverished and degraded men since history began.

Only free persons develop the high productivity, income, and wealth necessary for generous aid. That is because freedom means opportunity, which permits development of initiative and enterprise. It also means individual responsibility, resulting in foresight, thrift, and industry. Moreover, since production and accumulation of wealth are easier as individuals specialize and exchange services, free peoples also develop the attitudes necessary for cooperation: consideration for others, dependability and honesty, open-mindedness, and the types of personality that engender good will and mutual esteem. These attitudes all make for increased output, which in turn increases capacity for mutual aid. Both the increase in prosperity and the cooperative attitudes make it easier for persons of limited talents to make a living.

Free persons progress in ability to produce, in recognition of self-responsibility, and in sensitivity to the wants and interests of their fellows. They attack the problem of hunger and want by increasing production and by developing the attitudes and institutions of self-help and mutual aid.

Forced charity is not charity at all; it is expropriation. Forced saving is not thrift, and forced cooperation is not cooperation. All are forms of slavery. Neither expropriation nor enslavement encourages enterprise, teaches responsibility, or develops philanthropy.

As the incentive to self-help is belittled and exploited, a sense of frustration and futility seizes upon both indigent and producers. They become easy prey for fakers of every sort—political, economic, medical, and intellectual—who offer utopian schemes for getting something for nothing, or who peddle miraculous cures and wondrous new revelations.

Only gradually does it become clear that compulsion is a degenerating influence; that although it can seize and restrict it cannot invent, inspire, or efficiently manage.

Freedom means exposure to competition. In a free market, producers compete to offer more and better goods and services to everyone. This competition makes it necessary for producers constantly to improve their methods in order to survive in business.

Good societies develop only as individuals gain freedom and learn to bear responsibility. Over the ages, increasing numbers of persons have realized this. They have recognized that only in freedom can they attain their full stature as human beings. Increasingly they see that only in freedom can they find increasing satisfaction for their desires and needs.

We must steadfastly keep alive the ideal of individual freedom and the means for achieving earned security, for in sober truth, there is no other kind.

Opposed to Winstead Segregation Provision of Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the Winstead provision in the pending bill. It provides for a system of segregation in our Armed Forces. This, in my opinion, would be un-American in principle. We call men into the service of our country regardless of race, color, or creed. Patriotism is not and cannot be based upon the color of the skin of the soldier. Colored troops have shown in every war this Nation has been engaged in that they fight with honor and rare courage. Furthermore, we should not discredit our Nation in its fight for freedom of all peoples by any indication that we make distinctions on the basis of color in our Armed Forces. The result of such a course could seriously and detrimentally affect not only unity within our own borders but likewise diminish our influence among the peoples of the world. Therefore, I support the Price-Powell amendment to strike the Winstead provision from the bill.

Public-Opinion Polls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement which came to me from a friend of mine in Nebraska. It has to do with public-opinion polls on some of the very important questions such as troops to Europe and the Korean situation, now being discussed by many Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Radio station WJAG, Norfolk, Nebr., completed a public opinion survey April 8, 1951. The survey consisted of three questions, originally broached on the station's noon forum program, The Voice of the People. Interest was entirely spontaneous. No prizes were offered. Questions were repeated once each day.

The duration of the survey was 3 weeks. Opinions were received through mail, personal interviews, and telephone interviews. The total responses totaled 756. Of this number, 460 were by letter, 200 by personal interview, and the remainder by telephone interview.

The tabulated results of the opinion survey were as follows:

Question No. 1: Shall we withdraw our troops from Korea and leave that country to the Communists? Yes, 46.6 percent; no, 48.4 percent; qualified, 5 percent.

(The popular qualification, stop at the thirty-eighth parallel.)

Question No. 2: Should the President or Congress have the authority to send United States troops overseas?—Congress, 69.9 percent; President, 5.9 percent; President and Congress, 15.4 percent; undecided, 8.8 percent.

Question No. 3: Should the United States send additional troops to Europe under General Eisenhower's command? Yes, 39.5 percent; no, 52.6 percent; qualified, 7.9 percent.

(The popular qualification, United States supply troops in fair proportion with European countries.)

Radio station WJAG has drawn these conclusions after completion of the tabulation of the opinion survey:

First. Persons submitting opinions by letter were more extreme; that is, more conservative or radical.

Second. Persons submitting opinions by personal or telephone interviews were by far the more aggressive. These persons tended to favor remaining in Korea and also sending more troops to Europe. A majority personally interviewed bemoaned General MacArthur's present position; most of them feeling he and his troops were not receiving proper support.

Third. That a definite state of confusion exists within the public minds pertaining to United States foreign policy, but that the trend is definitely established for more decisions to be made by Congress. Those advocating withdrawal of troops from Korea frequently asked "Why are we there?" Others suggested withdrawal unless we fight more aggressively.

Fourth. Those interviewed complained the public was not being properly informed. Many expressed doubt that Congress was being taken into confidence on foreign issues.

A separate breakdown of the survey by sex showed no substantial change in the above percentages. Women displayed only a slight tendency to avoid conflict by returning our troops or keeping them at home.

The Defense Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial relating to the defense housing bill recently passed by the Senate, which appeared in today's edition of the Wilmington Morning News, of Wilmington, Del.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEFENSE HOUSING BILL

In ordinary circumstances it would be safe to prophesy favorable House action for the defense housing bill that has just passed the Senate. Any measure the Senate can debate in a mere 2 days, and then approve without dissent, ought to commend itself to the "other body."

Besides, this one appears to be a big improvement on similar bills passed in previous emergencies. It is more modest than the administration draft—the $1,500,000,000 it would make available in Government-insured mortgages to stimulate private construction of rental housing in defense areas is only half the amount sought. But that may not be a draw-back as far as the House is concerned, and in the bill there are many provisions of solid merit.

The bill provides, for example, that no builder could get an insured loan in an amount greater than the actual cost of the housing involved. If that seems like an unnecessary safeguard, the appearance is deceptive. During the debate Senator MAYBANK declared that in World War II builders had got loans as high as 120 percent—even 150 percent, according to Senator LONG—of the cost of the housing they were putting up. Senator DOUGLAS said some had put up no money at all and some had made money on the mortgage.

Other language would limit application of the law to those parts of the country the President designated as "critical defense housing areas." In cases where private contractors did not bid on a project within 90 days the Federal Government would be authorized to undertake it—up to a maximum amount of $50,000,000.

The need for legislation of this kind is obvious. As Senator FREAR has pointed out, something must be done when a tank plant threatens to double the population of a town like Newark in a matter of months. But it is not so obvious that the House, in its present negative mood, will see it that way.

Pacifist Stand by a Quaker, and Threat of Loss of Citizenship by Disabled Soldier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled Two Cases Strike Sour Note, by Dorothy Thompson, which appeared in the Washington Star on Tuesday of this week.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWO CASES STRIKE SOUR NOTE: QUAKER GETS 10-YEAR TERM FOR PACIFIST STAND—DISABLED SOLDIER MAY LOSE CITIZENSHIP

(By Dorothy Thompson)

Some months ago Robert Mitchener, an 18-year-old Kansas student, a Quaker of Quaker missionary parents, refused on religious grounds to register for the draft, was arrested, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to a short term in prison.

On his release, he received a questionnaire and orders to report. He again advised the authorities of his conscientious objections. He was rearrested, charged with failing to fill out a questionnaire, to report for a physical examination, and to report for induction, tried, and sentenced to 10 years in prison.

The Constitution protects freedom of religion. The Society of Friends stands against participation in war, although it leaves individual decisions to its members.

Robert Mitchener believes war is incompatible with the teachings of Christ, and registry for the draft an act of participation in preparation for war. His mind is clear. But what of the mind of Judge Hill, who sentenced him?

Can the armed services thereby compel Mitchener to become a soldier? On the contrary, as a felon, the Army could not accept him.

Will the example deter others? Hardly. There is nothing more stubborn than a man fanatically holding a faith. The British could not compel Gandhi and every time he was imprisoned, his following increased.

Will 10 years in prison make Mitchener a better citizen?

I have never believed that conscientious objectors should be exempted from national service. But there are many services which a conscientious objector can perform.

The judge who sentenced him was a prosecutor of Japanese war criminals. He then sentenced men for preparing for aggressive war. Young Mitchener, by the same judge was sentenced for refusing to have anything to do with war.

American authorities caused it to be written into the Japanese Constitution that Japan should never have an army. So a Japanese subject to an American commander, who tried to organize a soldiery, would be acting feloniously.

No wonder the human mind is confused.

Thirty-four-year-old Cyril Claude Andersen was not a conscientious objector. He believed Nazi Germany and Japan should be stopped. He entered the American Army, became a major, and in 1947 was retired, so badly injured as to be rated a 100 percent disability case.

Mr. Andersen's father, a native of Denmark, had been naturalized in 1922. He had temporarily left his family in England. Anticipating their arrival he erroneously registered them as residents at his own Brooklyn address.

Last fall Mr. Andersen was informed that the certificate issued his mother and her children by the American consul at Newcastle in England on the ground of his father's error was not an immigration visa. Therefore he is liable to deportation.

But the law requires an American officer to be a citizen. If his citizenship claim was illegal, he was an illegal officer, and is an illegal cripple.

The law may be able to do something about the first two, but what medical science failed to accomplish the law cannot.

By admitting that he was never a citizen and applying now for naturalization, Mr. Andersen would jeopardize his status as a retired officer. He would also have to "forswear allegiance to a foreign government," which, with his broken body hung with decorations for heroic service, seems to him a cosmic joke.

In the current "struggle for the minds of men," which revolves around the relation of the individual to the state, these cases strike a sour note.

Proposed Deferment of College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON
OF COLORADO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a short but timely editorial from the Denver Monitor of April 6, 1951. This editorial pulls the rug from under those who would classify some young Americans as second-class citizens. Military service in time of war has ever been an honored and glorified service in the United States, and worthy of all citizens. Let us keep it that way.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A NEW CASTE SYSTEM?

President Truman's action providing for deferment of college students from the draft on the basis of scholarship and aptitude tests looks like the beginning of a new caste system. Membership in this "elite" group will apparently be limited to students with above average grades.

The scholarship deferment plan is basically undemocratic—this Nation was founded on the premise that all shall have equal opportunities. Moreover, the plan is impractical since it assumes that by academic hocus pocus all the "brainy" young men can be separated from the "dummies." Albert Einstein, unquestionably one of the world's greatest geniuses, was regarded as slow and unpromising by his teachers who, if they had been asked for an opinion of young Einstein's mental ability, would undoubtedly have classified him as mediocre.

And, finally, the plan is unfair because on the one hand it places the stigma of mediocrity upon thousands of young men and tells them in effect that they're cannon fodder material, and on the other hand, it coddles a small group of untouchables as being mentally superior and therefore too good to fight.

General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, two of the Nation's outstanding columnists commented this morning on the MacArthur dismissal. I should like to include their articles in our RECORD along with an editorial entitled "On the Record" which appeared in the Washington Post today. The articles follow:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

THE PRESIDENT AND THE GENERAL

When Taft was President and Stimson was his Secretary of War and Gen. Leonard Wood was Chief of Staff there was a very able officer with powerful supporters in Congress who disagreed sharply and profoundly with the basic military policy of the United States. That was some 40 years ago. Maj. Gen. Fred C. Ainsworth, the Adjutant General, was opposed to what was then a new development in the American Army, namely, the General Staff which in matters of policy was under the President but over all commanders and bureau chiefs.

The purpose of the General Staff, as Stimson and Bundy describe it in their book, On Active Service, was to "meet three requirements: Civilian control in the executive branch, sound general planning and constant cross-fertilization between the line of the Army and its high command in Washington."

But though General Wood was Chief of Staff, the most powerful officer in the War Department was General Ainsworth who had more friends in Congress than did General Wood. A conflict ensued over many matters. The basic issue in all of them was whether the Chief of Staff—who is called that because he is the agent, via the civilian Secretary of the President—was superior to all other officers of the Army. General Ainsworth resisted this idea and though Secretary Stimson had "once before been forced to warn Ainsworth against insubordination," it was not long before Ainsworth again took issue with the Chief of Staff "in a memorandum so grossly insubordinate that as soon as he read it, Stimson realized that the time for drastic action had come."

Stimson consulted President Taft and Senator Elihu Root who, as Secretary of War, had created the General Staff. They agreed with Stimson that discipline had to be restored and Taft said to him: "Stimson, it has fallen to you to do a dirty job which your predecessors ought to have done before you."

Ainsworth was relieved. Twenty-five years later after he had again been Secretary of War, Stimson wrote that "since the relief of Ainsworth no important challenge has been given to the final authority of the Chief of Staff, under the Secretary and the President. Even the great Pershing, field commander of the entire fighting Army in 1918, learned that in the making of long-range decisions he was subordinate to the Chief of Staff in Washington."

It has fallen to President Truman and to his Secretary of Defense, General Marshall, to do the same kind of dirty job which President Taft and his Secretary of War had to do 40 years ago. The final authority of the Chiefs of Staff under the Secretary and the President has been openly and repeatedly challenged by a much greater and more powerful man than Ainsworth. The President and the Secretary have done their duty. They have been faithful to their trust.

General MacArthur's actions are a great enigma. He challenged the President publicly, defiantly, and on issues of such moment that they concern deeply not only this Government but some 50 other governments. It is impossible to believe that a soldier of his eminence and his experience, himself a former Chief of Staff, himself a commander of armies who must know the importance of discipline, cannot have known that he was challenging the authority of his lawful superiors.

What, then, did he believe would be the outcome if he persisted, and indeed made his challenge to the President ever sharper? Can he have failed to realize that either he would have to be relieved or that the President of the United States would have publicly to abdicate the substance of his whole authority in the issues of war and peace? General MacArthur must have known that there was no third course, one of compromise. He must have known it because the President has tried compromise for over a year. But General MacArthur himself has in fact taken the position that the issue could not be compromised.

The question, therefore, is whether General MacArthur chose to force the President to relieve him—or whether he thought from what he had seen during the past year that the President would give in and would take his orders from Tokyo.

A plausible case can be made for either of these theories. Neither can as yet be proved. But this much is certain: General MacArthur deliberately narrowed the choice and meant to force a showdown with the President of the United States on the issue of a general war in the Far East. He did that by compelling the President to choose publicly between relieving him and submitting to him.

MACARTHUR'S POSITION

(By Marquis Childs)

MARTYRDOM VERSUS WAR WITH CHINA

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The following column was written a few hours before President Truman relieved General MacArthur of his command.)

Future historians of the present era, if anyone is left to write history, are bound to find some puzzling contradictions in the days we are now living through. How they will finally explain the Republican position on the controversy over Europe or Asia, peace or war, it would be interesting to know.

During the debate on the issue of troops for the North Atlantic defense command, Republican Senators warned in ominous language of the dangers of a military dictatorship. To give the Commander in Chief, and through him General Eisenhower, the right to determine whether additional divisions should go to Europe without the approval of Congress would be to surrender the preeminent right of civilian control over the military. Even such ordinary sensible men as Senator MORSE of Oregon fulminated on this theme.

Yet now they support apparently without any reservations a commander in the field who has decided to establish a new policy in the Far East. Actually, of course, it is not a new policy.

What General MacArthur said in his letter to Representative MARTIN is what he has said repeatedly to almost every important visitor to Tokyo in recent years. Many of these visitors have come back ardent advocates and agents of the MacArthur policy. In recent months they have brought ever greater pressure to reverse the United Nations-Truman-Marshall-Acheson policy, which is for limited war restricted to Korea, in favor of all-out war against Communist China.

General MacArthur seems to have decided that the time has now come to bring this out into the open and force the issue. That is shown even more clearly in Russell Brines' latest dispatch from Tokyo. The Brines dispatch, inspired at the highest level, declares that officers on MacArthur's staff are sure that his views are increasingly popular back home. Therefore, he can have what he has apparently meant to have from the beginning—a full-scale war in Asia.

Here is an extraordinary situation. One can feel the deepest sympathy and understanding for MacArthur's position as a military commander who sees an offensive being built up from a privileged sanctuary. As a professional soldier, loyal to the American tradition of civilian authority over policy, the general has the choice of carrying out the orders he is given or resigning his command.

In a full-scale war against Communist China the United States would have no allies in Asia or the Middle East. Perhaps this would not be important for the immediate future in view of the military deficiencies of these countries.

What would be vitally important is that the common front of western nations against communism would be cracked or shattered. Great Britain probably would be brought into a war against China by the force of events. But we would have reluctant and unhappy allies in the west in such a war.

MacArthur's staff may be right about public opinion in this country although how they make this determination from a distance of 7,000 miles is hard to see. Surely, however, they cannot understand the depth of feeling in the rest of the Western World.

Canada is a significant example. Next week 6,000 Canadian troops are due to sail for Korea. These men had their basic training in Canada and their combat training at Fort Lewis in the State of Washington.

They are the only sizable reenforcement for the UN army that is now in sight. Those who know Canada say that if these troops sail to what appears to be a war in China rather than in Korea, there will be a very angry reaction in Canadian public opinion. Support for the MacArthur policy of a showdown with communism in Asia rather than in Europe is said to be negligible to the point of being nonexistent in our neighbar to the north.

If we look candidly at what has been happening here at home, we must admit that in important areas the soldier has been supplanting the civilian as policy maker. It may be argued that military policy is superior to civil policy. But a conflict between the two, dividing Americans at home and estranging America's allies abroad, is intolerable.

With his innate predilection for the dramatic, accentuated by the frustrations and the slights he felt in the last war, MacArthur is determined to come home—when he comes home at last—as hero and savior. He seems now, however, to have decided that if he canot be a savior, he will at least be a martyr.

ON THE RECORD

The confidential documents released by the White House in conjunction with the announcement of General MacArthur's recall afford full proof of the President's conclusion that the Far East commander "is unable to give his wholehearted support to the policies of the United States Government and of the United Nations." They show, indeed, that the general had persistently thwarted those policies, and, judging from the climactic interview with Secretary Pace, intended to maintain and even prosecute his defiance. In the circumstances, his removal from command was inescapable if civilian authority was to prevail over military rule.

Three stark facts emerge from the documents. The first of these is that General MacArthur repeatedly violated the President's directive that statements relating to the political implications of the far-eastern war be cleared first in Washington. Such breaches of discipline would have been tolerated on the part of no other officer—and could no longer be tolerated on General MacArthur's part without a complete abdication of the policy-making function by the President.

The second plain fact disclosed by the documents is that General MacArthur himself—not the President or the Joint Chiefs of Staff—was responsible for the failure to rearm South Korean military forces. The Joint Chiefs sent to General MacArthur a proposal to provide a very considerable supply of rifles, submachine guns, carbines, and automatic rifles, together with stocks of ammunition, in order to increase the number of South Korean troops by 200,000 to 300,000 men. The general, having his own ideas about expansion of the war to areas outside Korea, rejected this proposal, urging that the available arms be used to equip the National Police Reserve of Japan. From the point of view of effective prosecution of the Korean War, this disagreement as to policy was profoundly significant.

The third and most important of the revelations was that General MacArthur deliberately forestalled United Nations diplomatic overtures for a settlement of the Korean War by the wholly unauthorized issuance of a truce proposal from his own headquarters—a truce proposal couched in such terms as to be manifestly unacceptable to the enemy. The general had been advised by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that the State Department was planning a Presidential announcement to the effect that the United Nations was ready to discuss conditions of settlement in Korea. General MacArthur, instead of responding to the Joint Chiefs, issued a public statement on his own initiative, using in part the very language contained in the proposed Presidential statement—and adding to it words which made diplomatic negotiation impossible. Thus the diplomatic demarche had to be withdrawn. This was insubordination of a most mischievous and disingenuous kind. The general's continuance in command, after that action, became a menace to American and United Nations policy.

Does the President's Policy Offer Hope of Peace in Korea?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it seems that no act of the President has created more interest upon the part of citizens than his abrupt dismissal of General MacArthur. I am including as part of my remarks, with the consent granted by the House, an editorial appearing today in the News, of Washington, D. C., entitled "A Policy Without Hope." It reads as follows:

A POLICY WITHOUT HOPE

President Truman last night called the war in Korea a struggle for peace, but his speech was in fact a defense of appeasement.

He said the Communists in the Kremlin are engaged in a monstrous conspiracy to stamp out freedom all over the world.

But his only answer to that threat was a limited war in which a ruthless enemy will continue to enjoy all of the advantages of initiative.

He implied that the peace-loving nations had united to defeat aggression in Korea. But that is not the case. The United States has 250,000 ground troops in Korea. No other member of the United Nations has more than 5 percent of that number there. Most members have contributed nothing.

This is not collective action against aggression. It is little more than the action of a single Nation—the United States. And our own part has been less than wholehearted, for our troops have been sent into battle with restraints on their freedom of action.

That is no way to win a war, and nothing Mr. Truman said offered any hope of winning the war.

SITTING DUCKS

Mr. Truman said the whole Communist imperialism, headed by the Soviet Union, was behind the attack on the peace in the Far East.

There can be little doubt about that.

The best chance of stopping this aggression without what he termed "a general war," the President said, "is to meet the attack in Korea and defeat it there."

That was General MacArthur's position, too.

But our limited military efforts are not calculated to defeat this attack, and that is where Mr. Truman and General MacArthur parted.

"There are signs that the enemy is building up his ground forces for a new mass offensive," Mr. Truman acknowledged. But he did not say that the United Nations forces are being reinforced to meet this attack, for that is not being done.

Because of this neglect the UN forces, awaiting the enemy attack, are like sitting ducks.

This was one of the major issues between the President and General MacArthur.

Nothing the President said last night offered any alternatives to any of General MacArthur's recommendations.

Meanwhile, quite contrary to Mr. Truman's view that "men all over the world who want to remain free have been given new courage and new hope" by what he called our "resolute stand in Korea," our Government has lost prestige everywhere by its procrastination and indecision.

Nine months ago, 52 of the 59 members of the United Nations supported military sanctions against North Korea. But by the time the Chinese Communists intervened in the war we could not muster a corporal's guard in the UN to vote similar sanctions against them. Beyond Greece, Turkey, Nationalist China, and the Philippines, what nations can we count on today to support a forthright stand against aggression in Asia?

THE ENEMY BASES

The President touched on the crux of the immediate issue when he tried to explain why our forces have not been allowed to bomb the enemy bases in Manchuria and China proper, where the Reds are organizing for the spring offensive.

To do so, he held, might lead to a general war.

If the war in which we are now engaged is not a general war, it is at least a major war. Our casualty lists prove that.

But if it is a third world war the President is thinking about, would not a defeat in Korea, which we are inviting, be more likely to lead to such a war than a show of determination and strength? Weakness usually prompts attack. That was General MacArthur's view when he urged that we hit Red China so hard that it would stop asking for trouble.

"What would suit the ambitions of the Kremlin better than for our military forces to be committed to a full-scale war with Red China?" Mr. Truman asked. We would say, an appeasement policy which would give the Kremlin what it wants without fighting, as the British are eager to do in the case of Formosa.

But bombing enemy bases in Manchuria need not lead to a full-scale war. The moment Red China backed out of the war our bombers could be recalled. No one, certainly not General MacArthur, has urged use of American ground troops in Manchuria.

THE UN'S PRINCIPLES

Mr. Truman said our major objective is to achieve a settlement in Korea which will not "compromise the principles and purposes of the United Nations." What principles?

The United Nations has a standing offer to discuss paying blackmail to buy peace with Red China. What kind of settlement would be more immoral?

This cowardly proposal cannot be defended in the name of peace; nothing could be better calculated to encourage Red aggression than a policy of rewarding aggression.

Finally, Mr. Truman reverted to the subject of collective security. The fighting in Korea, he said, is proving that "collective action among nations is not only a high principle but a workable means of resisting aggression."

Any soldier in Korea knows better.

No nation but our own has given more than token assistance in this war. A roll call of the troops in Korea will show that. And because of that, public confidence in the principle of collective security is being destroyed.

Yet the President's speech gave the impression that he actually believes the war in Korea has the united support of the United Nations.

Shadow and Substance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Wall Street Journal of April 10, 1951:

SHADOW AND SUBSTANCE—A STABLE DOLLAR IS INFINITELY MORE IMPORTANT THAN CHEAP MONEY POLICY, WHOSE PRINCIPAL VICTIM IS THE SAVER

(By William Henry Chamberlin)

Congressman HOWARD BUFFETT, of Nebraska, a member of the House Banking and Currency Committee, recently raised a very important point that is usually overlooked by orators who specialize in denouncing the "bad old days" before the coming of the New Deal. In a message to his constituents the Congressman drew a startling comparison between losses through bank failures and losses through inflation.

"Remember the bank closings up to 1933?" he wrote. "And all the money people lost in busted banks? For years those losses—a real tragedy—were favorite campaign oratory of New Dealers. Large as those losses were, they were peanuts compared with the losses now being forced on United States savings-bond holders. During 1950 alone United States savings bonds lost $3,600,000,000 in purchasing power. By contrast, all losses by bank depositors from 1921 through 1933 totaled $1,900,000,000."

ALL FORMS OF SAVINGS AT STAKE

This is a forcible illustration of the grave illusions which are sometimes fostered in the name of state provision against want. The validity of many of the means of promoting individual security which have become popular during the last two decades—social-security benefits, pension funds, artificial supports for high farm prices and high-money wages—is inseparably linked with the stability of the dollar. This is equally true for those who have tried to assure their own security by saving money, or by purchasing life insurance or investing in Government and private bonds and stocks.

When there is steady erosion of the purchasing power of the dollar through improvident Government finance and a steady increase in currency in circulation and bank holdings of Government securities an investor must run very fast, indeed, if he is not to remain in the same place, or even fall behind.

LOSS IN BUYING POWER

Take the case of a man who, in 1941, paid $7,500 for savings bonds, on the promise of the Government to pay him $10,000 in 1951. He can claim his $10,000 now. But they are not the same kind of dollars that he invested 10 years ago. Although the interest he received by holding his bonds to maturity works out at 2.9 percent annually, his $10,000 today is worth less, in terms of almost anything he might wish to buy, than $7,500 was worth 10 years ago. And the Federal and perhaps the State tax authorities take a substantial cut of his illusory paper gain of $2,500.

An investment of $7,500 in reasonably well-selected common stocks would have probably doubled in value during the 1941–51 period and would have given a much higher annual yield. This fact should not be considered an argument for a general stampede into common stocks on the part of inexperienced investors. The law that whatever goes up must come down has often found painful application in the case of stock, real estate, and other speculative values.

FIGHTS INFLATION

The savings bond is an intrinsically desirable form of investment. It makes for a wide distribution of the public debt. The money that is used for the purchase of savings bonds is withdrawn from circulation and from the chase of dollars for goods. This is certainly a worth-while objective when the prospective heavy increase in spending for military purposes will strengthen inflationary pressures.

However, it seems doubtful whether a high level of purchases and holding of savings bonds can be maintained by exhortation and advertisement alone. The amount of these bonds sold to the public increased enormously during the war years, 1941–45. There is a danger that, if holders are dubious about their long-term value, we may face a situation of "bonds bursting in air"; of large amounts of these bonds being cashed, with a consequent heating up of the inflationary boiler.

Congress has now authorized continued payment of interest on these bonds for a second period of 10 years after they fall due. One wonders whether this meets the fiscal needs of the situation. The individual who may be hesitating whether to cash his bonds or renew them for another 10 years may take a pad and pencil and engage in figuring. He may wonder whether, just as 1,000 1951 dollars are unequal to 750 1941 dollars in real value, the same may not be true of 1,333 1961 dollars, compared with 1,000 of the present vintage.

TAX-EXEMPT ANNUITIES

Apart from broader measures designed to combat inflation, the Treasury could make the savings bonds more attractive by giving them, perhaps with some limitation as to amount, tax-exempt status.

To insist, as the Treasury has been doing until there was a recent modification of policy, on maintaining cheap money and an artificially low yield on Government bonds at the expense of enhancing inflationary pressure is indeed to sacrifice substance for shadow. The stability of the dollar is infinitely more important than the day-by-day quotation on Government securities. Steps to insure this stability should include a constant war on waste and appropriate credit restrictions, along with a more realistic attitude, designed to attract investment by private individuals in Government securities.

General MacArthur Insists That He Complied With All Directives and Did Not Disobey Orders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, those who defend the action of President Truman in dismissing General MacArthur do so in many instances by the claim that General MacArthur was guilty of insubordination. On this subject an article appearing in today's issue of the News, Washington, D. C., sheds considerable light. In accordance with the consent granted to me, I include the article as part of my remarks. It reads as follows:

OBEYED ORDERS, MACARTHUR INSISTS—COMPLIED WITH ALL DIRECTIVES

TOKYO, April 12.—Gen. Douglas MacArthur today indirectly contested the charges that led to his dismissal and insisted he had complied with all Washington's directives on the Korean War.

Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, the general's closest adviser, issued a formal statement setting forth for the first time General MacArthur's views on the arguments cited by President Truman in firing him as Supreme United States and UN Commander.

"The general feels that he has complied meticulously with all directives he has received, not only recently but throughout his entire military service," General Whitney said.

He said General MacArthur did not believe he had exceeded his authority either in his March 24 offer to discuss a military truce with the Communist commander in the field or in his controversial letter to House Republican Leader JOSEPH MARTIN on possible use of Chinese Nationalist troops.

WITHIN HIS RIGHTS

"The general has interpreted both * * * as dealing exclusively with the military situation and within the area of his uncontested authority to speak," General Whitney said. "The one bore not the slightest relationship to the other."

General Whitney issued the statement after announcing that he had requested retirement from active duty in order to accompany General MacArthur on his departure from Japan.

General Whitney said he was issuing the statement to clarify news dispatches from the United States referring to President Truman's directive of December 6. That warned no public statements should be issued on foreign policy without clearance by the State Department.

NOT A GAG

"The directive of December 6 was not directed to General MacArthur personally, but * * * to all executive agencies of the Government," he said.

"Immediately after its receipt, General MacArthur submitted a proposed communique to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who informed him, among other things, that it was not necessary to submit military communiques referring to military operations. * * *

"Furthermore, the directive of December 6 (by its terms and spirit, was interpreted at this headquarters as applying solely to formal public statements and not to communiques, correspondence, or personal conversations with others."

Moreover, he said, President Truman denied at a press conference, January 13, that there was any curb on General MacArthur's authority "to speak freely on the Korean War."

ON ROK ARMY

General Whitney also referred to the exchange between General MacArthur and the Joint Chiefs of Staff on organizing, training, and arming additional South Korean Army units.

General MacArthur recommended against it when early "conditions indicated the possibility of evacuation," he said.

"Subsequently, when our initiative had been reassumed," he said, "General MacArthur * * * authorized a 25 percent increase in each Republic of Korea division.

"It was obviously quite beyond the capability of this theater to arm and equip 500,000 more Koreans. Their utilization, therefore, became a matter of political policy under the global military assistance program," General Whitney explained.

Amendment of the Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 11

"Concurrent resolution making application to the Congress of the United States for the calling of a convention to propose an amendment to the constitution of the United States

"Whereas article V of the Constitution of the United States reads in part as follows: "The Congress * * * on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States"; and

"Whereas the Legislature of the State of Iowa, in view of the increasing tax problems of the State, caused in large part by the invasion of tax sources by the Federal Government, believes that its problems as well as the problems of other States similarly situated, can be solved only by some restraint upon present unrestrained exercise of the taxing power by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the Federal Government is using and has been using for a number of years the taxing power to produce revenue beyond a legitimate necessity of a Federal government, other than defense needs, and has been using the funds so raised to invade the province of legislation of the States and to appropriate in many fields that which amounts to a dole to the States of the money raised therefrom to accomplish many purposes, most of them worthy, but by the described process making the money available only under conditions which result in a control by the Federal Government from centralized agencies in Washington, in many cases unfit, and in other cases unable to administer the laws according to the local needs because of varying conditions in the country as a whole; resulting in inequities in the administration of the very benefits purported to be granted; and

"Whereas State and local needs are disadvantaged because the people are already taxed far beyond the real need for any purpose other than forcing the centralization of all government in Washington; and

"Whereas the framers of the Constitution of the United States clearly foresaw the possibility of a condition similar to that herein described, and made provision in the Constitution for safeguarding the States against any oppression or invasion of rights by the Federal Government: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Iowa, That said legislature, hereby and pursuant to article V of the Constitution of the United States, makes application to the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the proposing of the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"'ARTICLE —

"'SECTION 1. The power to levy taxes and appropriate the revenues therefrom heretofore granted to the Congress by the States in the several articles of this constitution is hereby limited.

"'SEC. 2. This article shall be in effect except during a state of war, hereafter declared, when it shall be suspended. The suspension thereof shall end upon the termination of the war but not later than three months after the cessation of hostilities, whichever shall be earlier. The cessation of hostilities, may be declared by proclamation of the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress or by concurrent action of the legislatures of 32 States.

"'SEC. 3. Notwithstanding the provisions of article V, this article may be suspended for a time certain or amended at any time by concurrent action of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

"'SEC. 4. There shall be set aside in the Treasury of the United States a separate fund into which shall be paid 25 percent of all taxes collected by authority derived from the sixteenth amendment to this Constitution, except as provided in section 5, and 25 percent of all sums collected by the United States from any other tax levied for revenue.

"'SEC. 5. There shall be set aside in the Treasury of the United States a separate fund into which shall be paid all sums received from taxes levied on personal incomes in excess of 50 percent thereof and from taxes levied on income or profits of corporations in excess of 38 percent thereof.

"'SEC. 6. Before paying any sums into the funds created by sections 4 and 5 hereof, the Treasurer of the United States shall deduct therefrom 20 percent which shall be used in payment of the principal of the national debt of the United States.

"'SEC. 7. No tax shall hereafter be imposed on that portion of the incomes of individuals which does not exceed, in the case of unmarried persons the sum of $600 per annum, and in the case of married persons the sum of $1,200 per annum jointly. A minimum deduction of $600 per annum shall be allowed for each dependent.

"'SEC. 8. The Treasurer of the United States shall once in each year, from the separate fund created by section 4 hereof, pay to each of the several States one-fourth of 1 percent of said fund and from the remainder of said fund shall pay to each State a portion of such remainder determined by the population of each State in ratio to the entire population of the several States according to the latest Federal decennial census or any subsequent general census authorized by law.

"'SEC. 9. The Treasurer of the United States shall, from the separate fund created by section 5 hereof, pay to each State, once in each year, a sum equal to the amount of money in such fund which was collected from persons or corporations within such State.

"'SEC. 10. Any sums paid hereunder to the several States shall be available for appropriation only by the legislatures thereof. The legislatures may appropriate therefrom for any purpose not forbidden by the constitutions of the respective States and may appropriate therefrom for expenditures within the States for any purpose for which appropriations have heretofore been made by the Congress except such purposes as are specifically reserved by this Constitution for the exclusive power of the Congress. The people of each State may limit the expenditures of funds herein made available to the legislature, but shall not direct the appropriations thereof.

"'SEC. 11. Each legislature shall have power by rule or resolution to provide for the assembly thereof in special sessions for the purpose of considering amendments to, the suspension of or the ratification of amendments proposed to this article.

"'SEC. 12. Each legislature shall have power to elect one or more persons to represent such legislature in any council or convention of States created by concurrent action of the legislatures of 32 States for the purpose of obtaining uniform action by the legislatures of the several States in any matters connected with the amendment of this article.

"'SEC. 13. The Congress shall not create, admit, or form new States from the territory of the several States as constituted on the 1st day of January 1949, and shall not create, form, or admit more than three States from the Territories and insular possessions under the jurisdiction of the United States on the 1st day of January 1949, or from territory thereafter acquired without the express consent of the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

"'SEC. 14. On and after January 1, 1949, the dollar shall be the unit of the currency. The gold content of the dollar as fixed on January 1, 1949, shall not be decreased.

"'SEC. 15. Concurrent action of the legislatures of the several States as used herein shall mean the adoption of the same resolution by the required number of legislatures. A limit of time may be fixed by such resolution within which such concurrent action shall be taken. No legislature shall revoke the affirmative action of a preceding legislature taken therein.

"'SEC. 16. During any period when this article is in effect the Congress may, by concurrent resolution adopted by two-thirds of both Houses wherein declaration is made that additional funds are necessary for the defense of the Nation, limit the amount of money required by this article to be returned to the several States. Such limitation shall continue until terminated by the Congress or by concurrent action of a majority of the legislatures of the several States. Upon termination of any such limitation, the Congress may not thereafter impose a limitation without the express consent by concurrent action of a majority of the legislatures of the several States.

"'SEC. 17. This article is declared to be self-executing'; and be it further

"Resolved, That attested copies of this concurrent resolution be sent to the presiding officers of each House of the Congress and to each Member of the Iowa delegation in Congress, and that printed copies thereof, showing that said concurrent resolution was adopted by the Legislature of Iowa, be sent to each house of each legislature of each State of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That this application hereby made by the Legislature of the State of Iowa shall constitute a continuing application in accordance with article V, of the Constitution of the United States until at least two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States shall have made similar applications pursuant to said article V; and be it further

"Resolved, That since this is an exercise by a State of the United States of a power granted to it under the Constitution, the request is hereby made that the official journals and RECORD of both Houses of Congress, shall include the resolution or a notice of its receipt to the Congress, together with similar applications from other States, so that the Congress and the various States shall be apprised of the time when the necessary number of States shall have so exercised their power under article V of the Constitution; and be it further

"Resolved, That since this method of proposing amendments to the Constitution has never been completed to the point of calling a convention and no interpretation of the power of the States in the exercise of this right has ever been made by any court or any qualified tribunal, if there be such, and since the exercise of the power is a matter of basic sovereign rights and the interpretation thereof is primarily in the sovereign government making such exercise and since the power to use such right in full also carries the power to use such right in part the Legislature of the State of Iowa interprets article V to mean that if two-thirds of the States make application for a convention to propose an identical amendment to the Constitution for ratification with a limitation that such amendment be the only matter before it, that such convention would have power only to propose the specified amendment and would be limited to such proposal and would not have power to vary the text thereof nor would it have power to propose other amendments on the same or different propositions; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Iowa does not, by this exercise of its power under article V, authorize the Congress to call a convention for any purpose other than the proposing of the specific amendment which is a part hereof; nor does it authorize any representative of the State of Iowa who may participate in such convention to consider or to agree to the proposing of any amendment other than the one made a part hereof; and be it further

"Resolved, That by its actions in these premises, the Legislature of the State of Iowa does not in any way limit in any other proceeding its right to exercise its power to the full extent; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress, in exercising its power of decision as to the method of ratification of the proposed article by the legislatures or by conventions, is hereby requested to require that the ratification be by the legislatures.

"HERMAN B. LORD,
"LEO ELTHON,
"EARL C. FISHBAUGH, JR.,
"X. T. PRENTIS,
"W. ELDON WALTER,
"CHARLES S. VAN EATON,
"PHILIP T. HEDIN."

We, W. H. Nicholas, Lieutenant Governor of Iowa and Carroll A. Lane, secretary of the senate, hereby certify that the above and foregoing resolution was adopted by the senate and house of the Fifty-fourth General Assembly of Iowa.

CARROLL A. LANE,
Secretary of the Senate,
W. H. NICHOLAS,
Lieutenant Governor of Iowa.

For GI's: Ham 'n Eggs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, any improvement in the necessarily unpleasant life of the GI is good news, and I am glad to report that field rations are taking a turn for the better.

Yesterday's New York Times reported as follows:

NEW FOR GI'S IN FIELD: CANNED HAM AND EGGS

VINELAND, N. J., April 10.—Seabrook Farms, near Bridgeton, is venturing on something new—canned ham and eggs for GI's in the field. The Department of Defense announced the award of the contract. For Seabrook, which also is in the frozen-foods business, the ham 'n eggs is something new. The eggs will not be the powdered variety, at which GI's turned up their noses during the last war, but scrambled whole eggs. The ham will be chopped.

The company also won a contract for beef and vegetables for the Armed Forces. The products will be part of a "five-in-one" ration replacing the old K-ration. It will provide 4,000 calories a man for five men for one day.

The Venice Maid Co., of Vineland, has received a contract for spaghetti and meat balls, for the Armed Forces, adding more variety to the field menu.

It is a pleasure to report that my district will be contributing ham and eggs, beef and vegetables, and spaghetti and meat balls in lieu of the old K-rations.

On the same day that this article appeared, Mr. C. F. Seabrook, the founder and president of the famous Seabrook Farms, the largest freezing and processing plant of its kind in the world, was honored by leading citizens throughout New Jersey at a dinner in Princeton for his outstanding contributions to agriculture and food processing.

General MacArthur's Distinguished Career

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, in all the discussion that has taken place concerning the act of President Truman in dismissing General MacArthur, no question has been raised or denial made that General MacArthur has had a distinguished career as a soldier.

An article by Oland D. Russell, Scripps-Howard staff writer, appearing in today's issue of the News, Washington, D. C., in few but sufficient words sets forth the general acknowledgment of the distinguished career of General MacArthur. It reads as follows:

MACARTHUR PROMISED TO STAY "UNLESS"

(By Oland D. Russell)

Gen. Douglas MacArthur once said he would stay in Japan until his task was completed, unless he was called away by some "extraordinary occurrence." The extraordinary has occurred. He will be home soon.

Biographers use mostly superlatives to describe his meteoric career: Graduated from West Point with the highest scholastic and military standing in history, youngest division commander in World War I, "the greatest field commander produced by the war" (Newton D. Baker), youngest major general, youngest ever to serve as superintendent of the Military Academy, youngest Chief of Staff, at 50.

Planner and executor of the most brilliant campaign of World War II, "one without a flaw" (Gen. George C. Marshall), leader of first foreign armed force ever to invade Japan, his landing there in the face of several million organized and armed Japanese "the outstanding accomplishment of any military commander during the war" (Winston Churchill). "With the full realization of our Pacific victory, you have been its principal architect" (Henry L. Stimson).

As Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers, he was clothed with the highest exclusive responsibility ever entrusted to an American officer overseas. As virtual ruler of 70,000,000 people his new role raised him from the field of military science to international statesmanship. In a swift flow of directives to the Japanese Emperor and Government, he set about to transform a feudalistic, medieval Oriental people into a democratic nation.

To the Japanese people he became a liberator rather than a conqueror. They all but deified him. A Tokyo paper once had to remind the populace that he was not a living god. He gave them a new democratic constitution, drastically revised their way of life, and by the end of June 1950 he could look back on another of his many jobs well done.

Then came Korea, and he took over a new task, when he was 5 months past 70 years old, to command United Nations forces, almost altogether American, first defensively, and then offensively, against full-scale Communist attack. The Inchon landing behind the enemy, "the most masterful and audacious strategic stroke in all history" (Admiral William Halsey). "A miracle" (Gen. Omar Bradley). The push to the Manchurian border, then Chinese Red intervention in overwhelming numbers, driving our forces again below the thirty-eighth parallel to an unending stalemate, his hands tied because Washington and the UN denied him authority to bomb the Chinese bases in Manchuria for fear of risking a war with the Chinese Reds he was already fighting.

On that and allied issues—his insistence on use of Chinese Nationalist troops to open a second front against the Reds, and on his contention that the main threat of Russia to the free world must be met in Asia rather than Europe—the Truman-MacArthur differences flared to an inevitable showdown which came yesterday at the White House, the long-ago-forecast extraordinary occurrence.

Operation Survival

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith a brilliant address by that outstanding national vice commander of the American Legion, the Honorable Lewis K. Gough, before the spring rally banquet, department of South Carolina American Legion, in Columbia, S. C., on March 20, 1951.

Mr. Gough speaks as a distinguished veteran of the recent conflict. He speaks the thoughts and the feeling of this fine organization. His thoughts are timely and pertinent to the discussion of UMT and preparedness in general.

I want the entire Congress to have the opportunity to read the remarks of this outstanding young Californian:

OPERATION SURVIVAL

(By Lewis K. Gough)

My fellow Legionnaires and members of the Auxiliary, it is a real pleasure being with you again in South Carolina. I have had the privilege of partaking of your justly famed southern hospitality before in frequent visits to the South, and it is particularly enjoyable to be with you this first day of spring and on such a beautiful day.

I regret that I am going to have to inject a sober note into this pleasant gathering. However, I am going to speak to you on a grim subject—that of operation survival. I am not speaking abstractly about survival of freedom-loving people everywhere or even of the people of America. I am talking about us—you and me—the people of Columbia and Charleston, and the people of Pasadena and Santa Barbara. We are in a struggle for our lives—to the finish—now. If we lose—as a nation, as a free society, as a people, we die. If we win we may live in peace.

Lenin has said the only safe enemy is one whose power has not just been defeated but destroyed and annihilated, and if his disciple Stalin is successful we will lose forever. Our margin of safety is less than you think.

I am speaking to you today on the basis of information made available to me as your representative on frequent visits to our Nation's Capital. I have had the opportunity of hearing first-hand from leaders in Congress, in the State Department, in the military, and I shall endeavor to give you an estimate of the situation as of the present moment.

It is most difficult to speak on a situation which is ever changing, and the mood in Washington reflects the material changes in world conditions from week to week. Last December there was a wave of despair in our Nation's Capitol which no longer exists. The mood has changed so much that our Congress seems to have lost its sense of urgency.

Let us think back to December for a moment. The Chinese Communists were on the offensive in Korea where we had just experienced our first Gallipoli or Dunkerque and another seemed to be pending. The fall of Indochina seemed imminent as the Chinese Reds massed at Nanning on their southern border. Indications pointed to communistic offensives in Germany or Yugoslavia, or both, in the spring of 1951.

The thinking of the State Department in December seemed to be that we would face our period of greatest danger in the immediate future. They seemed to feel that the relative superiority of arms between the Soviets and this country was at its peak, and the imbalance was already starting to decline. They seemed to feel that war was a definite possibility in 1951.

It must be recognized, however, that the thinking of the military leaders in December represented a consistent attitude in that they felt that our greatest danger would be when the Soviets had achieved a strategic stockpile of atomic bombs, adequate transportation facilities, and the necessary oil to conduct a global war.

Let us analyze this further for a moment. Strategic stockpile means just what it says, not a balance of one for one, but rather a sufficient number of A-bombs to be able to retaliate effectively against our centers of production if we should loose the A-bomb on them. Our very knowledge of such a stockpile would be a deterring factor of our use of the bomb in their opinion.

During 1950 the Soviets put top priority emphasis on production of transportation facilities. In the 5 years prior to this their emphasis was on the hardware of war—the tanks, the artillery, the ammunition. And they put twice as much steel into this hardware in this period as did we, a Nation five times greater in steel production. The switch in emphasis came because they had achieved the superiority they desired in such tactical items, but they needed locomotives and trucks, and intelligence tells us now they will have their adequate stockpile by the end of 1952.

Oil is a necessity for any war machine, and the most tragic news we have heard for our hopes for peace in a long time was the announcement a few days ago of the recent nationalization of the Anglo-Iranian oil industry in Iran which starts tipping the tank toward Russia. The Soviets have worked for this for many months through the Tudeh subversive organization in Iran, through which the Communist phase one is being actively furthered. This phase is the subversion, treason, infiltration operation which has been so effective in other countries and leads to phase two—the violence and police-state methods. And it is entirely possible that the Soviets will have the oil they need from the great oil center of Iran in the near future.

On the basis of the above the Pentagon leaders seem to feel that our period of greatest danger is still ahead.

Why, then, has there been such a change in the general attitude in our Nation's Capital; First and foremost, the Soviets themselves have eased the tension until war does not seem as imminent in March as it did in December. Since December our resolution has become more apparent. The Korean War is now going well. European rearmament is starting to move. Last month Washington signed $5,000,000,000 worth of arms contracts, which is double the December figure. The draft bill and UMT are meeting less opposition than was anticipated. A major factor relates itself to the atomic explosions near Las Vegas, Nev., where we pulled up the corner of the curtain just a bit and lowered it before the Soviets could have a real look. We let them know that we had sufficient A-bombs to test them in number whenever we desired, and that further tests would be held this summer. We implied that we had tactical atomic weapons as well as strategic weapons far superior to those previously developed. This must have had a terrific impact on the Soviet planning, and they purposely relieved the tension which existed in December and asked for negotiations in a Four Power Conference.

And so it seems immediate war is not as imminent. However, global war is still definitely possible any time with present tensions as they now exist. The most optimistic view is that if war can be averted these tensions will continue for many years to come, during which time we must build and maintain power to deter the aggressor or to fight if war should come. These will be years of partial normalcy for us—of austerity and frugality beyond precedent, which we must accept with individual patriotic willingness.

Our present policy of firmness may avert war, but a real danger will arise if Congress should allow itself to be lulled by Soviet strategy and lose its sense of urgency. This would slow up our program as each point is argued and would undermine the very program which now gives us such hope. It is as self-evident in March as it was in December that if immediate war is averted we must have speed and effectiveness in matching a firm policy for peace with adequate power to implement it effectively.

Such a firm policy must embrace realistic conditions for peaceful coexistence with the Soviets as its No. 1 objective. We of the American Legion believe the emphasis must be on averting war, and the objective of preparing ourselves to fighting a war if it comes should always be secondary. In averting war we must end the arsonist's ability to continue to light fires around the Communist periphery. We must roll back the power of world communism by dismantling police and slave states until they are no longer puppets, and through effective inspection and control of arms, atomic and otherwise.

We will have to win one of two conflicts, either the ideological or the military, and until we do we will live in dread, with our youth in uniform, spending seventy billions per year and upward, and without the normalcy we love. We have been losing the ideological war through apathy and lack of understanding of the problem. This is evidenced by the fact that in 1945 the ratio of communism to democracy was but 1 to 9 in our favor. But 5 years have passed—years based upon the decisions arrived at in Yalta, Potsdam, and Tehran—years which felt the influence of Alger Hiss, Remington, Dr. Fuchs, and Henry Wallace. And now the ratio is 5 to 4 in favor of the Communists.

Let us now make a quick estimate of the situation to help us with our own thinking. In such planning we first must establish our appreciation of the objective, and I should like to tell you what the Communists say that communism is, and I quote from their own publication, Pravda: "The nature of our program is not mere talk, but is an all-embracing and blood-soaked reality. Our objective is world revolution, our ultimate aim is world-wide communism. Our fighting preparations are for the conquest of power on a world-wide scale and the establishment of a world proletarian dictatorship."

We were so naive in 1939 when Hitler in Mein Kampf told us of his intentions, and those of us that served in the ETO know how close he came to making good his boasts. Now Stalin is telling us in "Lessons in Leninism" that it is inconceivable that the Soviet Republic should exist side by side over a long period of time with imperialistic, capitalistic democracies—ultimately one or the other must conquer. He tells us further that the only way the final test may be averted is for the United States to surrender in the face of ever-growing socialistic encirclement.

To give you a conception of our task, let us consider forces available and forces opposed. Lieutenant General Gruenther and others, in appearing before our last session of Congress, told us that the Soviets had 14,000 combat planes in operation to our 6,000, that we were producing only one-twelfth as many planes on Korea day as we were on Pearl Harbor Day. The Soviets have 175 army divisions to our 17, and we possess but 44 divisions among the democracies. Our great Navy is gradually emerging from its moth balls, but the Soviets have 300 submarines, including 70 type No. 21, Snorkel undersea craft. The Soviets have made great strides in developing their magnetic 8-mile target-seeking torpedoes. We said in 1945 that we will need no more tanks and we let many rot and rust, or destroyed them. At present we have but 7,000 tanks to 45,000 for the Soviets, of which 700 of their's are the Mark III Joseph Stalin superheavy, and we have no heavies. Both countries have atom bombs. Our superior strategic stockpile has been a great deterring factor. It is interesting to note that Russia has expended 18 percent of her per capita income for her armed services in the last 5 years and we spent 6 percent for the same purpose—and Russia never demobilized as we knocked our Armed Forces apart with a hammer, literally speaking.

As already pointed out, we produce five times as much steel as Russia, but she has put twice as much steel into war hardware as we have since 1945. Russia possesses the advantage of a tremendous fifth column and we do not.

This strength-in-being implements the Soviet program of world conquest. Their main objective is to dominate the minds of men throughout the world. Their tool is communism, a versatile and effective plan which they sell in the name of peace, unity, and individual prosperity, and those that buy this package deal learn too late that they have bought mass slavery instead. Their successes are due largely to our weakness and appeasement. We started a trend with our withdrawal at the Elbe in 1945 that has not been reversed since, and the American Legion continues to urge that the very term "appeasement" must be stricken from the lexicon of American diplomacy as we make ourselves strong and respected.

One of the most encouraging signs recently has been the great awakening of our citizens for at last they have become awake, alert, and aroused. Through compulsion of events they have taken a more vital interest in foreign affairs than ever before in recent history. A year ago this Nation was in a mood of fatalism close to helpless despair. We feared we had lost the ability to control our own destiny. With our awakening we are still despondent, but no longer do we carry our despondency to the point of a hopeless defeatism. We are beginning to speak up. We find we are still freemen. We will not be carried blindly where others direct. We will control our own destiny. In this rebirth of determination there is a new source of strength. If freemen think, speak, and act resolutely we may still be able to ward off the evils of war, and we will be more effective in the fighting if it comes. As General "Ike" has said: "One hundred and fifty million freemen can accomplish practically anything if they put their mind to it."

With this awakening the administration has suddenly discovered that the people disagree with many policies of their leadership. This is a fact that they must recognize. We must have no "red herrings" now.

As our people become aroused and shed their apathy and the administration feels the weight of their opinion, we may still be able to prevent the cycle of man of which Tom Payne speaks when he says: "Man lifts himself from subjugation and slavery to liberty and freedom, from there to opportunity and prosperity from which he declines to luxury and apathy and finally to subjugation and slavery." Americans must have a sense of urgency—an awareness of personal dedication and a blazing faith if we are to escape this cycle—as we have been in the luxury and apathy stage for the past 5 years.

This year of our Lord 1951 must be a year not only of reexamination, but of decision. The hour is late. The year of decision should have been made in 1945 when we had adequate power to implement our policy. It was then we should have had realistic decision plus adequate power to make it effective. Instead we chose the soft, easy road, the road of weakness and appeasement, the road of Neville Chamberlain or a Stanley Baldwin. We thought we could buy friends and security. We took refuge in our possession of the atom bomb. When we learned the enemy had this awful secret, we found our solace and comfort in the strategic concept of long-ranged bombers, atomic weapons, guided missiles, and push-button warfare; and as we enjoyed our luxury and apathy we had our business as usual, our politics as usual, and a lavish standard of living. John Foster Dulles was so right when he said: "We have made all the mistakes we can afford to make and still survive." Our first step in reexamination is a comprehensive all-inclusive study of our national purpose in world affairs. Our foreign policy and its implementation must have top priority above all else in our interest, for the decisions we arrive at affect our country's future and the fate of the world.

A very encouraging sign is the sincere, earnest, and useful attempt to reexamine our policy in the recent talks of many of our national leaders. They are giving us basic principles of grand strategy to consider. This is good as long as it remains above personal and partisan levels. Their points of view differ you say—but the differences are more constructive than confusing and there are certain key points that stand out from all their talks in which they are in agreement. These are:

1. We must have no more appeasement.

2. We need effective deterrence to Russia's armed aggression. We must rely on our power to deter and we must have the kind of military power which can retaliate effectively against Russia if the Red army marches in Europe and which can deny to the Soviet Union the use of anything which they might conquer, by destroying it and keeping it destroyed.

3. We want all the allies we can get who are willing and able to fight but we want to know now who will stand up and be counted. We do not intend to carry any excess baggage with us in this life and death struggle.

4. We must have full speed ahead in accelerating our war potential. Time is the most fragile of our strategic weapons.

5. We will rely on the United Nations to provide our goals providing it shows requisite moral courage.

Korea has moved up the time table for Russia. The purpose of our intervention there was to prevent a general war—on the assumption that the Soviets would not face the calculated risk of a general war beginning in so unstrategic an area. We assumed that Korea was the first step in the long program of aggression which, if continued, would lead to a Munich-like situation. Our assumptions were probably correct then. We were probably being tested. However, as Korea fighting disclosed the true extent of American disarmament, weakness and unpreparedness, the Politburo concluded it was willing to risk a general war after all as it pressed the button for the Chinese Reds to enter the fray. Consequently, Russia greatly contracted the time table of her immense imperialistic program. Our trouble in Korea stems not from having gone too far—but rather we did not go far enough soon enough with firm, resolute, definite decision, implemented by adequate power to make it effective. As usual our sins are those of omission, not commission. We cannot seem to learn that as Winston Churchill says (and he says so much in such few words): "The weakness of the virtuous permits the malice of the wicked."

Indochina may be Russia's next one-alarm fire. To take this country would round out the Kremlin's triumph in Asia. We hear that our fighting force in Korea is tying up the Chinese Communists best fighting force, which postpones interventions in Indochina, but the situation there is tense and dangerous. Recent intelligence tells us that a Chinese liberation army of 250,000 is now at Nanning just above the border. This army, with its heavy equipment, plus Ho Chi Minh's 100,000, would mean the same imbalance of power contrasted with the 150,000 French Vietnam forces that caused our difficulty in Korea. Recently the French were forced to close their consulates in Kunming and Canton so that they may no longer observe. A Soviet air mission landed this month in Hainan with modern planes, including jets, which soon may be transferred to China's Reds. We have noted recent changes in propaganda of the Nationalist Vietminh forces which no longer are "exclusively Nationalist," but Ho himself, a long-time friend of Mao, who controls Red China (they were together in the Cominform in Moscow for their early training), is quoted as telling of the glorious advantages of Indochina being liberated by their friends the Chinese. We hear that non-Communist Nationalists are being liquidated from the Vietminh forces.

With the imminent fall of Indochina, Siam, Burma, and Malaya will soon follow. Indochina is the olive in the top of the bottle and the other countries of southeast Asia with their deplorable economic and political conditions provide the troublesome waters where the Communists like best to fish.

This spring is critical in view of the perils that surround us. While the French, British, and United States are occupied in Asia, Stalin may take advantage of this diversion to light the four-alarm fire by striking into Western Germany and Yugoslavia before the West can build the force that is now on paper. I know if I were Stalin and had his disregard for human life, I would risk the atomic bombing of civilians, realizing the results of such bombing on dispersed military targets and dispersed technical forces probably would not be decisive. The imbalance of power will probably never be more favorable to Stalin. Maybe he is thinking of just this, as we hear that the bridges of East Germany and the Balkans are being reinforced to take his heavy tanks. Thirty Soviet divisions are available for immedi te action in East Germany with artillery and mechanized units attached. Four thousand planes and six thousand tanks are stationed in this area. Perhaps, however, he may plan to use the Poles, Czechs, and East Germans for a Korean-type action with Russian support against our weak defensive divisions.

Why, you ask, has he not marched already in Europe? I concur with Churchill that the atom bomb as retaliation has been a strong deterring factor. Also, he undoubtedly considered we were stronger than he now knows us to be. Also, Stalin has been doing well so far without having to resort to force as is so evident graphically if you look at the map of the world in 1945 and now.

In view of all these considerations a lack of feeling of urgency in Washington is alarming. The weight of expressed public opinion must be felt at once. The No. 1 weapon now as in the past for world peace is informed, expressed public opinion. Without citizens recognizing their individual responsibility in a democracy we have government by default as the organized vociferous minority will predominates. This was evident in the year just past when approximately 80 percent of our people who preferred universal military training could not obtain it because the articulate minority prevented such legislation. Informed, intelligent, patriotic American citizens on the basis of reexamination must achieve decision and action. For 32 years the American Legion has been dedicated to this purpose.

Germany and Japan are major factors in the world situation. These two nations were bulwarks against the expansion of the czarist regime of Russia in their imperialistic designs. The same two nations prevented the Communists from expanding in the same manner, but then in 1945 we destroyed first Germany and then Japan, and then in 1946 we destroyed our own power. What has happened since was inevitable.

There are four major industrial areas in the world today. These are, in order, the United States, Soviet Russia, the Ruhr of Germany, and Japan. If we should lose these areas to the Communists, either through phase one, subversion, or phase two, violence, we would lose the balance of power industrially speaking, perhaps irretrievably.

In the East we have committed ourselves to defend Japan in a defensive line which extends from Japan through Okinawa, Formosa, to the Philippines. In the West we must defend a line as far east as the combined thinking of our statesmen and military leaders think is feasible. The thinking of Generals Eisenhower, Bradley, Marshall, and Clay must be given much weight in arriving at this very important decision. The trouble spots at the present to watch carefully are Iran, Indochina, Japan, Germany, and Yugoslavia.

On the basis of the foregoing the American Legion presents "operation survival" as a program to bring us peace by compulsion. First and foremost, we must have a systematic mobilization of all armed forces in sufficient degree to meet the immediate peril. This must be done on an enduring basis as quickly as training facilities and materials will permit.

Secondly, we must have universal military training to provide trained manpower for the long-range pull. No longer must we go from the valleys to the peaks in our national preparedness with each world crisis. Such a policy has forced us to fight a war on the average of every 20 years of our national existence. The full force of the Legion and the Auxiliary is fighting this moment for UMT in our Nation's Capital, and in our fight we will not compromise on our long-established principles that UMT must be civilian controlled. It must have adequate safeguards for education, religion, science, and industry, and it must have a mandatory provision to make it effective when selective service expires to adequately deal with crises of the future.

Third, we must have industrial mobilization sufficient to give us strategic stockpiles of all essential materials as soon as possible.

Fourth, we must strengthen our internal security through strict enforcement of the Communist-control law, to destroy the Communist beachheads within our midst. We must intern the known Communists now as 1 day after war is declared, if such there be, will be 1 day too late to deal with this fifth column, without parallel in world history.

We must curtail or eliminate every possible public and private nonessential expenditure. This means achieving proper priority of expenditures at top level. We must put first things first; henceforth, American dollars must be fighting dollars. Years of austerity and frugal living are ahead if we are to avoid national bankruptcy.

Fifth, last but not least, in our strategy for peace we much achieve rearmament not only militarily but spiritually as well. In the early days of this country our founders and forefathers, our builders and defenders, asked and received guidance, inspiration, help and strength from God in achieving a great Nation. Now too many of us have forgotten our faith. There are veterans among us who found religion so naturally in their fox holes, in liferafts and parachutes, and many have forgotten as well. We must return to God in our daily lives as the firmest basis in solving our problems, which today as before, are beyond human achievement to work out alone.

The Bible tells us peace is not to be obtained by merely saying peace, peace, when there is no peace. The Bible realistically says, "Be strong and acquit yourselves like men." The Bible, in St. Luke 11: 21, tells us, "A strong man armed keeps his palace, his goods are at peace." We should be proud of the shining armor that we wear as modern Christian crusaders—the last defenders of a way of life brought to us by Christ himself, defending against the pagan philosophies of communism that deny the very existence of Christ and all his teachings. This is the real struggle for God and country—the very precept of the American Legion.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of April 12, 1951:

HIGH-SCHOOL PUPILS HEAVILY FOR UMT—STUDY REVEALS A TREMENDOUS PROTEST AMONG SENIORS OVER SCHOLARSHIP DEFERMENTS

High-school seniors, selected as a random sample by the board of education's division of educational and vocational guidance, favor adoption of universal military training by as much as 8 to 1, Dr. Morris Krugman, an assistant superintendent, announced yesterday.

Addressing the New York City Welfare Council's unit on vocational guidance at the McBurney Young Men's Christian Association, 215 West Twenty-third Street, Dr. Krugman, who is in charge of guidance programs, said that the seniors favored UMT over the present Selective Service System.

Dr. Krugman said the study was conducted in six senior high schools and that the 8-to-1 vote was given in an academic high school, where a detailed analysis of 125 seniors' opinions had been made. He added, however, that in general the students favored universal military training. Further proof of this, he said, is that students intend to enter colleges with Reserve Officers Training Corps units.

Dr. Krugman reported that comments made by the students showed a tremendous protest against deferments for superior college students.

Col. Candler Cobb, city director of selective service, said that high-school students were pretty safe from induction even if the proposed bill to draft 18-year-olds was passed.

ONLY ONE IN FIVE FEELS FUTILITY

Dr. Krugman noted that 80 percent of the students in the survey said they were studying either harder or as diligently as they had been before the present emergency. Only 20 percent indicated they had a sense of futility in their work.

Both students and educators are confused by the ever-changing draft regulations, Dr. Krugman said, adding that this confusion makes it difficult to give students adequate educational and vocational guidance.

Despite the world situation and the emergency mobilization here only 30 percent of the students were mildly or severely disturbed by events. The other 70 percent indicated no anxiety, Dr. Krugman reported.

In the academic high schools superior students are neither discouraged nor are students leaving in droves as some reports have indicated, Dr. Krugman said. Even average students in academic high schools are not leaving. However, in vocational schools, where promises of good jobs and pay are beckoning, more pupils are leaving as soon as they have developed a skill, Dr. Krugman said.

Korean Policy in for Censure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

KOREAN POLICY IN FOR CENSURE—GOP DETERMINED TO PRESS ISSUE AGAINST TRUMAN AND TO SEEK REMOVAL OF ACHESON AND OTHERS

(By David Lawrence)

Six years ago today Vice President Truman took the oath of office as President—and now a substantial number of Republicans in party conference are talking about presenting a resolution of impeachment and trying him before the Senate of the United States.

The charge would be that Mr. Truman violated his oath of office by carrying on a war in Korea against China without the consent of Congress. The Constitution specifically says that only Congress may declare war.

The Republicans are determined, first, to investigate all phases of foreign policy as well as the circumstances surrounding the removal of General MacArthur. They are determined also to press in due time for the impeachment and removal of Secretary of State Acheson and any other officials who may be implicated in what the Republicans feel is a betrayal of the Nation's interests in Korea and the Far East.

An impeachment resolution requires a majority vote of the House of Representatives. Removal requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate. Obviously at this time, with the apparent line-up of many Democrats on the side of Mr. Truman, there are not enough votes as yet to impeach. But the Republicans will carry the issue to the country and in the next several months attempt to line up enough public sentiment to compel many of the Democrats in Congress to break with the President, or run the risk of themselves being beaten at the polls on an emotional issue.

For the whole Korean policy will come in for censure. Why, it will be asked, were 250,000 American boys sent to fight in Korea without authority of Congress and to suffer more than 55,000 casualties while the commander of the armies there was forbidden to prosecute the war effectively against the enemy?

Mr. Truman's action in ousting General MacArthur will accentuate the underlying issues—appeasement of communism in the Far East while resisting it in Europe. Some of the consequences that may follow from the President's sensational step are the following:

1. The Japanese people may become alarmed and fearful of Communist infiltration. The Communist Party there will be encouraged, for it was General MacArthur who really held it in check.

2. The Nationalists inside China will become discouraged and will feel that resistance against the Communists now is futile.

3. The British Labor Government and particularly its left wing will be stimulated to criticize American policies in the future and will step up its demand for a recognition of Communist China, admission of the Communist regime into the U. N., and the turning over of Formosa to the Communists.

4. Russia will feel that the United States Government is weak and irresolute, and Moscow may go ahead with plans to start trouble in other areas—pressing harder in Iran and Yugoslavia and perhaps renewing its pressure on Turkey.

5. Appeasement will be denounced on all sides, but nevertheless a truce involving a compromise will be offered to the Communist Chinese. This could virtually nullify all the sacrifices made by U. N. troops and particularly by the South Koreans, who now fear they will be turned over for massacre to the Communist authorities.

6. Demands will arise for the immediate withdrawal of American troops from Korea on the theory that their effectiveness as a fighting force has been impaired because no authority is forthcoming to bomb Manchurian bases or use Chiang Kai-shek's troops to aid in opening a second front in Asia as MacArthur advocated.

7. Domestic political strife will be intensified. The issue will not remain narrow, as the administration may wish to keep it—that is, focused on the simple question of whether a military man did or did not obey orders. It will be broadened to force a showdown on the views held by General MacArthur on far eastern policy.

8. An explanation will be demanded by the Republicans as to why General Ridgway was permitted to express political views on the whole far eastern political situation within the past few weeks and was promoted after his utterances. He told the press that the United Nations might well stop at the thirty-eighth parallel and achieve victory. He discussed highly controversial questions relating to U. N. policy. Was this cleared first with the authorities in Washington?

9. No committee of Congress hereafter will dare to question any military officer without the feeling that it is not getting the facts or the true judgment of the witness. Instead, only one viewpoint will prevail—that of the party in power.

10. An appeasement program could mean a third world war in a year or two, just as Munich in 1938 was followed by the outbreak of war in 1939 after Hitler had concluded that the Allies were divided and America would not fight.

These are but a few of the many effects that may ensue as the National Capital is rocked by one of the most emotional crises in many years—something that will not end with the ouster of General MacArthur but only at the polls in 1952. And all of this might have been avoided if Mr. Truman had called General MacArthur back for consultation, had given him a chance to express his views face to face, and then asked him point blank whether he wished to be relieved of his command or accept the Truman policies without further discussion. This would have been more statesmanlike than dismissing a general and announcing it first to the press of the world without even an opportunity for conference.

Certainly Douglas MacArthur deserved more consideration from the Government under whose flag he has fought so long and so valiantly.

The Impact of Mobilization on the Constitutional System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Prof. Clinton Rossiter, Cornell University, speaking at the afternoon session of the spring meeting of the Academy of Political Science at the Hotel Astor, New York City:

THE IMPACT OF MOBILIZATION ON THE CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

Life in the United States in the twentieth century seems to have been, as an amateur historian once remarked, "just one damned thing after another." The conditions under which the American system has been operating ever since 1914 have been those of emergency rather than routine, strife rather than stability, tension rather than serenity. Threat of war, war, inflation, deflation, boom, panic, depression, recession, industrial conflict, threat of war, total war, inflation, industrial conflict, and cold war with hot flashes have followed one another in bewildering succession. Four decades of crisis have left many Americans convinced that there is nothing quite so normal as abnormality.

The effects of these years of emergency upon our social, economic, and political institutions have been profound, so profound indeed that some thoughtful people are wondering out loud whether what Karl Popper calls the "open society" has the stamina to survive in a world that seems to have gone permanently mad. Our task today, as I understand it, is to do some "wondering out loud" ourselves: to take stock of our situations as of April 11, 1951; to list those changes now being worked in our system by this most recent emergency, mobilization; to recognize the threats to freedom inherent in the methods and values of the garrison state; and to put our minds at rest, but not to sleep, about the capacity of a free United States to survive this extended crisis.

The sources and characeristics of this most recent emergency are too familiar to bear repeating. Our decision to mobilize and to build up our defenses was the result of a reluctant judgment that an imbalance of power among the great nations would exist for an indefinite period, and that we had best be ready for anything up to and including all-out war. The present emergency can therefore be described as "watchful waiting." We are in for who-knows-how-many years of guns and butter at home and a "respectable posture of defense" abroad.

Watchful waiting has already worked several notable changes in our constitutional system. In some instances this has meant the acceleration or redirection of a trend already under way, in others the creation of an entirely novel arrangement or problem. But in all instances the electric touch of emergency can be clearly felt. I should like to call the briefest sort of attention to the most important results of these months of mobilization for the Presidency, the administration, Congress, the Supreme Court, the parties, the Federal system, and the Constitution itself.

The Presidency: An axiom of political science to which all history votes support is this: Emergency in the life of a constitutional state inevitably brings an increase in executive power and prestige, always at least temporarily, more often than not permanently. The past 18 years have constituted one of the great historical meridians of the Presidency, and not just because Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman liked to think of themselves as "strong presidents," men who like Jackson, Lincoln, and T. R. were jealous guardians of their legitimate prerogatives. Because of war and depression the Presidency is a visibly more potent and complex instrument of democratic Government today than it was 20 or 30 or 50 years ago.

Mobilization and cold war have certainly done nothing to reverse this trend. It might almost be said that Mr. Truman now takes for granted many powers and arrangements that Mr. Roosevelt recognized as strictly emergency in character and purpose, for example: the rich deposit of laws designed for Presidential use in war and emergency that has been building up in the United States Code for 160 years; the effective merging of the President's activities as Commander in Chief and as Chief of Foreign Relations, with the obvious result that his position in each of these areas has been strengthened considerably; and the President's participation, as the most interested third party imaginable, in the settlement of emergency labor disputes.

The most momentous change of all, one tnat has been especially pronounced in the Truman incumbency, even more pronounced since June 1950, has been the progressive "institutionalization" or "pluralization" of the Presidency. Ever since the establishment of the Executive Office of the President in September 1939, the most interesting fact about the Presidency has been the growth of that complexity of offices and officials that today includes the Bureau of the Budget, the National Security Council, the White House Office, the Council of Economic Advisers, the National Security Resources Board, the Office of Defense Mobilization, and a flying squad of formal and informal advisers. The Presidency, looked at as a working instrument of government, is no longer a one-man job; or rather, the Presidency remains constitutionally a one-man job only because there are a thousand or so persons in and around the White House, 30 or 40 of them operating at the very highest level, with the one purpose in life of helping the President to execute his own responsibilities. We will be shrewder observers of events in this period of mobilization if we will think and speak of the Presidency rather than of the President. For many paramount purposes the office has indeed been institutionalized and pluralized, and the citizen who observes Truman alone—and not Wilson, Acheson, Harriman, Eisenhower, Barkley, Steelman, Bradley, Murphy, Lawton, Symington, Keyserling, and the rest—is getting a blurred picture of our great executive institution. The conjunction of mobilization, which has thrown a hundred new burdens on an already overburdened President, and Mr. Truman, who knows how to delegate authority as well as any President in history, has accelerated this development to a noticeable degree.

The administration: The impact of mobilization on the national economy has raised up two major problems in public administration. I use the word "problems" rather than "effects" or "changes" advisedly, for it is not at all clear what their outcome will be. The most that I can do in this instance is to indicate that certain developments are under way. I would hardly dare or care to predict that they will continue indefinitely along the lines already being followed.

The first point to be noticed about the national administration under the stress of the past 9 months is that the machinery of mobilization—the offices and agencies through which we hope to stimulate production, allocate short supplies, distribute manpower, control prices, handle labor disputes, and in general produce all the guns and all the butter we could possibly require—seems to be better organized and better directed than the complexity of emergency agencies that performed these functions in World War II. I must confess that I, like any good citizen, have my full share of trouble following the lines of responsibility that head up through Mr. Wilson to the President himself; and I must confess, too, that it often seems that we are making mistakes and experiencing confusion that we were sure we were not going to have to tolerate again. Yet there are many hopeful signs, at least of an administrative nature: the forthright manner in which Mr. Truman has delegated his own authority over the home front primarily to one man, and has made him the nearest thing to an assistant president we could possibly want; the way in which Congress has left the President pretty much alone in his efforts to shape up an organization for mobilization, principally by refusing to establish an independent agency like OPA; and the vital fact that ODM is a truly parent and directing authority, as OEM, Mr. Roosevelt's paper holding company, was not.

The second problem cast up in our laps by the troubled waters of a combined war-peace economy is the perplexing and still unresolved conflict between the Secretary of the Treasury, an official directly responsible to the President, and the Federal Open Market Committee, an appendage of a statutorily independent commission, over the ticklish question of support of the market in Government bonds. Political scientists have always wondered just how independent the independent regulatory commissions really were, and the tempest they blew up in early February was made to order for classroom discussions.

Unfortunately but not unexpectedly the conflict was resolved in no clear-cut fashion, and we must wait the usual decent period to know what passed among the President, Mr. Snyder, Mr. McCabe, Mr. Martin, and the other principals. The administrative lessons we can learn from this passage-at-arms, which was clearly a product of the strain of mobilization upon an already inflated economy, would seem to be these:

First, the independent commissions—FRS, ICC, SEC, FCC, FPC, FTC, CAB, and NLRB—are not as independent of Presidential solicitude as the theory nourished by Humphrey's Executor v. U. S.[1] had led us all to believe. Second, when an independent commission exercises authority in an area in which the President is vitally interested, even constitutionally responsible, we cannot expect him to let it go its own independent way. And, third, Congress would therefore be well advised in establishing and empowering such commissions to confine them to functions that are in fact no concern of the President's. If a commission is to be legally independent, it must first be factually independent. We should not forget that in this instance the Federal Reserve System was dealing, as was its statutory right and duty, with an issue that mobilization had made equally the President's right and duty. Under the circumstances of mobilization conflict was inevitable.

Congress: The pressures of the present emergency have initiated or redirected several interesting developments in the organization and methods of Congress. The National Legislature seems determined to make the best of normal abnormalcy, to give the lie to those skeptics who insist that the one clear duty of a legislature in time of international tension is to emulate Brer Fox ("he lay low") and Tar Baby ("she ain't sayin' nuthin' "). Quite the contrary, Congress is riding high and saying plenty. Mr. Truman himself gave the Houses a left-handed but nonetheless effective compliment in his press conference of March 1 when he remarked that the debates in Congress might have a very ill effect on the success of our foreign relations. To the President's credit, it should be added that he acknowledged without qualification the right of Members of Congress to make any number of speeches on any number of subjects. Had he been asked, ex-Senator Truman would doubtless have added that the committees and subcommittees of Congress could make any number of investigations on any number of subjects in the area of mobilization, something that the specially created Maybank committee (Joint Committee on Defense Production) is just beginning to undertake in force.

Certainly the great debate, however sure the dispatch of additional troops after General Eisenhower's return and report, has been a healthy affair. Our last two Presidents have been far too cavalier in their pre-war diplomacy, and it was high time that Congress, even if it has lost all final choice whether to declare war or not, be at least consulted on the major steps that might lead to war. The debate in the Senate and out of doors brought millions to the realization that the dispatch of several divisions of citizen soldiers to Europe for an indefinite period of watchful waiting was something quite different from the dispatch of a boatload of Marines to repay an insult to an American consul by the aroused citizens of a banana republic. Congress may henceforth insist that on occasions of this moment—when the very future of the Nation is at stake, and when there is plenty of time to consult the two Houses and their leading committees—it have, like the Queen in Bagehot's the English Constitution, "the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn." The single-house or concurrent resolution could well become a vital factor in the future conduct of American foreign affairs. If used with tact, vigor, and frugality, it should strengthen rather than weaken the President's necessarily dominant, but not necessarily absolute, position as Commander in Chief and chief of foreign relations.

Another healthy departure has been the brilliant defense of the Federal Reserve System by several outstanding Senators of both parties. If the independent commissions are to maintain their independence, their first line of defense must be intelligent support in Congress. And the beginning of intelligence in this delicate political and administrative problem is, as I have already indicated, a recognition of the legitimate interests and responsibilities of the President of the United States.

The congressional ledger is unfortunately loaded with the usual array of debits. Political scientists, who suffer gladly the professional disability of boundless naiveté, probably never will understand why Congress is so remiss in the matter of self-improvement. We will never understand why something can't be done about the filibuster, lobbies, roll calls, the seniority rule, the burden of the District of Columbia, overbearing investigating committees, inadequate staffing, private bills, logrolling, lack of party discipline, and a system that forces all but the toughest or safest Member to be something quite remote from Burke's idea of a national legislator. Above all, we will never understand why the gentlemen who grieve most openly about the "designs of the encroaching Executive" are the very same gentlemen who block or vitiate those reforms that would raise the level of legislative efficiency to a point where Congress could begin to make good some of the pretensions of its chief defenders. Congress will do more leading when it is organized to lead. It is primarily for Congress to decide how important Congress is going to be in the garrison state.

Our other major institutions—the Supreme Court, the parties, the Federal system—may be disposed of briefly. The Court seems destined to go on indefinitely as an extremely negative factor in the decision of the great constitutional and political questions that the emergency keeps tossing up. The nature of the present crisis, the make-up of the Court, and the heavy-handed precedent of such World War II cases as Korematsu v. United States, Steuart and Brothers v. Bowles, Woods v. Milier Co., and Yakus v. United States lead me to predict with some certainty—and this is one of two predictions I will indulge myself—that the great weapon of judicial review of Federal legislation will remain in the arsenal of disuse where it has been, except for one or two faint-hearted sorties, for 14 years. In this regard I think the blunt words of Justice Jackson in Korematsu v. United States are well worth remembering:

"I would not lead people to rely on this Court for a review that seems to me wholly delusive. * * * If the people ever let command of the war power fall into irresponsible and unscrupulous hands, the courts wield no power equal to its restraint. The chief restraint upon those who command the physical force of the country, in the future as in the past, must be their responsibility to the political judgments of their contemporaries and to the moral judgments of history." [2]

The most noticeable effect that mobilization and cold war have had on our two parties is one that the Committee on Political Parties of the American Political Science Association must look upon with misgivings. For a number of reasons, most notably the way in which the issues of domestic mobilization and foreign policy seem to cut across party lines, there is even less party discipline in the Eighty-second than in the Eighty-first Congress. Moreover, mobilization and cold war may postpone indefinitely that break-up of the solid South that many of these same observers agree is the one sure step toward what the Committee on Political Parties pleads for—a more responsible two-party system.[3]

The Federal system—which is at once a network of institutions, a patter of legal and constitutional arrangements, and a basic American value—continues to develop under the impetus of mobilization in the same two directions it has been traveling ever since the Civil War: away from State rights and toward centralization, away from competition and toward cooperation. At the first trend we can look with disquiet but hardly with surprise. If the Government at Washington grows ever more powerful, it is because the problems delegated to it for solution grow ever more pressing. War, whether hot or cold, is a near-monopoly of the National Government. The trend to Federal-State cooperation is one that we can all welcome. Through a courageous and inventive use of the new techniques of Federal cooperation a wise Congress might yet stake out that sphere of decentralization called for by David Lilienthal in his This I Do Believe. The Selective Service System is the most instructive example of the effectiveness and essential democracy of a national program in which major policies are laid down at the center and wide discretion is left to the extremities. This truly Federal technique may be one bold answer to the problems and dangers of the leviathan state.

Finally, a word about the Constitution itself. I remember clearly, like the good student he wanted me to be, an observation of my distinguished teacher, Edward S. Corwin, on the nature of a constitution. A constitution, said he, could be looked upon as two things: as a grant of power, and as a catalog of limitations. Now there can be no doubt that the problems of the past two decades, the efforts of President and Congress to solve them, and the refusal of the Court (since 1937) to sit in severe judgment on these efforts, have placed the emphasis in present-day constitutional law on the concept of the Constitution as grant of power. John Marshall expounded the Constitution; we have expanded it. The mighty bulwarks of the constitutional limitationists—the separation of powers, the principle of nondelegation, the equal protection and due process clauses, and the necessary and proper clause—have been flattened and pulverized by the engines of war. I do not lament this turn of events as tearfully as do some teachers of constitutional law, because I honestly do not see how the United States could have met the social and military challenges of these brutal decades without a Government exercising power on a spacious scale. And however varied our answers to the question, "What has become of our Constitution?" no one of us will deny that in the garrison state the emphasis must be on constitutional power rather than on constitutional limitations.

By way of conclusion, may I make my second prediction. I feel as certain as one can feel about such things that our constitutional system will prove equal to the tasks and the threats of the garrison state. The classic textbooks, especially those printed across the water, have always made much of the rigidity and limitations in the American constitutional system. Perhaps the successors to these classics will make much of its flexibility and powers. Even now our institutions, as I have tried to show, are shaping themselves slowly, carefully, searchingly, pragmatically—in other words, democratically—to the exorbitant pressures of mobilization and cold war. Even now we are recognizing once again the transcendent political wisdom of the framers of the Constitution, who gave us a system with so nice and adjustable a balance between power, which will save us from destruction, and limitations, which will save us from ourselves.

I have tried to explain why these precedents are "heavy-handed" in The Supreme Court and the Commander in Chief (Ithaca, 1951), 48–54, 85–87, 98–99, 126–132.

Draft Deferments for College Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM K. VAN PELT
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. VAN PELT. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in the Port Washington Herald, of Port Washington, Wis., April 4. The question of dividing our society by way of granting deferments to certain classes and groups is certainly not consistent with our American way of life. I have received many protests from the citizens of the Sixth Wisconsin Congressional District and I want to protest vigorously Executive Order 10230 which was issued by the selective service office March 31. It is my earnest hope that the Armed Services Committee will see the fallacy of this order and do everything that they can to correct this injustice. The draft boards of Wisconsin consist of men and women who are most capable in determining in their own areas the deferments necessary to the walfare of our people.

WANTED: AN ANSWER

"President Truman in a sweeping order Saturday authorized draft deferments for hundreds of thousands of college boys whose grades are good or who pass a special aptitude test" (Associated Press).

Why?

To provide future leaders of this Nation? There is no doubt but what this country could stand some trained men at the helm. And neither is there any doubt but what college training is necessary for that task.

But is it fair to defer men who have an opportunity to attend college while those less privileged are to be drafted?

The argument is offered that the test is based on aptitude. If that is true, why can't these youths, who purportedly are the future leaders of the Nation, serve as all other men must do? And if these youths have this alleged superior ability, couldn't they resume their studies after their term of service as was done after the second blood-draining contest?

Or is it possible that life is so much more dear for these elite than for those of the common herd that it must be preserved?

The sweeping order is an ill-concealed attempt to save the skins of those who have the financial opportunities to attend a university. It is a scheme whereby a youth, who is not a complete moron, can purchase immunity from service in the Armed Forces. What provision is made for the student, who through working for funds to finance his education, is forced to drop out one semester to build up his backlog. Regardless of his academic standing, he becomes eligible for induction.

If ever a violation of the Constitution was flaunted in the face of the American public, this order is that instance.

If money can protect some Americans, why not hire the Hessians and protect them all?

Why?

This question will be sent to Senators A. WILEY and J. MCCARTHY and Congressman VAN PELT.

Danger From Sabotage, Espionage, and Subversion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the address delivered by Mr. Elliott Earl, former Naval Intelligence Officer, at the joint meeting of the Chelsea and Everett Rotary Clubs of Massachusetts, which appeared in the Chelsea Record, of Chelsea, Mass., on April 10, 1951:

As serious and grim as this problem is, there is no reason why I can't lighten it a little with a story or two. Perhaps I can start out by defining what intelligence is. My notion is that it is knowing with assurance. The day after I made my Bostonian Society talk I had the privilege of addressing the Faculty Club at MIT and my friend and counselor, Dr. Karl T. Compton, favored me with his presence. During lunch the subject of education and intelligence were discussed. I ventured the thought that intelligence might be a product of education. Dr. Compton asked me what I thought education might be. My answer was the incompetent teaching the incomprehensible to the ignorant—and I suppose I should say that this gives you an idea of what I think some of our efforts in connection with intelligence activities have amounted to in recent years in this country.

SPIES HERE NOT CAUGHT

But, seriously, I want you to know about the spies who have transmitted atomic information to Russia, and who have not yet been either arrested or sentenced to death—as they promptly would be if they were operating in Russia.

On March 26, 1951, the Attorney General of the United States and the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation appeared before the Kefauver crime committee. They made some very important statements. You probably heard them if you had access to a television set. I think the remarks made by Mr. Hoover were particularly significant. He said that many criminals were engaged in legal enterprises. You will recall that he said it was the duty of local communities and States to see that these characters were cleaned out. You will then recall that when Senator WHERRY pressed him about Communists in business he didn't have a very satisfactory answer.

In general, I agree with Mr. Hoover that this problem of Communist espionage, sabotage, and subversion is a local problem, but when local folks or the FBI or the military intelligence services get irrefutable evidence of espionage it seems to me that the Department of Justice should prosecute.

TELLS ABOUT TYPICAL CELL

If I am right, let me tell you about a Communist espionage cell which was operating at high speed in 1943 in the University of California radiation laboratories. Let me tell you about Comrades M, N, O, P, Q, R, S, and T—they are still free and they are still alive and none in the Government has done anything about them, in spite of the fact that one of the group was observed by the FBI and military intelligence service delivering atomic data to a Russian espionage courier in 1943.

Let's study this espionage cell, maybe we will learn something. Maybe we will then understand why it is necessary to have on the books the Internal Security Act of 1950. It is a pretty stringent piece of law.

ACTIVITIES OF WOMAN

Consider Comrade M, if you will—a woman—and in context with a consideration of her, I would like to have you consider a crate of sardine cans which contained the so-called Little Sports Collection of Bolshevik sabotage manuals written in Spanish, disguised as sports manuals. That is on the outside they looked like directions for playing games—kind of rough games—like blowing up power plants, and taking over communications facilities. You will recall the New York Herald Tribune ran a series on them called The Threat of Red Sabotage. My point is in connection with Comrade M, who is a biologist with slightly Red views, went to Spain in 1937 looking for a man. He was a member of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade who had been killed by the time she arrived. The sad duty of informing Comrade M of the death of her lover fell to Comrade N, then a lieutenant colonel in the brigade. He has many aliases and is one, if not the one most effective espionage agent for the Bolsheviks now running around free in this country. He has been arrested many times but somehow the Government seems unable to hold him, or, pin anything on him. At this time I should tell you that it is pretty well accepted in intelligence circles that the hard core of Bolshevik espionage agents are made up of individuals who served with the Communists in Spain. They are the elite of the Communist espionage apparatus. If you know of any of them keep your eye on them and turn your observations over to the FBI. So Comrade M, the woman of the cell, qualifies as one of the elite Communist spies. Who do you think she married after she returned to this country from Spain? No less than the scientist who helped to assemble the atomic bomb. Don't ever discount the ability of the MVD, the Russian intelligence service. I consider them to be the best in the world today. They don't make many mistakes because when they do they liquidate those who make them.

NOW WIFE OF SCIENTIST

Now, let's consider Comrade N, who met Comrade M in Spain and who is now the wife of one of the scientists who assembled the atomic bomb. Comrade N really is "it" when it comes to espionage, sabotage, and subversion. He was assigned as the special agent in charge of the cell as early as 1940 at the University of California to find out what experiments were being carried on there in the field of nuclear research—the Russian intelligence service having learned as early as 1939, that our knowledge in this field might have military implications.

ATTENDS SCHOOL FOR SABOTAGE

In 1931 Comrade N was sent to Moscow and there he attended the Lenin school for world revolution. There he learned the fine arts of espionage, sabotage, and subversion. Mind you, this was 20 years ago. He is today a postgraduate student of the art of espionage. He is a doctor of spying, sabotage, and subversion. He received his passport from our State Department under fraudulent circumstances.

Taking the short course at the Lenin school, he only spent 2 years there. He then went to Shanghai where he served his internship in the black arts. Back in the United States in 1934 he served as a "section organizer." Soon he was tapped by the Politburo for service in Spain—and that is where he met Comrade M, the woman in the cell. During his war service in Spain, the Daily Worker ran numerous articles praising his activities. Upon his return to America from Spain he was given a top position in the espionage apparatuses in America. He was given the job of collecting secrets about the atom bomb as it was being developed at the radiation laboratories at Berkeley, Calif. Probably one of the reasons he was given the assignment was because of his intimate knowledge of Comrade M, the woman he had met in Spain, and who became the wife of the scientist who directed the assembly of the atom bomb.

Now, Comrade N had learned his lessons at the Lenin school of sabotage well. His first job was to assemble the espionage cell. N recruited a bright lad whom we will designate as Comrade O. He was the organizer for the cell. It is believed he recruited Comrades P and Q, both brilliant students and physical scientists. Occasionally the group used to meet at Comrade M's home, either through pre-arrangement or by chance. At these meetings Comrade N would sell the idea that the Russians were allies and therefore entitled to know any advantages which might accrue from scientific developments.

NO ARRESTS WERE MADE

About this time the CIC intelligence agents became a little frantic. Here was espionage going on in front of them. Hurried appeals were immediately made to the Department of Justice and State Departments to pick up the cell—the same faulty reasoning as prevailed in the case of Lt. Andrew Roth, the intelligence officer involved in the Amerasia case. Both the Department of Justice and the State Department refused to authorize the arrests.

Imagine, if you can, the heartsickness of the intelligence officers in this case. Here they had the goods. Here they had perhaps the future of western civilization in their hands—and what happened—some strange characters in the Department of Justice and State Department—perhaps enemy agents like Coplon and Hiss—refused to authorize arrests. The Bolsheviks considered the information so important that the third secretary of the Soviet Embassy in Washington flew to San Francisco soon after its receipt. That is the receipt of the formula in Washington in the Soviet Embassy—and grave Comrade N a handsome cash bonus for his traitorous and nefarious activities.

NO AUTHORITY FOR ARRESTS

Comrade N continued his spying, and our intelligence services, both military and FBI, kept our Government informed day by day as to the activities of this cell. Our security agents at the University of California denied authority to make arrests pleaded with the authorities to discharge the members of the cell from the staff of the radiation laboratory. Was this authority forthcoming? It was not. Russia was our friend. Pro-Communists in our State Department and in the Department of Justice refused to uphold our espionage statutes. And I say to you now that it is not too late to find out who these traitors were and bring them to the bar of justice—and I demand that it be done. The other members of the Communist cell at the University of California have not been prosecuted for wartime espionage. They should be. The House Committee on Un-American Activities in September 1948, recommended that Comrade N be prosecuted under the provisions of the espionage act of 1917—the same act under which the Rosenbergs have been sentenced to death. Why hasn't the Department of Justice done its job?

As late as December 4, 1950, Comrade N and numerous other members of the Berkley Bolshevik espionage cell were cited for contempt of Congress, taken into custody, and later released in $1,500 bail.

INDUSTRIAL SABOTAGE

Three or four months ago I attended a closed conference in New York dealing with this subject. Actually, the subject of the discussion was controlling sabotage and espionage in industry. Most of the informed people in this country on this subject were in attendance at that conference. Because it was a closed conference I cannot report on it. Except this—the responsibility for controlling Communist espionage sabotage and subversion rests with the local management of a business or industry in which Communists may have an interest. I am wholeheartedly in agreement with this policy. There is no one in the stream all the way to the White House who is in a better position to identify Bolshevik spies and saboteurs than the folks who run businesses who may be the target of their activities. If you have any suspicions, turn them in to the FBI. Or if you do not wish to be identified, turn them in to me. I'll see that they get to the FBI without disclosing the source. Now, you may say, "What is a suspicion?" And now I want to pay my respect to a son of Chelsea—a great artist, perhaps the greatest in the use of motion pictures as a medium of expression. I pay tribute to Louis de Rochemont, the creator and editor of the March of Time, and such masterpieces of American life as Lost Boundaries, The House on Ninety-second Street, Whistle at Eatons Corner—real life motion pictures of America—the authentic America—the America that is, with all of the incisive clarity of a de Rochemont publication—and by that I include film production.

DE ROCHEMONT TO PRODUCE SPY FILM

Well, I have good news. Mr. de Rochemont is going to turn in his talent to help to show how the Bolshevik espionage apparatus works in this country. Actually, he is now at work producing a film titled "Turn East on Beacon Street?" He is going to show how an espionage ring actually works right here in Boston, with incidents culled from FBI files. Seventy-five percent of the movie will be filmed in and around Boston, although names and places will be disguised, as I have done in my talks. They are true incidents in connection with the work of a present ring of Bolshevik spies working against American democracy with their headquarters right here in Boston.

Mr. de Rochemont will help you to see how little people—perhaps our neighbors—who ride on busses and perhaps belong to this club, make a fast buck, and then regret it all the rest of their lives, because when they take that buck they become entrapped in the Communist espionage web. A friend persuades them to steal a small part of a secret formula like Comrade N and P at Berkeley, maybe it isn't the atomic bomb, maybe it is only some data on a bateriological test that has been run at Boston University, maybe it is not even classified as a military project. But the results are wanted by the Russians. So maybe your son or a friend says "what harm, I'll give him the answer, besides I need the money." Then when your son or your friend is approached again, what happens? He is ordered to do something—this time a little more dangerous—a little closer to treason—so he refuses. Then the MVD makes itself felt. He is told to do it. He has no choice—otherwise he will be turned in as a Russian spy. He does what he is told, and thereafter there is no questioning what he will do. He has become a traitor—an active agent for the MVD, the Russian intelligence service.

The Russian intelligence service is the slickest bunch of confidence men on the face of the earth. The reason the public does not realize this is because they do not get caught. When they get caught, they have outlived their usefulness. Coplon's boy friend, the Russian engineer who worked for the United Nations secretariat is no doubt dead now. I guess I won't say anything about Coplon—there isn't time and I do not like to get too exercised about this problem.

I am telling you now, that the danger from the atom bomb is very real and present, but it is only half the story. The other half is the danger from sabotage, espionage and subversion, which can do just as much damage to our industrial production.

This form of attack is considered by many who are informed to be much more likely than bombing. Plants engaged on defense contracts are considered to be prime targets. The range of activity of saboteurs will be wide and very difficult to detect—from damaging our utilities to tampering with the control mechanism of our production, and even creating conditions to damage wholesale our personnel engaged on defense work.

The Brannan Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Back of the Brannan Plan," by Louis Bromfield, which appeared in the April issue of the Freeman.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BACK OF THE BRANNAN PLAN
(By Louis Bromfield)

The Brannan plan, along with much of Mr. Truman's Fair Deal program, appears to be dead. Its revival or the appearance on the horizon of something like it might well occur if inflation continues to a point where the national economy breaks down and a depression follows. This, of course, is exactly what Stalin is waiting for, along with the Communists in this country and their fellow travelers in the Department of Agriculture and elsewhere in our bureaucratic structure. Not only would we be in for more intricate and comprehensive agricultural supports and regimentation, but we should find at once that the Communists were up to their old tricks. There would probably be a whole new set of borers from within like those who in the thirties infested our Department of Agriculture and made their way into other divisions of the Government.

Therefore, it might be worth while to look into the past in order better to understand the future. The bag of tricks would probably be the same.

The story of the infiltration of Government agencies is not half told as yet. And beyond it, there were other elements which confused the situation during the thirties. One of them was the fact that John L. Lewis and the CIO were welcoming the Communists into the fold of organized labor and condoning, if not cooperating with, their operations within government. John L. eventually found that you cannot play with Commies, but it took the CIO much longer to repudiate them and clean house.

For a long time certain leaders of labor have cherished two dreams. The first is to turn the whole Government into a Socialist operation; the second, to bring about an alliance between organized labor and the farmers—which alone could make it possible to attain the first ambition: The attempt on the part of labor leaders to organize everybody is not merely sociological and benevolent; it is also political, particularly in the minds of leaders like Walter Reuther and apparently, of late, even like Philip Murray. This ambition suited the Communists. It was the same trick by which they had duped the organized labor forces of other nations and then taken over. So we got a curious pattern of the Communists attempting to use organized labor, and organized labor thinking it was using the Communists, while both were bent upon using the farmer together with his great political influence.

As a rule the farmer isn't easy to use. He is an independent cuss who doesn't like Government intervention and hates anything connected with socialism. In every country where the Communists have taken power, the landowners and even the prosperous peasants and tenants represent the stiffest opposition to the regime. But to the Communist, control of the landowner and farmer is first on the schedule for the revolution—if the farmer does not raise enough food the rest of the nation does not eat, and a counterrevolution can occur.

John L. Lewis with his catch-all District 50 tried again and again to organize the farmers into a force cooperating with labor in the role of stooge, and failed. Here enter the Farmers' Union, Lee Pressman, and a very smart gentleman called James Patton. Together with certain labor leaders they decided to set up their own farmers' organization not upon a union basis but ostensibly upon the basis of the already sturdily established Grange and the Farm Bureau, both of which had steadfastly refused to be taken in either by the blandishments or the threats of organized labor and of the Communists lurking in the background.

In their corner, the labor leaders, spurred by the clever Mr. Pressman (who recently confessed that he had been a member of the Communist Party) and abetted by Mr. Patton, set out to split up the farmers and capture them by surprise. This again was a sound Communist pattern. The only thing lacking was the tools. It was quite impossible to penetrate and capture the two great farmers' organizations, so they virtually invented a stooge called the Farmers' Union. Until that time the organization had had a kind of lingering existence; it still has today save for the brazen voice of Mr. Patton, which makes it sound far more important than it is, and the sympathies of Secretary of Agriculture Brannan, who was declared the special "darling" of the Farmers' Union during its 1950 convention in Denver.

The capture of the Farmers' Union was a comparatively easy operation. Early in its career the headquarters were moved into the offices of Communists Lem Harris and Harold Ware, the latter an acknowledged, violent leader trained in Moscow. But that was not the only headquarters it used. When you wanted to contact some official of the Farmers' Union, it was often necessary to go to the headquarters of the CIO to find him, generally in Jim Carey's office. At that time Carey was not the ardent enemy of the Communists that he became when they took over his own United Electrical Workers and threw him out of office. The whole business in those days was a triple play from the Communists to the CIO to the Farmers' Union and back again.

It is probable that the move-in on the Farmers' Union was made on Communist advice, since the organization represented on the whole the farmers of the lowest economic status. Its membership is still made up largely of sharecroppers and tenant farmers, and it prospers not at all in the more solid agricultural areas or among the more successful farmers who feed the Nation. In such an organization it was possible to apply the old Communist technique of appealing to class hatred to divide the farmers, a technique still used by Mr. Patton and his friends.

During this period a double picture was presented. On the one hand there was a CIO-Communist-guided Farmers' Union; on the other, Communists and fellow-travelers working simultaneously inside the Government and notably in the Department of Agriculture. These inside operators were all in divisions set up to impose regimentation in one form or another upon the farmer, or to court him with bribes and free payments and political favoritism. There were the wise guys, like Lee Pressman and Alger Hiss, who eventually outsmarted themselves, the soft-headed sentimentalists of the Henry Wallace type who looked upon Moscow as the New Jerusalem, and the bright young men who came to town, often from fresh-water colleges, and overnight were given positions of great authority—not upon any grounds of ability or experience but simply because they were devoted to New Deal precepts.

In all of this the Henry Wallaces and the bright young incompetents were a great help. And when Chester C. Davis cleaned house in the Department (a scared Wallace lacked the courage and hid away in Virginia), a great troop of this element resigned and followed the guilty ones into the street. Most of them, like their leaders, simply moved over into other Government departments to continue their sabotage. But the purge was a great setback to the whole plan of taking over the farmers either by guile or by force, either through the Department or through the stalking horse of the Farmers' Union.

It is noteworthy that with Henry Wallace began the whole policy of taking into the Department all sorts of people who knew little or nothing about either agriculture or agricultural economics. Until this time it had always been assumed that men and women in the Department should have some knowledge which equipped them to aid the farmer; but with the establishment of countless New Deal agencies and bureaus, outsiders streamed in until 90 percent or more in the New Deal bureaus, even down to those who filled minor positions, were Communists, fellow travelers, or at least pinks. Mr. Pressman, the confessed leader, Mr. Chambers, and Miss Bentley, have testified to this. At that time or even today it would have been difficult indeed for the Communists to recruit agricultural authorities or politicians who had any sympathy for communism—except from the Farmers' Union.

In referring to the whole group that infested the Department of Agriculture, including Pressman and a half dozen other leaders who were fired, Chester Davis said with notable moderation that "their object was to remake our economic system and they would subordinate every other consideration to that end." Obviously the interests of the farmer and even of agriculture itself were of little or no importance to them.

In several cases the leaders actually attempted to carry off or destroy the records in their offices, which were, of course, Government property. A lot of their underlings resigned with them. However, a great number of those involved in one way or another in the infiltration remained with the Department and are still there, using pressures and influences toward the socialization of agriculture and the capture of the farmer. This is well known and accepted in Washington. All of these bureaucrats are in the administration bureaus set up under the New Deal and the Fair Deal. You will find none of them in the research bureaus, the extension service, or in any of the legitimate agricultural bureaus.

It is this group, an offshoot of the old infiltration, who together with James Patton of the Farmers' Union and a couple of other outsiders, concocted the Brannan plan of noisome and ill-fated history. When you take the Brannan plan apart all the past influences become evident, even to the influence of the CIO through its perpetual ambition to take the farmers into camp.

The intent of the very first principle of the plan is childishly apparent. It would lower the cost of food to the consumer while guaranteeing a profitable price to the farmer, with the taxpayer—a faceless, nameless fellow whom everybody kicks around—paying the difference. This was calculated to bring together organized labor and the organized farmer, while making everybody else happy. By tying two such powerful groups into one force it would guarantee complete political power to the organized labor group, which could then set up a labor government along Socialist lines, perhaps with some Communist trimmings. The plan deliberately left out the big farmer and the highly prosperous farmer, which meant in most cases the better kind of farmer. In other words, the rich farmer became a sort of kulak; the next stage might well be confiscation and division of his land. The regimentation of the farmer proposed in the Brannan plan was a bureaucratic nightmare and, once enforced, it would leave the farmer bound and tied, a captive and a victim.

How much Mr. Brannan actually had to do with the plan has never become clear. His is the prime example of the bureaucratic career. Originally a not-too-successful lawyer in Denver, he was one of those bright young men who came to Washington with the New Deal. Finally he found a berth as Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and when Clinton Anderson resigned was made Secretary to keep the seat warm for a political appointment after the Presidential election. Here he exercised a talent for edging upward and making his position secure. When most big Democrats were lukewarm about Mr. Truman's chances, Mr. Brannan campaigned day and night and made himself generally indispensable. His reward was the Secretariat. How much Mr. Brannan knows of agriculture and what sympathies he has toward the farmer are questions which remain wide open, to put it mildly. What he did produce out of the hat, whether on his own or as a stooge, was a first-class socialist proposal designed to take the farmer into camp and deliver him over to organized labor. And all of this was the natural outcome of that triple play back in the thirties.

The triple play is still in operation, although the CIO has cleared its skirts of the Communists and would prefer to forget the days when it played ball with them. Mr. Pressman went on to become secretary and legal advisor to the CIO and was the guiding spirit in the organization of its Political Action Committee, whose campaign turned out so disastrously in the last elections. Mr. Patton continues to be perpetual president of the Farmers' Union, and brought Secretary Brannan to its 1950 convention to be canonized as a patron saint of the radical minority farmers' organization.

The program adopted at that convention, a document written with dialetic skill and shrewdness, places great emphasis on the family farm. It neglects to say that many a large and prosperous farm is a family farm. It neglects to say with a curious ignorance of American agriculture, that the size of a farm has little to do with whether or not it is a family farm. In the Southwest 50,000 acres may be a family farm. In other areas I have known family operations on a few acres to produce incomes in excess of $100,000 a year.

The Brannan plan and the purpose of the Farmers' Union is avowedly directed at the redistribution of large farms and their division into small farms. The program implies that everybody should have a small farm, whether the unit is efficient or not. This, of course, is the first step to be taken when Soviet Russia invades a country. The land is divided arbitrarily into small holdings; then, after it has been proved that this cannot work, the next step is to establish collective farms, dispossessing the small owners and putting them all under the direction of the state.

The published program puts great emphasis on youth camps and recreation camps where special study can be given to specified problems. This, again, is a page directly out of the Communist book. It is now well known, even by the labor unions through sad experience, that such camps become centers of intensified Communist indoctrination.

Strongly urged is the formation of farmers' committees so designed as to "build a direct channel of administrative and policy communication between farmers' committees at the grass roots and the Secetary of Agriculture in Washington." What is this but the local Soviet? A little further on we read:

"The function of the local committees should be broadened so as to include responsibility in its area for all action programs of the Department. In some instances there are statutory difficulties to this arrangement as in the case of the soil-conservation district boards of supervisors. For purposes of coordination, farmers' committees should include members representative of the programs for which it has no statutory responsibility. [The object is to give farmers one committee to deal with instead of many]."

The matter in brackets are mine, but the meaning is clear enough. Plausible, but out of what book did it come? This is followed by:

"We recognize, however, that our legislative efforts must be fortified with political action. Family farming must be defended at the ballot box. Candidates must be judged, elected, and defeated on a basis of their records in light of the Farmers' Union program or our legislative efforts will be hampered."

Innocent? Read some of the propaganda addressed to the peasants when the division of land occurred in Poland. The wording is almost identical. Still further we read:

"We deplore the continuation in peacetime of so gigantic a Military Establishment as the United States now maintains. We take this position not only on economic grounds but because the existence of so large a military class is always a threat to civil government. On the same grounds, we restate our opposition to universal military training and to further extension of the Selective Service System."

Why should what is assumed to be a purely agricultural organization make such a careful point of cutting down our military forces? The next follows naturally:

"We believe that disarmament in this respect (the hydrogen and atomic bombs) and in all others must begin at once, and that the key to atomic disarmament lies in action through the UN for the destruction of all bombs, an end to further work of any kind in the development of these weapons, and the simultaneous imposition of a rigid control and inspection system."

Very plausible again and something which any citizen would advocate, but why is such emphasis put upon it by what is ostensibly a farmers' organization? And what nation is the only one in the UN which objects to any system of rigid control and inspection?

A dozen other passages could be quoted which appear equally odd in the program of a farmers' organization. (Incidentally, the Nebraska branch of the Farmers' Union refused to endorse the program and withdrew.) Naturally support is given not only to the Brannan plan but to every bureau or proposed bureau which tends to socialize the Nation and to concentrate power in Washington and especially in the Department of Agriculture. It is not difficult to see why Secretary Brannan and the Farmers Union love each other.

Recently Secretary Brannan advised the appointment of James Patton to the advisory committee on agricultural controls appointed by Secretary of Defense Symington, although Allan Kline, president of the largest and most representative of the farmers' organizations, the National Farm Bureau, was passed over entirely. The appointment of Murray Lincoln of the Ohio Farm Bureau Insurance Co. to a post on the committee was merely slippery deception. Mr. Lincoln, once secretary of the Ohio Farm Bureau, has no connection whatever with the National Farm Bureau, and only vaguely with the Ohio Farm Bureau through its subsidiary insurance company. He has always been looked upon with disfavor by the national organization because of his radicalism. In the vicious campaign of labor to defeat Senator TAFT in Ohio, Mr. Lincoln, alone among those having any connection, even remote, with the Farm Bureau, came out publicly for TAFT's opponent and gained the name of "would-be Judas goat" of the farmers. Although he represents no group of farmers save perhaps some of the minority in the Farmers' Union, Secretary Symington selected him to regulate the farmers, along with Patton, who represents the smallest and weakest of the farm organizations.

The third appointee was Albert Goss, head of the National Grange, a fine man but not a fighter like Kline of the Farm Bureau, or Patton. Mr. Goss died recently, and at this writing no appointment has been made to fill his place. So the farmers of America are left to the doubtfully tender mercies of Jim Patton, Murray Lincoln, and Secretary Brannan. This may mean that for the moment Patton and Brannan have got what they want, but it is mighty poor politics and may account to a large extent for the overwhelming defeat of the candidates who advocated the Brannan plan. The people do eventually smell things out, and the farmer is not so dumb as the "liberal" bureaucrats in Washington would like to believe. In short, Mr. Brannan has become a serious liability to Truman and the national Democratic organization, both of whom ostensibly believed not so long ago that the Brannan plan was going to take in everybody and pave the way for a Labor-Socialist government. It may just be that this is another instance of the "wise guys" outsmarting themselves.

Senator MCCARTHY has been loud and perhaps rash in his wholesale denunciations of the Communist and Socialist influences within the Government, but there is a considerable quantity of truth in his accusations. The whole truth is difficult to unearth because of the devious ways in which the Communists operate, because of the cooperation given them by now disappointed and bitter bureaucrats, and because much of the story goes back into the thirties. From the Amerasia case and the State Department's China policy through to the Brannan plan, the old influences are still operating, and as the Nation faces crisis after crisis, the whole web-like structure of influences may well prove even more tenuous than it has been up to now.

Contributions to Public Health Legislation by the Late Senator Virgil M. Chapman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARLE C. CLEMENTS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article paying tribute to the late Senator Virgil M. Chapman, published in the Food and Drug Review for April 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN

Senator Virgil M. Chapman's tragic death on March 8 brought many splendid tributes to his public service during a distinguished legislative career. To these, Deputy Commissioner Charles W. Crawford adds the following comments on Senator Chapman's outstanding contribution to the history of Federal food and drug regulation:

"Because of Virgil Chapman's great modesty, he did not gain the public recognition he deserved for his vitally important role in enacting the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938. He often told me he felt that this was his greatest contribution during his long career in Congress.

"When the bill which eventually became our present law was passed by the Senate in 1935 and went to the House, it was referred to a subcommittee of which Mr. Chapman was chairman. It was loaded with emasculating amendments forced into it by the patent medicine industry over the heroic opposition of Senator Royal S. Copeland, its sponsor in the upper House. The industry group was elated in the belief that they had such command of the situation that they could either compel the enactment of a new law that would give less consumer protection than the Food and Drugs Act of 1906, or at least prevent new legislation of any kind.

"But they had not reckoned on facing a man like Chapman. Between sessions of his committee he worked far into the nights reading publications and records and talking with persons familiar with the problems. Industry witnesses before the committee found themselves in trouble when they tried to distort facts or gloss over those unfavorable to their objectives. Always courteous and good-humored, his cross-questioning was as keen and skillfully directed as a surgeon's scalpel. It laid bare for all to see the greed and disregard for human welfare that underlay so much of the opposition to a better law.

"This hearing turned the tide. As the facts Chapman exposed became more generally known, real progress set in. He continued his active support until the measure was finally passed. He was responsible for including a highly important provision during the last committee meeting before the bill went to the floor for passage. This was section 301 (k), which asserts control over articles received from interstate sources until sale to the ultimate consumer. Chapman aided in writing the Miller amendment of 1948 which broadened and consolidated this control.

"Virgil Chapman's place is secure as a distinguished legislator, statesman, and humanitarian. The public generally, and particularly we who enforce food and drug legislation, owe him an everlasting debt. We who were privileged to know him and work with him have lost a dearly beloved friend."

The Atomic Secrets Spy Trial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Nation has followed with tremendous interest the historic legal decision in New York which saw the sentencing of two individuals to death for the first time in American history by a civil court on the charge of having committed treason during wartime.

One could dwell at great length on the meaning of that decision, and on the historic verdict rendered by Federal Judge Irving Kaufman, after what must have been, I am sure, much soul searching. But I think that better than any comments which I could make, the Judge's own address to the convicted traitors speaks eloquently for itself. His remarks may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 6 on page A1835, as reproduced by request of Congressman LOUIS HELLER, of New York.

I was particularly interested in this case because it had been my pleasure, as ranking Republican member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, to support the confirmation of Judge Kaufman, who, although of a different political faith than my own, came to us with the sort of outstanding qualifications which I have sought for all nominees to the bench. Coincidentally, in fact, the United States prosecuting attorney in this case, Hon. Irving Saypol, had also received my support, although here, again, we are of different political faiths; but his record, too, spoke ably for itself.

So at this time I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the following material:

(a) An Associated Press news story carried in newspapers of April 6 regarding the precedent-making nature of this sentence;

(b) An editorial carried in the April 6 issue of the New York Daily Mirror expressing patriotic sentiments which I think will be of interest to every American; and

(c) The text of a Milwaukee Journal editorial of the same date.

I particularly commend the reading of the New York Mirror editorial to those folks who might, unfortunately, have some bit of un-American racial or religious prejudice in their systems. This editorial, I feel, may help to cleanse such prejudice from them, and make them better Americans.

There being no objection, the article and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From a New York dispatch of the Associated Press of April 6, 1951]

SPIES, TRAITORS, SABOTEURS—DEATH SENTENCE FOR ROSENBERGS IS WITHOUT PRECEDENT IN CIVILIAN COURTS, HISTORIAN REPORTS

The sentencing of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, both citizens, for espionage adds a new page to American history. The penalty has never been imposed on a spy in this country by a civilian court.

Dr. Allan Nevins, Columbia University professor of history, author and twice a Pulitzer prize winner, said that no death sentences, either in peacetime or wartime, have been handed down by the civil courts against an American since the Government enacted its Espionage Act in 1917. This does not count executions ordered by wartime courts-martial.

Under the older laws on treason and sedition, he said, several death sentences have been rendered but not carried out. He said he recalled no major Federal civil court case in which an American traitor paid with his life.

However, in a famous case on the eve of the Civil War, Abolitionist John Brown was hanged in 1859 for treason against the State of Virginia. This was not a Federal case. Brown was convicted in Virginia of murder and treason in fomenting a slave uprising and leading an attack on the Federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Va.

Principals in other celebrated cases of treason and conspiracy noted by Nevins include:

"John Fries, an American agitator and opponent of direct taxation, who led the so-called Fries rebellion in Pennsylvania in 1789. He was convicted of treason by a Federal jury, and sentenced to death, but was pardoned by President John Adams. Aaron Burr, who after his close defeat by Thomas Jefferson for the Presidency, plotted to set up an independent government in the Southwest, with New Orleans as capital. He was charged with treason, but acquitted after a 6-month trial at Richmond, Va., in 1807."

In the Civil War period, Lambdin P. Mulligan, an Indiana editor, was sentenced to death in 1866 by a military court for treason, insurrection, and giving aid to the Confederacy. However, the Supreme Court freed him, ruling that the military courts had no jurisdiction, even though the State was under martial law, because civil courts were still functioning. Nevins said this case has "always been regarded as a great vindication of civil liberties in this country."

Several other persons were arrested on treason charges after the Civil War, including President Jefferson Davis of the Confederacy, but were later freed under a general amnesty.

The most famous American traitor was Benedict Arnold, Revolutionary War general, who funneled information to the British and later joined the British forces against the Colonies. Afterward, he fled to England. "If he had been caught, he would have been tried by a court martial and put to death." Nevins said.

Most noted cases in which military courts recently have imposed death penalties on Americans on such charges are those of William C. Colepaugh and Herbert Hans Haupt.

Haupt, 22, a German-born naturalized citizen, was one of six Nazi saboteurs executed in 1942 after they landed on the Atlantic coast from a submarine, were caught and tried by a military commission. The others were Germans.

Colepaugh, 26, of Niantic, Conn., was tried by a court martial as a Nazi spy, and sentenced in 1945 to hang. President Truman later commuted the sentence to life imprisonment.

[From the New York Daily Mirror of April 6, 1951]

ORCHESTRA OF 8,000,000

We wish to congratulate three fine Americans of our city: Judge Irving R. Kaufman, who presided over the court which tried the atom-bomb spies, and United States Attorney Irving H. Saypol and his assistant, Roy Cohn, who prosecuted and convicted those spies, Julius Rosenberg, Ethel Rosenberg, and Morton Sobell.

Some bigots will say the three spies are Jews and will denounce all Jews. They will forget to say that the judge, the prosecutor and his assistant who did such a magnificent jobs for America, are also Jews.

The unfairness of drawing general conclusions from particular instances; the indecency of fixing a universal stereotype from a bad type is here exemplified.

It would be like saying that all the fine Americans of Italian descent in our city are like Frank Costello or Joe Adonis, rather than Arturo Toscanini or our Mayor Vincent Impellitteri.

It would be like saying that all the hard-working, decent Negroes in our city are like Paul Robeson, instead of like Ralph Bunche or Jackie Robinson.

It would be like saying that all the Americans in our city of Anglo-Saxon stock are like Alger Hiss, instead of like Bishop Sherrill.

It would be like saying that all Irishmen are like "Cockeye" Dunn, instead of like John Coleman and General Rosie O'Donnell.

There is no logic in drawing false conclusions from a minimum of facts. Who dares say this Rosenberg creature is typical of our citizens of Jewish persuasion, when against him can be pitted millions of Americans such as Bernard M. Baruch, Bernard Gimbel, Jesse Isidor Straus, Barney Balaban, Admiral Lewis Strauss, Chaplain Joshua Goldberg, Rudolph Halley, and so many others who come quickly to mind?

We raise this very sensitive question because our city is the home of citizens of fairly immediate foreign origin. Of course, we were all of foreign origin at one time, and the history of our city shows that when a group became "old-timers" they tended to look down on the "newcomers."

In a list of the white population in 1940 whose mother tongue was other than English, there were 429,000 Germans, 896,000 Italians, 163,000 Poles, 149,000 Russians, 121,000 Spaniards, and 911,000 who spoke Yiddish, a Germanic dialect used by Jews. Altogether this list included more than 26 varieties of "mother tongues" for a total of 3,000,000 persons.

Undoubtedly, during the past 10 years, this list has decreased, for the pattern is constant in our city, namely, that by the third generation the process of relating the "newcomer" to America completes itself and the "newcomers" become "old-timers."

But we are not a melting pot, as Israel Zangwill so graphically described us. We are more like a symphony orchestra, in which men play various instruments, violins, cellos, flutes, oboes, trumpets, drums, and so on. Each plays differently; yet out of their differences comes the glorious Beethoven's Fifth or even George Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue.

Harmony means neither sameness nor monotony. It does mean cooperation, self-discipline, and teamwork.

Of course, there will sometimes be a devil who plays out of tune and out of time. He has to be straightened out or kicked out.

But because there is one sour note we do not tear down Carnegie Hall.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of April 6, 1951]

IT IS A LIFE AND DEATH MATTER

There was no sentence other than death justified in the case of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, convicted atom bomb spies.

In ordering the execution of the Rosenbergs Judge Irving R. Kaufman made clear something that needs to be impressed upon every American—that betrayal of our country in these perilous days is far more serious than merely engaging in an interesting conspiratorial pastime.

It is, as the court said, "crime worse than murder." The Rosenbergs plotted, in time of war, against their own Nation. From time immemorial there has been no more serious crime.

We still have too many misguided persons who seem to feel that it is still possible to play at pro-Russianism and excuse it as juvenile idealism. If the Rosenberg case helps make it clear that the struggle between the free world and Soviet imperialism is in fact a life and death matter, it will do the Nation a great service.

Strengthening of the Government's Loyalty Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an editorial entitled "To Plug a Loyalty Loophole," from Tuesday's Washington Star. The editorial relates to the bill (S. 1273) which I introduced last week as an essential first step in strengthening the Government's loyalty program.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO PLUG A LOYALTY LOOPHOLE

A serious loophole in the Government's loyalty program would be plugged if Congress approved an amendment to the Hatch Act proposed by Senator FERGUSON, Republican, of Michigan. The amendment would bar from Federal employment any worker about whose loyalty there is reasonable doubt. Had such a rule been in effect when the case of William Remington was before the Loyalty Review Board it is highly improbable that he would have been cleared. Board officials have disclosed that they had serious doubts about Remington's loyalty, but felt that the wording of an Executive order did not permit dismissal.

It was the Remington case which moved the Loyalty Review Board to request President Truman to change the order so as to give the Government, not a suspected employee, the benefit of any doubt. The Board pointed out that under the original loyalty order issued by President Roosevelt in 1942 the doubt could be resolved in favor of the Government. That order authorized the firing or rejection of any Federal employee when "there is a reasonable doubt as to his loyalty to the Government of the United States." When the postwar loyalty program was instituted, however, the wording was modified so as to require a showing that "reasonable grounds exist for a belief that the person is disloyal to the Government of the United States." The Review Board placed great stress on the "is," contending that this meant that even if the Board had positive proof of disloyalty a year or a month ago, but lacked evidence of the employee's disloyalty at the time of the inquiry, he must be cleared. It was under this interpretation that the Review Board overruled a Department of Commerce loyalty board which had recommended Remington's dismissal.

J. Edgar Hoover, FBI Director, made an oblique reference to this loyalty situation during his testimony recently before the Senate Appropriations Committee. Questioned about the presence in Washington of 210 known Communists and about the possibility that some of them may be in the Government service, Mr. Hoover commented that the FBI passes all pertinent information along to loyalty boards, but that the boards operate under the policy that unless an individual can be proved to be a Communist he cannot be denied Government employment. He added that the Communists "are not carrying cards any more and they have no membership lists."

Chairman Hiram Bingham of the Loyalty Review Board is right in holding that it should not be necessary to produce a membership card in order to oust an employee about whose loyalty there is a "reasonable doubt." The Ferguson amendment to the Hatch Act would give the loyalty boards full authority to protect the Government in such instances. The Remington case ought to convince Congress of the wisdom of adopting the amendment.

General MacArthur, American Martyr

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, since President Truman announced to the world early Wednesday morning that General MacArthur was being relieved of his Far East command, Americans have been voicing their indignation. My office has been deluged with telegrams and letters voicing disapproval of this arbitrary action of the President.

A few apologists for the Acheson policy of appeasement toward the Communists in China would have us believe that the people are supporting President Truman's action. If the reaction of the people of the Twelfth District of California is any criterion, I do not believe that this is true. Information has reached my office to the effect that the entire west coast is aroused and is seething with indignation. The people have construed President Truman's speech of Wednesday night as further evidence that the ill-advised policy of the past few years which has caused our Nation to suffer 60,000 casualties in Korea will be continued. President Truman has shown that he still places a high value on the judgment of Dean Acheson and his confederates in the State Department. The following article which appeared in the New York Times of April 11 will give the members of this body some idea of what folks think out on the west coast:

DISMISSAL ANGERS SOUTH CALIFORNIA—TRUMAN HANGED IN EFFIGY AT SAN GABRIEL—LOS ANGELES COUNCIL HALTS IN SORROW

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., April 11.—Protests against President Truman's dismissal of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur flared through southern California today and were capped in many cases by demands for impeachment of the President.

In San Gabriel the President was hanged in effigy. In the Los Angeles City Hall the city council adjourned "in sorrowful contemplation of the political assassination" of General MacArthur. Mayor Bowron said he was greatly concerned, agitated, and discouraged.

Automobiles suddenly appeared on downtown streets plastered with signs: "Oust President Truman."

Lifelong Democrats joined Republicans in the complaints.

CALLS TO PAPERS CONTINUOUS

Telephone calls to newspapers began immediately after the firing was announced. They continued all Tuesday night, all day today and on into the night again.

Thousands asked for information on how to write and wire their Representatives and Senators KNOWLAND and NIXON. Others added they were sending additional telegrams direct to the White House.

Nine out of ten were vehemently critical of President Truman's action. Occasionally one voice in the deluge would rise to defend him.

Clergymen, diplomats, and businessmen joined unidentified workmen—veterans and relatives of servicemen now in Korea—in castigating the President.

"I am thoroughly incensed," said Byron C. Hanna, former president of both the chamber of commerce and the Southern California Businessmen's Association. "Of all the series of blunders this administration has committed this is the most calamitous one for the American people.

"The administration seems to have discharged General MacArthur because he wanted to protect the lives of American soldiers fighting in Korea. The administration didn't want him to do that.

"I think President Truman should be impeached."

James Roosevelt, unsuccessful candidate for Governor last November, said he hoped the debate over the President's action "will not resolve into a political dogfight."

"The President is the Commander in Chief," Mr. Roosevelt said. "If he felt any commander in the field was not carrying out the policy of the Government, just as Abraham Lincoln found in the Civil War, it was his duty to remove him.

"Nevertheless, having served under General MacArthur's command in the Pacific, I feel from a military point of view he is one of our greatest generals."

LEGION OFFICER SHOCKED

Lewis K. Gough, of Pasadena, national vice commander of the American Legion said: "I know that the amazing news of the removal of one of the greatest military leaders of all time will stun and shock the 4,000,000 members of the American Legion and its auxiliary.

"While serving as commander in chief in the Pacific General MacArthur's voice should have been heard and listened to influencing proper global strategy. That it was not listened to is largely due to lack of requisite moral courage on the part of the United Nations.

"His unfortunate removal will jeopardize the United Nations position in the far-eastern theater and undoubtedly will have shocking effect on our officers and troops there."

Patrick J. Cooney, lifelong Democrat and father of five sons who entered military service: "MacArthur repeatedly refused to obey his Commander in Chief and refused to follow the United Nations' policy.

"This very momentous decision required great strength of character but was necessary if we are to preserve our governmental system set up by our founding fathers. History will record that President Truman was right."

Assistant Attorney General William V. O'Connor said "whenever any military commander in the field is unable to give loyal and wholehearted support to the policies formulated by the United States and the United Nations in the time of such a crisis, the President as Commander in Chief has no alternative but to relieve that commander."

Mr. Speaker, in addition to this newspaper article which cites the statements of many prominent figures including Mr. Lewis K. Gough, National vice commander of the American Legion, I have received many telegrams from people in all walks of life expressing disgust at this latest Administration bungle. The following are examples of the type of telegrams I have received:

Inefficiency and Waste in the Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH

OF MAINE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, Fulton Lewis, Jr.'s, broadcast of April 10, 1951, is of interest to the Members of this body. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD and believe that it will be enlightening.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM BROADCAST OF FULTON LEWIS, JR., APRIL 10, 1951

You, out over the country, hear a lot of rumblings about the confusion, the inefficiency, the waste, the politics that is going on in the defense program here in Washington, and no doubt it has troubled you to some extent. There have been charges that the defense agencies have been manned on a political-patronage basis, with appointments being cleared through the Democratic National Committee, that the whole thing has been made a gigantic political pork barrel, in a glorified pattern of the Pendergast machine in Kansas City, that there is no real program in the interest of the public and no regard for the amount of money being spent, that the one objective seems to be to get as many people on the payroll as possible and spend as much as possible.

You may remember the days of the dual governorship fight in Georgia, when Herman Talmadge was trying to claim the Governor's chair against Lt. Gov. M. E. Thompson. The courts ruled that Thompson was next in line due to the fact that the Governor-elect, Gene Talmadge, died before he took office, and Thompson served a 2-year term as Georgia's Governor as a result. Last fall, after completing those 2 years, he retired to private life until he was brought to Washington early this year to become an assistant to Mike DiSalle, head of the Office of Price Stabilization, in the defense effort.

This afternoon he turned in his resignation from that job, and I have here a statement from him which I believe will be of tremendous interest to you. Please note that this does not come from any Republican; indeed, until he came to Washington, Governor Thompson was an uncompromising supporter of Mr Truman and the Truman faction of the Democratic Party, as against the Dixiecrat faction. So this is the statement of one of Mr. Truman's own supporters—up until the present time.

What is even more important, it is the story of a patriotic American who has seen the inside of what is going on here His statement needs no comment from me. I present it to you verbatim:

"No one can even question my record of unfaltering loyalty to the national administration and Democratic Party. The record speaks for itself.

"In 1948, when the Dixiecrat movement split the solid South, my efforts resulted in Georgia remaining loyal to the Democratic Party.

"Conditions existing in the national administration are so deplorable today that loyalty to party and patriotism to country constitute a conflict.

"Official Washington today is drifting in a sea of confusion, inefficiency, waste, and extravagance, with the only refuge being held out to a confused people is the sign of the double cross.

"On January 21 I received a telegram at my home in Valdosta, Ga., from Mike DiSalle, Director of the Office of Price Stabilization, asking me to come to Washington to accept the job as regional director of OPS with headquarters in Atlanta. I accepted.

"On my way to Washington to assume the responsibilities of the office, I was intercepted in Atlanta by telephone calls from the Democratic National Committee telling me that Dixiecrat Herman Talmadge, Governor of Georgia, was protesting my appointment.

"Arriving in Washington, I reported to Mr. DiSalle's office. Mr. DiSalle refused to see me, and I was told to report first to the Democratic National Committee office. There I was requested to accept the directorship of OPS for territories. For the sake of harmony in the defense effort, I agreed to accept.

"For 8 days I remained in my hotel expecting any moment to be assigned to the duties of the office, and when the assignment was made I was amazed to learn that another man and I were at the same time to be sworn in for the same office, at the same salaries, and with the same duties.

"During the next 2 weeks nothing was done and no program for administration of price controls in the territories was promulgated.

"Knowing that it was impossible to have two directors for the same job, I offered to resign and accept another assignment.

"For 12 weeks I have been carried on the payroll as a consultant at a salary plus expense account of $53.48 per day. Yet, during this time, I have been consulted about nothing. I have had no assignment to do anything.

"On February 19, at the White House, I told the President the story up until then. He called Don Dawson and instructed him to see that the mess was straightened out immediately. It hasn't been done.

"Under the circumstances, I refuse to accept salary and expense money from the taxpayers when I am rendering no public service. I am resigning and returning to my home in Valdosta, Ga. I refuse to be a parasite on the American taxpayers.

"There are thousands upon thousands of others rendering no service but are on the public payroll, not only in Washington but throughout the United States.

"No real effort has been made to stabilize prices. Even those charged with this responsibility have contributed to the upward surge of prices by deliberately predicting higher prices. While the price spiral continues to rise, the bottom is dropping out of moral values.

"Thousands of loyal Americans are giving unselfishly of their time to the defense work, but their efforts are being nullified by the indecision, bungling, and interference of scheming politicians who are motivated solely by their desire to stay in power. The American people are being victimized by a national conspiracy of mediocrity.

"In 1951 is the time for the people of America to make plans to free themselves in 1952 from the gang that has led the people into this mess.

"And as for me, I will not support the Democratic Party in the national election in 1952 unless its banner is rescued from the greedy hands of the gang now hiding behind it for protection. If this be political treason, make the most of it."

That is the end of the statement.

Now, I have also a carbon copy of the actual memorandum which Governor Thompson tells me he personally handed to President Truman on February 19. He tells me the President read it in full, commented that it was an awful mess, called in assistant Donald Dawson—the same Donald Dawson who was mixed up in the RFC investigations—and told Dawson to have it corrected. Let me read you the memorandum to the President:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., February 19, 1951.

"MEMORANDUM

"1. Early in January I was told by Mr. DiSalle, at his office here in Washington, that I could expect the appointment of regional director (region V), with headquarters in Atlanta, Ga.

"2. On January 21 I received a telegram from Mr. DiSalle to that effect in Valdosta, Ga. I immediately sent a telegram accepting the appointment.

"3. On January 24 I reported to Mr. DiSalle's office in Washington and to the Shoreham Hotel for a conference as instructed by the telegram from Mr. DiSalle.

"4. While en route to Washington to assume my duties, I received a telephone call in Atlanta, Ga., from Turney Gratz, of the Democratic National Committee, informing me, in effect, that Governor Talmadge, of Georgia, opposed my appointment, even though United States Senators GEORGE and RUSSELL had recommended my appointment.

"5. On the day of my arrival in Washington I was told by Turney Gratz that I would be transferred to the fourteenth territorial region as its director.

"6. I remained in Washington 8 days without anyone informing me as to my status. On the eighth day, when I appeared in Tempo E presumably to take an oath of office as a director, I met, for the first time, a Mr. Herbert Meighan. He and I were informed that we were going to be appointed codirectors of regional district XIV. On that day both Mr. Meighan and I were qualified, through form 57, as consultants to OPS.

"7. Eight days following my qualifying as a consultant, Mr. Meighan and I were sworn in with considerable ceremony and newspaper publicity by Mr. Justice Tom Clark as regional codirectors.

"8. Six days afterward Mr. Meighan and I were informed by Mr. Richard Cook, Assistant Administrator for Management, that it was impossible to have codirectors for any region. Upon receipt of this information from Mr. Cook, and in order to prevent further confusion and embarrassment to Mr. Meighan, I suggested to Mr. Cook that Mr. Meighan be named the director of the fourteenth region.

"9. You can readily understand and appreciate the personal and public embarrassment that I sustained during the confused period of time, as I have outlined above; especially the fact that news releases, presumably by the Public Information Section of OPS, and certainly not by me, had been released and printed over the entire State of Georgia concerning my appointments, transfers, and demotions.

"10. For the sake of harmony and loyalty to the administration and my country, I have refrained from giving any interviews to the press or otherwise making my position known to the public until it has at this time reached a point that I must call the matter to your attention.

"Present status: Despite my willingness to accept practically anything that may be offered, in order to keep the administration's agency in a creditable light before the public, I can tell you with certainty that I have no status at this time. In other words, status unknown."

That is the end of the memorandum; and there is the story of ex-Gov. M. E. Thompson, of Georgia, and his experience in the defense program, which is supposed to be building up the Nation's strength for the future.

How do you like it?

Richland's New Schools

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege granted me to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am pleased to include an article from a recent issue of the Spokane (Wash.) Spokesman-Review regarding the new school buildings at the atomic-energy reservation in the State of Washington.

I am, of course, happy that the Government workers there have these facilities there in which to educate their children. However, the issue arises naturally as to the equity involved by the amount of money expended by the Atomic Energy to supply school facilities for these children while similar facilities are not granted to the children of other Government workers on other Government reservations in the State of Washington and elsewhere in the Nation. Many of my colleagues have fought long and hard and worried much over Federal funds to assist school districts to enlarge their school facilities that they might take care of the influx of Government workers and their children on Government reservations at dams, defense plants, cantonments, reclamation projects, and the whole great list where Federal aid is recognized and granted.

There should be some uniformity in the treatment of school districts. To spend $4,000,000 on one junior high school almost by wave of a hand and then to make it difficult for the granting of appropriation items such as one-fourth million or one-half million dollars for similar facilities elsewhere just does not appear to be equitable.

I am inserting this article in the RECORD because these facilities obviously were provided from funds which the House of Representatives was asked to appropriate in the guise of secrecy when there was no need of having these super-secret funds hidden behind such a cloak. They were to be used not for Atomic Energy as such but for the creation and supplying of facilities for educational purposes.

I do trust that a study of this problem will be made by the appropriate committees and some standards of appropriations arrived at that will be fair to all concerned.

RICHLAND'S NEW SCHOOLS—CARMICHAEL AND SPALDING ARE MODERN AS THE ATOM

(By Halwyn R. Smith)

CARMICHAEL JUNIOR HIGH

Every week-day morning at the stroke of 9, Nancy Ann, age 13, passes through the portals of one of America's newest and most modern junior high schools with her fellow classmates, Betty and Jane.

Carmichael junior high school was completed in Richland, "the atomic city," last year at a cost of $4,000,000.

Entering the grand foyer of the school seems to the girls that they are passing in to Grand Central Station. The ceiling is 30 feet skyward and supported by a number of massive columns, 4 feet square.

Nancy and her two classmates pass down the south wing of the school's 4 wings and enter one of the 17 classrooms. They begin wracking their brains over the intricacies of mathematics. The classroom is typical of the others and is 40 feet long and 25 feet wide. It accommodates 30 students. One whole side of the room is comprised of steel-framed windows so that the room is extremely well lighted. What really strikes the eye, though, are the white blackboards upon which the students write with black chalk.

Brain weary after toying with five times five, Nancy and her friends emerge into the hallway and walk back to the grand foyer where they strike down off the west wing. At the end of this they walk down a series of steps into the gymnasium. All told they have walked two blocks.

The gymnasium is 97 feet long and 81 feet wide. It is laid out for two badminton courts, two volleyball courts, and one basketball court. It has folding bleachers which can be pushed up out of the way to give additional floor space.

Nancy feels extremely fit after her day's exercise, and it is well, for her next class is in the music room which is directly underneath the auditorium stage. Her class consists of 40 musicians, which comprises the school orchestra. The music room is soundproofed and quite ample in size to house the embryo musicians. There are three individual practice rooms to house those students who need a little more practice to perfect their umpahs and allay their squeaks on the violins. After this they join the full orchestra and give forth with the strains of Auld Lang Syne. What catches the eye in this room is the green blackboard upon which the students write with yellow chalk.

As Nancy puts away her instrument and walks down the hall to the foyer, her steps quicken for it is lunch time. Adjacent to the foyer is the school cafeteria. She passes into it and is soon busily engaged in stuffing herself with a combination of meat, vegetable, fruit, and milk, all for the price of 30 cents. This is varied on Thursday with the pièce de résistance which is turkey. One whole side of the cafeteria is devoted to glass windows which look down over the vast expanse of school grounds.

During the day's grind of classes there are two intermission periods during the morning and the afternoon. Nancy and her students invariably retire to the school grounds which is equipped with basketball courts, softball diamonds and football fields.

There are many other rooms contained in the new school that do not concern Nancy for there is a very modern woodworking shop, general science room, audio-visual room, mechanical drawing room, handsomely equipped home economics and lecture room, school supply salesroom. All told there are 17 classrooms, one cafeteria, one gymnasium and eight special purpose rooms. What is most impressive perhaps is the fact that when small cubicles such as the janitor's supply room, halls and similar rooms are counted the school has a total of 123 rooms.

The building itself is of poured concrete and its exterior is plastered with metal trim for the cornice. It is well lighted on all sides by steel sash windows. The floors are poured concrete covered with various types of tile, asphalt tile, quarry tile, felt tile.

It covers an area of 101,000 square feet and is located on a tract of ground 23 acres in size. It has 24,000 square yards of asphalt for parking and 3,600 square yards for tennis courts.

Many community activities are held in the school, for there are classes in dancing, folk dancing, and evening games of volleyball. Then there are various classes in handicraft, art, woodworking, and others held for village members. Meetings of various clubs and groups are also held. Mixers are held after sports contests.

SPALDING GRADE SCHOOL

When Johnny went marching off to school this fall he may or may not have had as nice a school to enter as Spalding elementary school in Richland. If he did have he was fortunate; for it was designed by one of the Nation's foremost architectural firms and represents the absolute ultra in modern grade-school design.

It was completed last year to provide educational accommodations for the ever-increasing number of children of the atomic workers who have been added to the city. The building is of composite wood frame and concrete construction and cost $2,000,000. Painted a dazzling white it looms up on the landscape as a ship of knowledge floating down the ways to the seas of higher learning.

Possibly the Johnny of your town attends a school cramped by congested streets and dwarfed by tall buildings. Maybe he goes to one of the little one-room schoolhouses which are still existent in many parts of the country. The boy from the city would love Spalding for it is located on a tract of ground 17 acres in size. Every room is exposed to fresh air and sunlight. The boy from the country would probably be amazed at the school's size, but he would not be lacking the broad expanse which surrounds his own little school. The school itself covers 1⅓ acres of the tract, or more exactly 56,000 square feet.

If Johnny had entered Spalding he would have found himself 1 of 604 pupils who are accommodated by its 18 classrooms, 2 kindergartens, 5 special-purpose rooms, and last but not least, a cafeteria.

He wouldn't find himself crowded, for the average classroom is 24 by 40 feet in size, which gives him 32 square feet of space or an area 6 by 6 feet.

There are added attractions that Johnny would like; an art room if he is artistically inclined, or a library if he is literary minded. If athletic, he would like its gymnasium, which is 76 by 86 feet and equipped with three volley-ball courts. At one end he would find a stage 22 feet in depth on which he could do a little acting good or bad. Other special-purpose rooms consist of physical-education rooms in which he would be trained to grow straight and tall.

Lunch time might find him in the school's very modern cafeteria, which is 76 by 47 feet in size, but many of the pupils go home for their noon-day luncheons in the surrounding new 1,000-ranch-house district, for which area the school was built to serve. Many community functions as well as church services are held in the school.

Johnny would find Spalding not only interesting inside but outside as well, for its grounds encompass tennis courts, basketball courts, and playground equipment of every description.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL,
Spokane, Wash., April 4, 1951.

Hon. WALT HORAN,
Member of Congress, Fifth District of Washington, Washington, D. C.

DEAR WALT: Pursuant to the matter of the nursing-education program in Congress that we discussed by telephone last Friday, I believe that many Members of Congress are beginning to realize that the American taxpayer is genuinely adamant against further extravagances in Government, and new taxes are not smiled upon while the administration continues to insist on pushing their thinly veiled social program. There is a rumor afoot that in addition to paying hospital employees excessive salaries in Government institutions the proponents of socialized medicine are attempting to gain support of the national nurses organizations as a step toward controlling the medical profession and hospitals. This is purely a rumor but is worth considering in any proposed legislation.

There are many Federal educational programs in effect at the present time with scholarships in mining, agriculture, etc., given. However, none of these has entailed setting up special bureaus for its administration, but, as I understand it, Federal funds are allocated through existing State agencies with certain requirements to be met. Why can't Federal subsidy to nursing education be handled on the same plane? Under the Cadet Corps program, all controls came from Washington, which necessitated national audits at the end of the program that cost the taxpayer far more than they ever recovered in misspent funds. We had periodic inspections by well-meaning nurses who had no more idea of State requirements or regulations than the man in the moon, but they spent money and hours of nursing time in each hospital, not to mention the oceans of reports. It is my opinion that a simple program of Federal assistance to schools of nursing on a scholarship basis would produce an increase in graduate nurses, and the overwhelming majority of funds allocated would go for the purpose intended if handled in the manner described above.

Believe it or not, there is quite a feeling that all the brains in the country are not centered in the District of Columbia. The administration is supposed to support the philosophy of States' rights, believe it or not. Therefore, let's stick to the simple legislation and assist the States in producing nurses through Federal allocation with a minimum of red tape, distributed by existing State agencies to those hospitals operating a 3-year school, producing registered nurses, and collegiate schools of nursing that meet the requirements of their respective States, not the goals set by a few nursing educators from the American League of Nursing Education in New York who have not nursed a sick patient in 15 years and haven't the slightest idea of practical nursing education. They had their innings the last time and look at the mess they made of it with their uniforms, brass buttons, and costly periodical reports which I doubt were ever read.

I would be glad to appear before your committee but I fail to see where I could do any good that Al Whitehall of the Washington Bureau of the American Hospital Association could not equal if not surpass.

Kindest regards to you and Sally.

Very sincerely yours,

GORDON W. GILBERT,
Administrator.

Public Reaction to MacArthur's Dismissal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED E. BUSBEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the contents of a number of telegrams which were received at my office. For the information of the Members of Congress, these are typical of the hundreds and thousands of telegrams being received since the President relieved General MacArthur of his command. It is quite significant of the feeling of the people back home that I have not received one single message in support of the President's action. For brevity I am omitting the datelines and signatures. These telegrams came from Chicago, Ill.:

Sincerely urge you do everything possible to correct President's decision re MacArthur. Also strongly protest other snap decisions by President. Suggest you do everything possible to curb power of Executive Office in future to protect American interests. Further suggest you do everything in your power to end present Korean situation victoriously by whatever means at hand.

Western Union will not accept expression of true thoughts of this household. Let's impeach Truman.

Just heard of MacArthur being kicked out. Suggest you look for another Hiss in Blair House.

In the firm belief that Gen. Douglas MacArthur was prosecuting the fight in Korea to as near a decisive victory as can ever be attained by anyone in dealing with communistically backed or fostered forces, we believe the dismissal of the soldier in time of war conditions and conflict, under whatever guise and circumstances, gives ready aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States of America alone and without consideration whatsoever to United Nations entanglements. Therefore, we, as loyal Americans, fearful for the future of this, our country, in the hands of a Commander in Chief who gives such treasonable aid and comfort. Earnestly urge and beseech you to institute on our behalf proper proceedings for the impeachment of Harry S. Truman, and this at once or show cause.

I protest the dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur and humbly beseech you to start impeachment proceedings against Harry S. Truman at once.

Protesting MacArthur's dismissal. Humbly beseech you start impeachment against Harry S. Truman immediately.

As an American citizen and taxpayer I urge immediate proceedings for the impeachment of President Truman, Secretary of State Acheson, and Secretary of War Pace.

I want to vigorously enter my protest in the strongest possible way against the firing of MacArthur.

We wish to protest this latest outrage on the part of the pig in the White House. We demand his immediate impeachment and the reinstatement of General MacArthur.

I want to vigorously enter my protest in the strongest possible way against the firing of MacArthur.

I protest the dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur and humbly beseech you to start impeachment proceedings against Harry S. Truman at once.

Vigorously protest dismissal of General MacArthur. Suggest and recommend your immediate action in my behalf as a citizen and taxpayer.

We the people expect our Congress to do something immediately pertaining the lousy decision made about the MacArthur situation in Korea.

Demand immediate investigation of MacArthur release.

Make report to public.

Please, not another Munich. Do not appease Reds. Uphold MacArthur.

Your loyalty to the people of the United States at this historical moment will support General MacArthur's position against President Truman's latest decision to support England at all costs with American lives, to stall the efforts of an all-out war with Russia. American Lithuanians have denounced administration's policy of appeasing Russia while our country is being exterminated. We call upon you now as an American citizen to prove your right to represent our people in Washington during this greatest crisis in our history. Your own action and vote in Congress will determine your future length of servitude to the American people. America must remain free and strong to preserve everything we fought for in many centuries and to protect our citizens' lives at the expense of those who desire to conquer America and subject her people to communism. We must remain free with our own representatives of Congress supporting the great majority thinking in our democratic Nation. We call upon you at this hour to support General MacArthur's position to defeat Russia's world conquest.

Use every effort to impeach President Truman.

Let's see some action now. Make investigation and report to public regarding disgraceful firing of MacArthur. (Two signatures.)

We protest undignified and unjust removal of MacArthur. (Two signatures.)

In view of shocking news report this morning suggest the following: Immediate impeachment proceedings. Bring MacArthur home. Get out of Korea. Run alien-dominated United Nations into the Atlantic.

If impeachment of the President is not possible, let's work for a constitutional amendment to prevent such outrages. The MacArthur dismissal was an exercise of authority which might be safe in the hands of honest men, but we seem to need protection against others.

Impeach the imbecile.

Impeach the Judas in the White House who sold us down the river to left wingers, and the UN. American people never did get a chance to vote for the UN, if they wanted it or did not want it. Long live MacArthur.

We vigorously protest President Truman's action in removing General MacArthur from the command in the Far East. Suggest the general be brought home and be permitted to tell the American people the truth on conditions in Korea. We are fed up with political double talk emanating from our State Department. (Two signatures.)

The voters demand impeach President. Recall MacArthur.

Registering protest on unjust and unwise dismissal of General MacArthur. (Two signatures.)

Demand you start impeachment proceedings against President. His removal of MacArthur shows his preference for American boys to be killed in Korea.

We beg of you to fight for MacArthur, a man of truth and fearlessness. Impeachment for Truman.

A great American is crucified and Stalin's stock zooms. When the wicked rule, the people mourn. Truman must be impeached.

We veterans of Southwest Pacific protest the dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur and humbly beseech you to start impeachment proceedings against Harry S. Truman at once.

May I express with many others that the unprecedented action of relieving General MacArthur of his command is beyond any understanding?

I strongly protest the removal of MacArthur; remove Truman instead.

Impeach Truman and Acheson.

We, as your supporters, demand you back MacArthur to the limit. Fight the monsters.

Impeach the B who calls himself President.

Could MacArthur's dismissal be reason for impeachment Truman and Acheson removal?

We taxpayers of Illinois protest the firing of MacArthur and as our Representatives we demand you fire Truman and Acheson.

Consider MacArthur ouster national disgrace exceeded only by presence of Harry Truman in White House. Implore you to do everything in your power to correct both conditions.

As a citizen of the United States the only way you can support the oath you took to defend the Constitution against all enemies, foreign and domestic, is by the immediate impeachment of Harry S. Truman, George C. Marshall, and Dean Acheson. Everything they have done without the approval of Congress has brought this country closer to defeat. The Congress of the United States is now the only bulwark between the citizens' freedom and slavery under the Communists. I ask nothing but that you do your duty as a Member of the Eighty-second Congress.

As State senator and congressman we demand your action on return of General MacArthur to his former command. (70 signatures.)

MacArthur dismissal one of the greatest blunders and catastrophes in our history.

Nineteen hundred and fifty-two is too late for America. Save her now.

Why don't you impeach Truman?

Please remove the menace from the White House at once before Joe Stalin moves in.

Unless you take immediate action to force the President to represent the people you might as well resign and admit we have a dictatorship. If the only way is impeachment, let's start proceedings.

Protesting removal General MacArthur. Urge his hearing before joint session.

We, the taxpayers of Illinois, protest the dismissing of General MacArthur and humbly beseech you as our Representatives to start impeachment proceedings against Harry S. Truman at once. (Six signatures.)

Indignantly and vehemently denounce MacArthur's ouster. How stupid can we get?

You should demand the impeachment of President Truman, the dismissal of Secretary of State Acheson, and the reinstatement of General MacArthur. You, as well as President Truman, were elected to represent the American people, not the United Nations. Let's not be sold down the river.

We demand disciplinary action for Trumans' greatest mistake. Impeachment desired.

Does not Truman's removal of our great General MacArthur constitute treason? He has certainly sold out the country he swore to defend. We beseech you to start impeachment proceedings against Harry S. Truman at once.

When outside forces can dictate who shall be in command of United States fighting forces it is time for Congress to assert itself.

Please support impeachment program against Truman and Acheson.

Strongly urge MacArthur be restored; Truman impeached. (Five signatures.)

Demand action against Truman. Please support MacArthur.

Demand vigorous protest over MacArthur. Suggest Truman's impeachment.

Impeach Harry S. Truman.

Truman Administration Policies Versus MacArthur Republicism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it is becoming more and more apparent as we view the activities of the Republican Party leaders that they are in desperate search of issues upon which they can go to the country with a reasonable chance of winning in 1952.

This pattern extends even to local elections where, witness the recent test which was had in the Chicago mayoralty election. There the Republican candidate, Robert L. Hunter, and his Republican followers sought to convince the electorate that the Truman policies were leading us to disaster and ruin. Mayor Martin H. Kennelly who has supported President Truman in 1948, campaigned on his record with the result that he received a thumping majority of 152,000 votes in a light cast of votes. In this instance, at a local level and in the second largest city of the Nation, the effect of the Republicans who had injected national issues in the campaign to convert the people against the President's policies, proved to be in vain.

Prior hereto, House Republicans believing that the results of the congressional elections of 1950 were a strong trend in their direction, succeeded, with the help of some southern Democrats to modify the liberalized 21-day discharge rule in the House Committee on Rules, and reestablished the old reactionary rule whereby worthwhile legislation could be "bottled up" through a coalition of 7 of the 12 members constituting a majority of the 12 members comprising the membership of the committee. The effect of this change means that legislation could not be considered by the House unless a petition signed by 218 Members of the House was effected—a very difficult condition or procedure to comply with.

Now comes the MacArthur incident, and again we find the Republicans attempting to make capital of his dismissal, which, in my opinion, was long overdue and well-deserved by him.

Loud cries of impeachment came from the Republicans with the first news that General MacArthur had been relieved of his command because of insubordination. Today the noise is faint and indistinct because it was found that the people agree with President Truman when he said last night, "full and vigorous debate on matters of national policy is a vital element in the constitutional system of a free democracy." The Truman critics have found out in a short time that the American people are firm in their determination that they will not tolerate military dictatorship of the Peron type in Argentina, or the Franco kind in Spain, or for that matter any type of military dictatorship as against the Nation's supreme civilian authority, namely, the President of the United States and commander of the Armed Forces.

Yesterday, in my remarks to the House under title, "Our Country, MacArthur, Politics," I inserted an editorial which appeareed in the April 8 issue of the Chicago Sun-Times. This forceful article certainly expresses well the futility of Republican efforts to make capital of the MacArthur dismissal.

Notwithstanding that General MacArthur indirectly claimed today through his adviser, General Whitney, that he did not disobey orders, the record is replete with the directives given him by the duly constituted authority. I set forth yesterday in my remarks for the RECORD instances of such misconduct, and I am certain that when the full record is made clear to the American people at the appropriate time and in the proper form, General MacArthur will have been found to have transgressed more often than is generally thought today.

Mr. Speaker, personally I feel that the President, in his speech to the country last night, made his position and that of the United Nations very clear. I am satisfied that, notwithstanding the attacks of certain newspapers and commentators, the outstanding and most noted journalists fully endorse the President's position.

In conclusion, I wish as an extension of remarks to include a few of the more informed factual newspaper accounts, including excerpts from an article by Marquis Childs, appearing in the Washington Post, as follows:

General MacArthur seems to have decided that the time has now come to bring this out into the open and force the issue. He can have what he has apparently meant to have from the beginning—a full-scale war in Asia.

As a professional soldier loyal to the American tradition of civilian authority over policy, the general has the choice of carrying out the orders he is given or resigning his command.

[From the Washington Post]

THE PRESIDENT AND THE GENERAL

(By Walter Lippmann)

When Taft was President and Stimson was his Secretary of War and Gen. Leonard Wood was Chief of Staff there was a very able officer with powerful supporters in Congress who disgreed sharply and profoundly with the basic military policy of the United States. That was some 40 years ago. Maj. Gen. Fred C. Ainsworth, the Adjutant General, was opposed to what was then a new development in the American Army, namely, the General Staff which in matters of policy was under the President but over all commanders and bureau chiefs.

The purpose of the General Staff, as Stimson and Bundy describe it in their book, On Active Service, was to "meet three requirements: civilian control in the executive branch, sound general planning, and constant cross-fertilization between the line of the Army and its high command in Washington."

But though General Wood was Chief of Staff, the most powerful officer in the War Department was General Ainsworth who had more friends in Congress than did General Wood. A conflict ensued over many matters. The basic issue in all of them was whether the Chief of Staff—who is called that because he is the agent, via the civilian Secretary, of the President—was superior to all other officers of the Army. General Ainsworth resisted this idea and though Secretary Stimson had "once before been forced to warn Ainsworth against insubordination," it was not long before Ainsworth again took issue with the Chief of Staff "in a memorandum so grossly insubordinate that as soon as he read it Stimson realized that the time for drastic action had come."

Stimson consulted President Taft and Senator Elihu Root who, as Secretary of War, had created the General Staff. They agreed with Stimson that discipline had to be restored and Taft said to him: "Stimson, it has fallen to you to do a dirty job which your predecessors ought to have done before you."

Ainsworth was relieved. Twenty-five years later after he had again been Secretary of War, Stimson wrote that "since the relief of Ainsworth no important challenge has been given to the final authority of the Chief of Staff, under the Secretary and the President. Even the great Pershing, field commander of the entire fighting Army in 1918, learned that in the making of long-range decisions he was subordinate to the Chief of Staff in Washington."

It has fallen to President Truman and to his Secretary of Defense, General Marshall, to do the same kind of dirty job which President Taft and his Secretary of War had to do 40 years ago. The final authority of the Chiefs of Staff under the Secretary and the President has been openly and repeatedly challenged by a much greater and more powerful man than Ainsworth. The President and the Secretary have done their duty. They have been faithful to their trust.

General MacArthur's actions are a great enigma. He challenged the President publicly, defiantly, and on issues of such moment that they concern deeply not only this Government but some 50 other governments. It is impossible to believe that a soldier of his eminence and his experience, himself a former Chief of Staff, himself a commander of armies who must know the importance of discipline, cannot have known that he was challenging the authority of his lawful superiors.

What, then, did he believe would be the outcome if he persisted, and indeed made his challenge to the President ever sharper Can he have failed to realize that either he would have to be relieved or that the President of the United States would have publicly to abdicate the substance of his whole authority in the issues of war and peace? General MacArthur must have known that there was no third course, one of compromise. He must have known it because the President has tried compromise for over a year. But General MacArthur himself has in fact taken the position that the issue could not be compromised.

The question, therefore, is whether General MacArthur chose to force the President to relieve him, or whether he thought from what he had seen during the past year that the President would give in and would take his orders from Tokyo.

A plausible case can be made for either of these theories. Neither can as yet be proved. But this much is certain: General MacArthur deliberately narrowed the choice and meant to force a showdown with the President of the United States on the issue of a general war in the Far East. He did that by compelling the President to choose publicly between relieving him and submitting to him.

[From the Chicago Daily Sun-Times of April 12, 1951]

THE TRUMAN-MACARTHUR SHOWDOWN

Circumstances have forced President Truman to make many momentous and controversial decisions. One of these was his decision to fire General MacArthur for insubordination.

As we said in late editions of yesterday's Sun-Times, the decision was inevitable in a democracy such as ours. No general is bigger than the Government of the United States or his constitutional commander in chief.

The lifeblood of a democracy is the supremacy of civilian authority over military authority.

Nevertheless, national passions have been inflamed by the incident. National unity is threatened at a time when the Nation can ill afford to face such a threat.

All thoughtful Americans will regret, as Mr. Truman himself did, that he was forced to have a showdown with MacArthur at this time. But it was MacArthur and his highly voluble backers, particularly among the President's political enemies, who brought the issue to a head.

The President's last line of retreat was cut off when MacArthur openly disregarded Mr. Truman's constitutional powers to make our foreign policy by advocating the opening of a second front on the Chinese mainland. It was a direct challenge of the administration's policy of trying to localize the Korean conflict.

The course advocated by MacArthur was not less war but more war. It courted the beginning of a third world war at a time when the free nations of the world are not fully prepared for such a struggle.

In their eagerness to make political capital of MacArthur's head-on clash with Mr. Truman, many Republicans who have been howling for peace fell for the MacArthur line. One of these Republicans is Senator TAFT, of Ohio.

Other Americans who long have been warning against the danger of a military dictatorship in this country nevertheless allied themselves with MacArthur in his defiance of the Nation's supreme civilian authority.

The isolationist Republicans justified their support of MacArthur's position by echoing his argument that it would be possible to open a second front in China without drawing Russia into the war.

They forgot—or conveniently ignored—the fact that it was also MacArthur who had advanced the argument that United Nations forces in Korea could drive to the Yula River without drawing Red China into the war.

As we have said before, and as Mr. Truman said in regretfully dismissing the colorful general, MacArthur will still rank in history as one of our greatest military commanders. But the quarrel today is not with MacArthur's performance in strictly military matters.

In attempting to set himself above the constitutional powers of the presidency, MacArthur not only was insubsordinate; he also was doing violence to one of our most cherished traditions—that the ideal soldier is one who respects and observes the essential civilian nature of our institutions.

Next year, 1952, is a presidential election year. It is almost too much to ask even in the name of national unity that the President's more rabid political foes cease fanning the flames of the MacArthur incident.

But we can hope that the American people as a whole eventually will tire of the sport and buckle down to the tremendous mobilization job that still lies ahead of us. In the final analysis, the American people can retain their heads even when their political leaders can't.

Even without MacArthur there is still a war to be won in Korea. His successor, General Ridgway, is a brilliant and conscientious soldier who adheres scrupulously to the historic division of military and civilian powers in this democracy of ours. He merits, and we are sure he will receive, the support of every American.

When MacArthur comes home, as he intends to do, after an absence of 14 years, he will receive the tumultuous welcome earned by a military hero. We feel that he should present his views to the American people. As Mr. Truman said, "Full and vigorous debate on matters of national policy is a vital element in the constitutional system of a free democracy."

The crying need today is for national unity. We believe that the good sense of the American people will prevail and give us that unity in spite of the politicians.

Appeasement and Surrender of Independence Go Hand in Hand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, many wires, letters, editorial comments, are to the effect that Russian and other Communists throughout the world are rejoicing because of the President's removal of General MacArthur from his Far East commands.

Communists, quick to recognize their enemies and the removal or demotion of any opponent from a position of authority, are jubilant because their most powerful single foe in the Far East, General MacArthur, has been arbitrarily kicked out of the position in which for so long he has acted effectively to unite the Japanese people in opposition to the Communists' attempt to infiltrate into their government.

Acheson and those who have for so long been sympathetic to the Communist cause; who have so often, whatever may have been their intentions, followed a policy detrimental to the interests of this country, have won another victory in their campaign to displace MacArthur, to place the Chinese Communists and Russia in a commanding position in United Nations.

Last night, in New York, at the annual meeting of the New York Society of the Order of the Founders and Patriots of America, Mr. John B. Trevor delivered an address well worthy of everyone's attention.

Mr. Trevor is president emeritus of the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, which he organized in 1929. He is a graduate of Harvard and of Columbia University Law School. During the First World War, he was in command of military intelligence in the entire New York area. In 1919, he served as special deputy attorney general for the State of New York, and later, as associate counsel for the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

For many years, he has devoted his time and efforts to the elimination of subversive elements in our Government, and to the perpetuation of our Constitution and the principles for which it stands.

Mr. Trevor's address of last night was as follows:

The problem which faces us as a result of the President's impulsive action is no mere question of discipline for a general or even of justice for a great leader. You must realize that what we do now will set the pattern for the future in the European theater. If we bow to the demands of our more vociferous allies in this matter, we shall be setting precedents that will haunt us in the future. If we allow Britain and France and India to ally themselves with Acheson and his kind, what can we do when they try to use the same methods on General Eisenhower—if they insist on hampering his movements and limiting his striking ability? Stupid and vindictive decisions now may cause us to lay millions of American boys on the battlefields of Europe.

The morning papers offer us conclusive proof that this hasty removal of General MacArthur is no mere accident nor isolated happening. It is obviously part of a pattern of foreign policy which is going to be thrown in the faces of the American people before they have time to take decisive action upon the decisions which will be made. Take note of this Washington dispatch dated April 10, to the New York Times: "Britain has suggested to the United States that Communist China be brought into negotiations of the Japanese Peace Treaty, and that provision be made now for the eventual return of Formosa to Communist China. Obviously, these steps could not be taken until General MacArthur had been removed from the scene."

We shall be told that General MacArthur had to be removed because he has interfered with the political aspects of our problems. Then let us be logical. We should, on the same ground, lose no time in removing Secretary Acheson, who has consistently and persistently meddled in strictly military matters and has carried on a feud with General MacArthur with catastrophic results for the United States.

We are at war with China. Chinese divisions of the Red Army have been, and are being thrown into battle against American forces. The killing of American boys in Korea is just as much an act of war against the United States as the Japanese attack upon Pearl Harbor.

The folly of our Government in its policy toward Korea has been monumental. In part, of course, it is the fruit of the greater folly—our association in the United Nations and the consequent embroilment and prospective embroilment of the United States in controversies which are of no concern to the great mass of the American people.

The order for the withdrawal of United States troops from Korea and the abandonment of South Korea in June 1949, as ordered by the President, was an invitation to the Communists of North Korea to overrun the whole country. The subsequent order by the President for the United States troops to reenter Korea and act as a foreguard of the United Nations forces was, so far as can be ascertained at this moment, a violation of the law.

For example, section VI of the act of Congress, which took us into the United Nations, provides in substance that the President should negotiate a special agreement or agreements with the Security Council of the United Nations, which shall be subject to the approval of Congress by appropriate act providing for the numbers and types of Armed Forces to be made available to the Council for the purpose of maintaining peace and security. So far as can be ascertained no such agreement was ever submitted for the approval of Congress.

In the light of these disquieting facts, it would appear to be urgent that the American people demand of their representatives in Congress, both in the House and the Senate, that an immediate and comprehensive investigation be made of our foreign policy and commitments of every nature. Obviously the first step in such an inquiry should be the extension of an invitation to General MacArthur to appear before this investigating committee and lay all the facts at his disposal before it for the information of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, not only, as Mr. Trevor so clearly pointed out, has the President surrendered to those who by their actions, at the request of Britain, France, and India, have lent support to the Communist program, but apparently he intends to go another step down that ruinous road and after carrying on a war in Asia on the pretext that we dare not appease Stalin, that we must fight the Communists, by supporting Britain's move to cease fire in Korea, he intends to turn over Formosa to the Chinese Communists, and to continue indefinitely the occupation of Korea by American Armed Forces, to protect the British in Hong Kong, the French in Indochina; the interests of both nations wherever in the eastern world they may need protection, and so appease the Communists.

I have never favored, I do not now favor, a war in the Far East, but I do believe with MacArthur that, if we are to have a war, our enemy should not be given sanctuary, "cities of refuge," behind an arbitrary geographical line, where he may lick his wounds, repair his losses, and again go forward to murder Americans.

What, you ask, would I do? As always, I would follow, insofar as it is possible and consistent with our own national security, the advice given by George Washington in his Farewell Message to the Continental Congress, the similar advice given the Congress by Thomas Jefferson in his inaugural address.

Never would I conscript American youth, American flesh and blood, to fight under a foreign flag, a foreign commander, solely for the advancement of the interests of countries other than my own.

Mr. Truman said last night it was his desire to limit the war in the East to Korea—fine. If the war is to be limited, why then send an Army to Europe while turning over China and Formosa to the Communists?

The Tidelands Oil Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, April 12 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able editorial by Ken Byerly, of the Lewistown (Mont.) Daily News, dated April 2 1951, dealing with the so-called tidelands oil question.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS WE SEE IT

(By Ken Byerly)

WHO WANTS TO GRAB IN THE "BIG GRAB"?

The Dallas (Tex.) Morning News, according to Editor and Publisher, has launched a crusade against the "big grab" of the Federal Government, and is getting newspapers throughout the country to join.

The Lewistown (Mont.) Daily News would like to be included among those who will not join.

The Dallas paper (circulation 150,000) says the "big grab" is the Federal retention of control over the tidelands and an estimated $268,000,000,000 in oil reserves contained in these off-shore underwater lands.

The Lewistown paper (circulation 4,000) thinks that the Dallas paper has confused the issue—that instead it is advocating the "big grab" when it proposes taking these vast riches away from the people of the United States as a whole and turning them over to a few States. It feels that Texas, and a few other coastal States, are doing the grabbing. But, with $268,000,000,000 as the take, this is apparently worth a try.

ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND THIRTY-TWO MILES

It is 1,832 miles from Lewistown to the Texas tidewater at Galveston, but Montanans have quite a stake in the Lone Star State's attempt at the "big grab" for themselves, as do people in all the 17 reclamation States of the West.

To review history a bit, when Congress opened up western lands for homesteaders or sale, the proceeds went to the dry or reclamation States, of which there are 17. They used the money to develop irrigation projects.

When, this income fell off, Montana and other reclamation States were cut off from this source of revenue.

But under the Federal Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, minerals and oil on Federal lands which were reserved by Uncle Sam have closed the gap and provided money to replace that formerly received from sale of public lands.

Nobody paid much attention to the ocean belts, which are included in the public lands, until the oil companies discovered that they were rich in oil resources.

SOFTER TOUCH?

The tidelands States, urged on by the big oil companies, then decided they wished the States rather than the Federal Government to control these riches. The theory, apparently, of the big oil companies was that they could get more out of the tideland States than they could out of Uncle Sam.

But if the tidelands should go to the States on which they front, then all Federal lands in inland States should also be turned over to the States in which they are located. After all, there is no difference.

Putting it in another way, if Texas or California has a right to demand the tidelands, then Montana, Wyoming, or Idaho have the same right to demand all of the Federal lands within their borders.

A tideland test was made a few years ago, which was carried all the way to the United States Supreme Court, which decided in 1947 that Federal ownership of the tidelands was proper.

But this didn't satisfy the big oil companies, and certain of the tideland States. They continue to demand control of the $268,000,000,000 oil reserves. And this is where the Dallas News comes in with its series of articles entitled "The Big Grab," which is an attempt to grab the tidelands.

Actually, forgetting the rights of the reclamation States, we can't see what all the shouting is about. After all, the tideland States still have their fingers deepest in the "sugar bowl."

KICKBACK ANYWAY

Under present laws, 37½ percent of the bonuses, royalties, and other take from the tidelands oil will go back to the State of origin, which would be Texas in the case of oil off the Texas coast. Ten percent remains with Uncle Sam to administer the fund, and 52½ percent will be appropriated by Congress for use on reclamation projects in the reclamation States.

Congress even decides how this will be divided so far as projects are concerned, which means that the larger States with the bigger congressional delegations—such as Texas and California—will have the greatest advantage in securing the larger share of this money.

So Texas and California, for example, will no doubt get quite a share of the 52½ percent that goes into the Federal Treasury from the tidelands, to be distributed to the 17 reclamation States.

Add it all up, and it looks like the tideland States are already in the saddle. They not only want the grapes—they want the vines, too.

When the Dallas News cries about the "big grab," the term is misleading. It applies to Texas and other tidewater States in the present fight, and not to Uncle Sam.

It is an attempt to grab, by a few, what rightly belongs to the many.

The United States Can Have But One President at a Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, under our form of goverment our President is elected. We elect only one President and we must be served by only one President. No man has a right to accept a public trust whether in the armed services, the diplomatic service, or otherwise, at the hands of the President, unless he is responsive and responsible to him. When the holder of any such public trusts refuses to follow the directions of his Commander in Chief, when he no longer sees eye to eye with the policy of his President, he should relieve himself of the embarrassment by resigning.

When he does not follow that course, but persists in making his own policy, he necessarily incurs whatever shame must go with a dismissal.

No self-respecting President, no President who is faithful to his oath of office, could do other than dispense with the services of a man who willfully sets himself up as more authoritative or more important than his superior even if the latter were not vested with the sole constitutional authority.

President Truman is to be congratulated for the wisdom and the courage he displayed in relieving General MacArthur of his commands.

I am happy to note that the responsible press of the country overwhelmingly endorses the President's action, even though a part of that same press disagrees with his policy. The New York Herald Tribune of April 12, 1951, editorializes as follows:

The most obvious fact about the dismissal of General MacArthur is that he virtually forced his own removal. In high policy as in war there is no room for a divided command. Basic American policy—as defined by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department, the President, and, apparently, by the majority opinion of the country—has been to fight a holding war against Communist aggression in the Far East in conjunction with our allies, while building the alliance to a point at which it can prevent Communist aggression in Europe. General MacArthur disagreed with this basic strategic concept.

* * * * *

Here was divided command at its worst.

The Christian Science Monitor on April 11, 1951, said:

The situation had become such that the United States was speaking with two voices on national policy and military measures. Moreover, the UN commander in Korea was evidently not in sympathy with UN aims there—poorly defined as they are. The situation could be cleared up only by a decision on one side or the other. Unless the basic policies of the United States and the United Nations were to be overturned, it became necessary for General MacArthur to conform, to resign, or be removed.

The New York Times on April 12, 1951, said:

Throughout the first 6 months of the war in Korea statements issued in Tokyo by Gen. Douglas MacArthur at fairly frequent intervals indicated dissatisfaction on his part with one aspect or another of the policy, or lack of policy, demonstrated in this struggle by the United States, the United Nations or both. The record now shows that on two occasions (December 6 and again on March 24) General MacArthur was warned by the Joint Chiefs of Staff that no further statements regarding policy should be issued by military commanders in the field without first being cleared in Washington. The record also shows that General MacArthur ignored both these warnings and subsequently made such statements.

* * * * *

Policy with respect to the conduct of a war cannot be made in two places. Under the American system, and specifically under the American Constitution, policy is made by the President of the United States. The policy chosen may prove in any given case to be wise or unwise; it may require a fundamental change on the basis of experience; but the Constitution puts the making of policy in the civilian hands of the Chief Executive, and it is the clear duty of the military to express its doubts or its dissent through proper military channels and not in public debate. It is, furthermore, the clear duty of the military to follow a specific Presidential directive, such as was twice issued to General MacArthur in this case.

We have no doubt, therefore, that the President acted properly in dismissing General MacArthur on the grounds stated, and no doubt, on the basis of the record, that a point had been reached at which it was necessary for him to take this action. Nor have we any doubt that these conclusions are fully shared by General MacArthur's fellow-officers in the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In the Washington Post of April 12, 1951, we find the following:

The illustrious career of General MacArthur came to an end upon an inglorious note which will be regretted by all America. But there was no help for it. There is no room in our society for indispensable men or for ungovernable generals, no provision in our Constitution for the President to play second fiddle. Civil supremacy had to be reasserted, and it was wisest to reassert civil supremacy unmistakably. The German peril got its head and sustenance from the hospitality of the German people to a general staff that had become a law unto itself. Japan was taken on the warpath by an army clique that overrode civilian government. These things must not happen here. We all have reason to be grateful that no segment of our society has been more critical of the self-willed conduct of General MacArthur than the high officers of our armed services. MacArthur, we feel sure, had no military following outside the dazzled court with which he had surrounded himself in Tokyo.

The supercession of General MacArthur is the first sign in months of a firm hand at the helm of our affairs. Mr. Truman should never again relax his initiative. He is the Commander in Chief and the organ of our foreign affairs.

The Baltimore Sun of April 12, 1951, approves the President's action in the following language:

Mr. Truman's decision to relieve General MacArthur of all his commands was a proper and necessary one. Whatever the partisans may say or do, the simple fact remains that we cannot have two commanders in chief. All soldiers must obey the orders that come to them from above; otherwise there is chaos.

The New York Post of April 11, 1951, very properly said the following:

President Truman has shown wisdom and courage in ending General MacArthur's one-man rebellion against civilian rule of American foreign policy.

We believe the great majority of his countrymen will support the President's stand. We think history will record it as a moment in which he rose dramatically to the tragic demands of his office.

The confusionists have rushed to their posts. There is tremendous sound and fury as the Old Guard Republican battalions take their front-line places along the Potomac. Long may they rave.

Yet the issues are as clear as they are fateful.

General MacArthur was engaged in open and reckless revolt against his Commander in Chief and the civilian officials who administer our foreign policy. They believe (and most Americans agree with them) that the soundest course for America and the world is to limit the Korean War and, if humanly possible, achieve an honorable peace.

MacArthur dissented. He viewed the Korean conflict as the opening skirmish in world war III. He was determined to plunge the United States and the United Nations into all-out war with China. He did not merely voice these opinions in private recommendations to Washington. He shouted them to everyone who would listen.

When he was directed to clear any public pronouncements with his superiors, he flagrantly defied the directive.

If MacArthur's coup had succeeded, he would have in effect engineered a successful military uprising against civilian authority, which is a pillar of our democracy.

If MacArthur's coup had succeeded, the coalition of free nations in the United Nations would have been destroyed and we would find ourselves engaged in a lonely war with China's millions.

In the face of MacArthur's calculated insurrection, plainly documented in the exhibits released by the White House early today the show-down was inevitable.

Mr. Truman didn't start this fight. He didn't seek it. He tried long and hard to resolve it without an explosion.

But each conciliatory gesture increased MacArthur's defiance. The general was literally engaged in a two-front war, and his obsession with his war against the White House steadily overshadowed his interest in the Korean front.

President Truman was confronted with the choice of summary action or total abdication of national leadership.

We applaud his action.

* * * * *

The irresponsible will have their field day. Puny men who would rather fight Harry S. Truman than build freedom's defenses against Communist aggression will aim all their popguns at the President. But Mr. Truman will gain new respect and affection from men of good will at home and abroad for his gallantry under fire. There are no persuasive words of restraint we can address to the know-nothings at this juncture, but we are sure that thousands of citizens who appreciate the nature of the President's ordeal will let him know their feelings now.

In recent weeks many eminent Republican philosophers and essayists have suggested that the only real question confronting the country was whether MacArthur would let Mr. Truman remain in the White House.

Mr. Truman has given them their answer. In doing so he has reaffirmed the dignity of his office and the strength of our free institutions.

Finally, let me direct your attention to the column by Walter Lippmann which appeared in newspapers throughout the country on April 12, 1951, in which he said:

The question, therefore, is whether General MacArthur chose to force the President to relieve him or whether he thought from what he had seen during the past year that the President would give in and would take his orders from Tokyo.

A plausible case can be made for either of these theories; neither can as yet be proved. But this much is certain: General MacArthur deliberately narrowed the choice and meant to force a show-down with the President of the United States on the issue of a general war in the Far East. He did that by compelling the President to choose publicly between relieving him and submitting to him.

Republicans Might Remember Calvin Coolidge and General Mitchell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, to say that I have been shocked by the clamor in support of Gen. Douglas MacArthur in the face of his clear insubordination to his superior military and civilian chiefs is to indulge in a masterpiece of understatement.

While I myself have received almost as much mail in support of President Truman as I have from the administration's critics, there is one inescapable fact which shines out from the hysterical letters and telegrams from MacArthur's idolaters: That there was nothing spontaneous about this response.

The similarity of the language, of the names signed to the wires, letters, and post cards, and in one case a curious error in the return address, all suggest a systematic campaign with a central direction. The fact that the more scurrilous attacks on the President preceded by several hours the utterance of the same kind of attack on the floor also suggests a coordination of effort which certainly is not the spontaneous ignition of an inflamed public opinion, but rather the planned work of a sort of arson by propaganda.

THE BILLY MITCHELL CASE

In my own remarks yesterday I suggested a comparison between the action of Maj. Gen. Douglas MacArthur as a member of the court-martial which tried Col. William Mitchell in 1926 on eight specifications of a charge of violation of the Ninety-sixth Article of War, and the present case of General MacArthur as the insubordinate.

I have since received additional information which further points up the parallel.

In confirming the finding of the court—though reducing the severity of the penalty—the late President Calvin Coolidge made a statement astonishingly like that made by President Truman in the relief of General MacArthur.

It must be remembered in this context that the offenses were similar.

It was not for their personal views but for their open defiance of superior authority that both Mitchell and MacArthur were relieved, and certainly MacArthur's defiance was more flagrant and more portentous.

Are we to believe, Mr. Speaker, that in the view of the minority party a Republican President can do no wrong and a Democratic President can do no right?

I am certain that those with more time and facilities at their disposal will explore further the parallel between the Mitchell and the MacArthur cases.

NEW YORK POST SUPPORTS TRUMAN

Meanwhile, under leave, I am inserting in the RECORD the text of an incisive editorial from the New York Post of Wednesday, April 11, and, from the same paper the same day, an editorial column by Max Lerner, both of which reflect a much more mature reaction to world events than I have seen in the sensational yellow press:

[From the New York Post of April 11, 1951]

THE GREAT DECISION

President Truman has shown wisdom and courage in ending General MacArthur's one-man rebellion against civilian rule of American foreign policy.

We believe the great majority of his countrymen will support the President's stand. We think history will record it as a moment in which he rose dramatically to the tragic demands of his office.

The confusionists have rushed to their posts. There is tremendous sound and fury as the Old Guard Republican battalions take their front-line places along the Potomac. Long may they rave.

Yet the issues are as clear as they are fateful.

General MacArthur was engaged in open and reckless revolt against his Commander in Chief and the civilian officials who administer our foreign policy. They believe (and most Americans agree with them) that the soundest course for America and the world is to limit the Korean War and, if humanly possible, achieve an honorable peace.

MacArthur dissented. He viewed the Korean conflict as the opening skirmish in world war III. He was determined to plunge the United States and the United Nations into all-out war with China. He did not merely voice these opinions in private recommendations to Washington. He shouted them to everyone who would listen.

When he was directed to clear any public pronouncements with his superiors, he flagrantly defied the directive.

If MacArthur's coup had succeeded, he would have in effect engineered a successful military uprising against civilian authority, which is a pillar of our democracy.

If MacArthur's coup had succeeded, the coalition of free nations in the United Nations would have been destroyed and we would find ourselves engaged in a lonely war with China's millions.

In the face of MacArthur's calculated insurrection, plainly documented in the exhibits released by the White House early today, the show-down was inevitable.

Mr. Truman didn't start this fight. He didn't seek it. He tried long and hard to resolve it without an explosion.

But each conciliatory gesture increased MacArthur's defiance. The general was literally engaged in a two-front war; and his obsession with his war against the White House steadily overshadowed his interest in the Korean front.

President Truman was confronted with the choice of summary action or total abdication of national leadership.

We applaud his action.

In the clamor that has already begun the Republican strategists and their typewriter commandos will valiantly strive to befuddle the country.

They will attempt to prove that the only issue in the dispute was whether General MacArthur should have been allowed to use Chiang Kai-shek's idle troops.

In reality, of course, what MacArthur was proposing was no such limited and luxurious course. He was proposing—and on this point he was more honest than his political cheer leaders—total war with China. He was proposing an infinitely greater commitment of American troops to China than any now contemplated. None of his political supporters has dared to spell out the dimensions of his dream.

The MacArthur blueprint for the conquest of Asia inevitably collided with all UN efforts to achieve peace in Korea. That was the heart of the rising anti-MacArthur resentment among our allies. That was the basic cause of the deepening divisions in the free world.

Today the fog may seem thick on Capitol Hill but the ouster of MacArthur has cleared the international air.

It has cemented the unity of free men. It has destroyed any moral uncertainty about our cause in Korea. It has once again put the issue of war or peace where it belongs—squarely up to the Chinese Communists.

Mr. Truman's action has blasted the biggest propaganda guns of the commissars in Europe and Asia alike. We do not know whether new mediation efforts in Korea will succeed or fail. We do know there can be no doubt anywhere in the world about responsibility for prolongation of the war. The President's dismissal of MacArthur in itself reaffirms the integrity of the goals which we and our allies have proclaimed in Korea.

The irresponsibles will have their field day. Puny men who would rather fight Harry S. Truman than build freedom's defenses against Communist aggression will aim all their pop-guns at the President. But Mr. Truman will gain new respect and affection from men of good will at home and abroad for his gallantry under fire. There are no persuasive words of restraint we can address to the know-nothings at this juncture; but we are sure that thousands of citizens who appreciate the nature of the President's ordeal will let him know their feelings now.

In recent weeks many eminent Republican philosophers and essayists have suggested that the only real question confronting the country was whether MacArthur would let Mr. Truman remain in the White House.

Mr. Truman has given them their answer. In doing so he has reaffirmed the dignity of his office and the strength of our free institutions.

[From the New York Post of April 11, 1951]

THE CRACKDOWN

(By Max Lerner)

The crackdown on Gen. Douglas MacArthur by President Truman had to come. And it is well that it came when it did instead of being delayed again and again. There could never have been any doubt on the main issue, which was not the question of policy in Asia but the question of who has the right to shape the foreign policy of the United States.

Nevertheless it took courage for President Truman to do what he did. When a general hurls a direct challenge at the whole civilian authority of the American Government, and refuses to conduct his command except on the terms of his own political high policy, his challenge cannot be met by appeasement or double-talk or cowardly acquiescence.

There is only one way to meet it, and that is by the resolution and courage which the President has shown.

This MacArthur crisis is the first major internal crisis of the military caste that America has had to meet during this era of world wars. To find anything like its equal one must look to the political adventures of the Reichswehr generals or of the military dictatorship of Latin America. Since the days of Cromwell the British, with their common sense and their discipline, have managed to steer clear of such crises. America has had the good fortune to have military heroes like Eisenhower and Marshall, Bradley and Nimitz, who have had a basic concern for civilian democratic practices. Even the Billy Mitchell affair and the recent battle of the Pentagon over the admirals have been minor compared with the MacArthur crisis.

The first result of the President's decision is bound to be healthy. America itself was caught in a conflict of loyalties, between loyalty to democratic government, and loyalty to a flaming military symbol who had become a hero and myth to many, and an antiadministration messiah who could never do wrong. Such a conflict of loyalties between a military hero and a democratic society is bound to end in disaster unless it is decisively resolved.

We are also caught in a crisis of confidence in the United Nations, and among our allies in Western Europe and in the Near East and India. Another few weeks of this crisis, and the whole fabric of understanding that we had labored for years to build up with our allies would have toppled in ruins.

Now that crisis of confidence has been resolved, and the free world can once more stand together in unity against the threat of Kremlin imperialism, in Asia and Europe as well.

But it would be folly to believe that the MacArthur crisis is now over. In one sense the rough part of it has just begun. The real fight is still ahead.

Don't underestimate MacArthur's flair for the dramatic, or his sense of destiny at whose service his dramatic sense functions.

Will he accept his dismissal from his high posts, and come home as a private citizen determined to do nothing to split his country further and exploit the split? Or will he lend his name and fame and personality to a movement that can fan all the worst hatreds and the most inflammable emotions in the Nation?

In The Riddle of MacArthur, John Gunther says there is much of the old-fashioned nineteenth century political liberal in him. I hope Gunther will be proved right, for a nineteenth century liberal—or a twentieth century one for that matter—would never dream of pushing his fight to the edge of civil strife. Will MacArthur show that kind of restraint?

One can guess that on his return to America from which he has been absent so long, MacArthur will be received by a considerable segment of the press and Congress and the people both as a hero and a martyr. I have been traveling currently in the deeply Republican territory of Rochester and Buffalo, and many of the people with whom I have discussed MacArthur give him an almost grotesque idolatry and have made him the symbol of all their anxieties and frustrations. Both those who want the Korean war extended and those who think we should never have entered it link hands in supporting him and cursing Truman and Acheson.

Once the big batteries among the Congress Republicans and the press reactionaries start firing, the din will be deafening. This is what MacArthur has all along counted on, and the threat on this was his trump card. He is now probably ready to play it.

President Truman has known all this, which is what makes his act all the more courageous. He has shown himself willing to meet one of the peak crises of his Presidency unflinchingly.

He has been patient, all too patient, for months. He has given MacArthur the benefit of every doubt, shown him every deference.

Surely never in the history of a democracy has a civilian government acted so patiently, and never has a military man so blatantly goaded it and jibed at it.

In the end there was no other answer but to show that the foreign policy of the United States is shaped in the United States, by the people we have elected to shape it, and not at the whim of a supreme commander in Tokyo.

Wagner once had the fantasy of a Gotterdamerung, or Twilight of the Gods, in which they went down with a magnificent crash, pulling the pillars of the world down after them. It remains to see whether MacArthur has still this delusion of Wagnerian grandeur.

If there is to be a fight, there is no question that American democracy will win. But what a tragic waste it will mean at a time when every energy is needed for the larger world crisis.

Indian Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD A. PATTEN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the following recent article concerning our American Indians, written by George Sokolsky, brought to the attention of the Members of the House:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

Every day there is something new to discover in the United States. This country is so big and varied, and in each section the people are so different.

The other day I was in Tucson, Ariz., and I went to the Rotary Club there to listen to the chief of the Papagos deliver one of the most eloquent speeches that I had ever heard.

His name is Thomas A. Segundo and he is so obviously a leader of men that were he not an Indian—a ward of the Department of the Interior—he could have been a Member of Congress without any loss to that august body.

What struck me so closely is that we, who are so eager to aid every nation on earth, do practically nothing for those from whom we have taken this country; that we violate our treaties with them; and that there are bills in Congress, at the present moment, designed to rob them, to steal their lands, and to deprive them of the few benefits remaining to them.

Perhaps we need a point 4 program for the American Indian right here at home.

Millions, if not billions of dollars, have been spent by the American taxpayer on the Indian Bureau, but there is little evidence to show benefits to the Indian from these expenditures. In fact, it would seem, from the results, that the design of the Bureau has been to make the Indian more dependent upon the bureaucrats.

The Papagos, for instance, can report that they have fewer schools and hospitalization facilities than 10 years ago.

Most Americans might look at the figure of 2,855,024 acres that the Papagos have as a reservation, and assume that they are land rich. But Arizona is an arid country, its desert lands being among the least productive in the United States.

I am told that in many parts of the West the Indian reservations are on bad lands where living is difficult unless oil or minerals are found and the Indians are not robbed.

We know too little about these people whom we conquered. We, who have the advantage of living here, owe them at least the debt of fair treatment.

I have on several occasions in these pieces called attention to the facts that the so-called pigmented peoples of the world, in Europe, Asia, and Africa, distrust the United States more than they do Soviet Russia.

The reason is that they are more offended by our social attitude toward the pigmented people in our midst.

Soviet Russia has taken full advantage of this and has conducted a long and successful propaganda against this country on the basis of what they call white supremacy.

While not accepting the Russian version of our social position, I cannot deny that they have presented a picture which Chinese, Indians, Iranians, Pakistani, and all the peoples of Africa accept as true.

In Korea many of our major difficulties have arisen from the belief that all Americans hate and like to kill those who are not white.

This presents a serious problem for a nation which is seeking allies among these very peoples. Certainly our treatment of the American Indian confirms the suspicion of unfairness. Even if we cannot be responsible for what our ancestors did, we must avoid doing more of the same, and if we do not behave decently for the sake of the American Indian, we might from the standpoint of national self-interest.

I was told that some of the most outrageous bills introduced in Congress are designed to rob the Indian of his lands in the interest of oil companies which know of oil deposits beneath the soil.

It would be advantageous to the United States to give the Indian a square deal, to make him an independent citizen, and to protect him in his economic rights. We have taken a good country from him.

We have treated other peoples whom we have conquered, the Cubans, the Filipinos, the Japanese, and the Germans, with fairness. We can treat the Indians with fairness and justice.

Money wasted by a Washington bureau does not always indicate benefits to those who require them. Perhaps if we consulted the American Indians, they might come up with a better program than we have yet seen.

Address by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania, to the Federated Legislative Committee of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by me at Harrisburg last Tuesday, April 10, at the annual luncheon of the Federated Legislative Committee of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is an inspiration to meet again with this courageous group of God fearing men and women.

Over the years you have manned the ramparts defending good government. You have battled bravely for law and order, the Constitution and the American way of life.

Year after year you have taken part in government in order that we may have good laws and that good men may have aid in properly administering them.

Never in the history of the United States have we needed organizations like yours as much as we do today.

Our country is confronted with so many dangers. People point to the dangers but take no action. They fail to realize that in America the laws are passed and enforced by the people. The source of all power is in the hands of the people if they will assert themselves.

The greatest danger to America is not from without. It is from within. The real dangers are here at home.

The terrible revelations we have had during the last few months should shake us out of our complacency.

There has been brought forcefully to our attention the existence of widespread evils which threaten the foundations of free government.

There has been produced clear and convincing evidence that men in high Government places have betrayed the responsibilities entrusted to them.

We have been told how racketeers and gambling syndicates have gained wealth and power through corrupt alliances with some law enforcement officers and crooked politicians.

These shocking disclosures should have only one meaning. They should be a call to every decent, self-respecting American to engage in relentless war against the forces of vice and lawlessness.

Senator FULBRIGHT stated the case very clearly when he said:

"It is bad enough to have corruption in our midst but it is worse if it is to be condoned and accepted as inevitable."

It has been proposed that we formulate a new statement of ethical standards and moral principles for the conduct of public affairs.

That might be helpful, but I believe we can place complete reliance upon the eternal truths that have guided men of good will on the path of honor and righteousness since the dawn of Christianity.

No man in possession of his mental faculties is unable to distinguish between right and wrong. Even those whose vision is blinded by selfishness, greed, and the desire for quick riches are aware of what is good and what is in violation of law or morality.

No man-made code of ethics can replace the guide to human conduct set forth in the Ten Commandments, the Golden Rule, and the Sermon on the Mount.

Obedience to the laws of God and man is the foundation of good citizenship and good government.

Patriotism, religion, and high moral standards are fundamental qualities without which no nation can go forward.

Regardless of its form of government, regardless of the laws placed upon its books, no nation can rise above the moral and spiritual standards of its people.

No community can be better than its individuals.

That is why I say that every good citizen, every man and woman who worships at the altar of God, should take an intelligent, patriotic, and militant part in government.

That means taking part in politics. It means working for the election of men of integrity and high character—dedicated to public service rather than personal power or private gain.

It means arousing public opinion to a higher standard of morality, to inspire deeper respect for the law and to assure confidence in the integrity of our officials and our courts.

An informed and aroused electorate could overnight transform corruption into sound government by turning grafting officials out of office.

In his testimony before the Kefauver Crime Investigating Committee, J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, made this significant statement, and I quote:

"If the laws against gambling were earnestly and vigorously enforced, organized gambling would be eliminated within 48 hours in any community in the land."

I agree wholeheartedly with Mr. Hoover but I know that permanent results cannot be achieved without a great awakening of civic responsibility.

The most effective leadership in that direction should, and must, come from the pulpit and from the great body of laymen who hold official positions in our church organizations.

The ills from which our Nation suffers today can be overcome if we have a strong, militant church, battling day in and day out, for good sound, clean, economic Government.

That means fighting for a solvent America. It means vigorous and aggressive action against all forms of waste and extravagance in Government spending. It means determined opposition to unsound fiscal policies, unbalanced budgets, excessive taxation, increasing public debt, and the destructive force of runaway inflation.

We must remember that bankruptcy is the inevitable consequence of spending beyond one's means, whether by an individual or a government. And we must take warning from history that national bankruptcy always brings a totalitarian form of government. That means the loss of all individual freedom, including the most precious of all, freedom of religion.

Therefore, I say to you men and women of the church, clean and decent government is your business. Economy in government is your business.

There must be a real understanding of patriotic Americanism. All must recognize the sovereignty of God and the immortality of the soul. Then we shall have brotherhood among men. Churches and nations will unite for peace and good will in the world.

Lastly, in this period of stress and uncertainty we should all live so we may be counted on the Lord's side.

That will give us an army of such strength and with such faith that none can defeat us.

Immigration Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 6, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to direct the attention of my colleagues to the following resolution which was adopted by the United States Grand Lodge, Independent Order Brith Abraham, with reference to pending immigration bills. I heartily endorse the recommendations set forth therein.

Whereas for more than 2 years committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives have been studying and conducting hearings for the purpose of revising the United States immigration and nationality laws; and

Whereas hearings on bills introduced by Senator PAT MCCARRAN, Representative FRANCIS E. WALTER, and Representative EMANUEL CELLER are now being held in Washington before a Joint House and Senate Judiciary Committee: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Independent Order Brith Abraham go on record that the sections of the proposed bill the order is interested in are:

1. To support the pooling of unused quotas, which would utilize unused portions of annual quotas and make them available to other qualified immigrants so as to assure the admission of the over-all total of 154,000 immigrants per year as originally fixed by Congress.

2. To support maximum review of judicial and administrative rulings and to support the proposal for the establishment of a Visa Review Board, the same as presently exists in the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

3. To oppose any provisions in the bill which do away with or fail to include provisions for statutes of limitations.

4. To oppose the principle of selective immigration on the ground that it approaches the immigrant from an economic standpoint; regards immigrants as commodities, and ignores the basis of traditional American immigration policies.

5. To support the principles of equal treatment of involuntary members of totalitarian groups, whether of the left or right.

6. To favor the use of the latest possible census period as a basis for computing quotas so as to take into account the latest changes for distribution of population.

7. To support liberalization of the provisions for suspension of deportation, and not to remove the existing law which requires either a stated period of residence or proof that deportation would result in hardship.

LOUIS A. WEISSMAN,
Grand Master.
ADOLPH STERN,
Grand Secretary.

The Communists Rejoice Over the Removal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the editorial in the Times-Herald of April 13, 1951, by Robert R. McCormick, editor and publisher, expresses quite accurately the sentiments that are disclosed by true Americans from whom I am receiving communications.

The Communists have infiltrated into the key positions of our Government throughout a long period of time, and have practically taken over our foreign policies. Some years ago I published at my own expense a list of over 600 alleged Communists in Government, and gave the name and address of each, and claimed no immunity for mentioning their names and alleged communism. I circulated this list among all of the Legion posts of my district. This was years before present developments.

I have called attention time and again in the RECORD of the activities of Alger Hiss in the trade-agreements program. It will be recalled that I warned the House that a large percent of the 101 experts who went to the Geneva Conference to deal with tariff rates were Communists.

The time has long since passed when the American people can afford to surrender their vital interests to these subversive elements, domestic and foreign, that are now applauding the removal of General MacArthur in the Far East.

Under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting as a part of my remarks the editorial to which I have referred:

LITTLE LIES TO SUPPORT THE BIG LIE

The Communist Party in the United States has enthusiastically endorsed the dismissal of General MacArthur, calling him an "ultra-warmonger" and "the Caesar of the Pacific." They know their real enemies from their pretended ones.

The British Socialists are ecstatic, for they really procured MacArthur's dismissal through their tool, Acheson, the Anglo-Canadian friend of traitors. They hate the general because his efforts to rehabilitate Japan threaten them with a trade rival. They are anxious to give Korea and Formosa to the Communists as a bribe for their retention of Hong Kong.

The French are also exultant. Their political structure is so permeated with communism that they can organize neither industry nor an army effectively enough to defend themselves. Their contributions to the United Nations forces in Korea have been minuscule, and they resent the use of American forces there. The French want those divisions in Europe to give France the protection her people will not give themselves.

NATION SHOCKED

The people who are shocked and horrified by Mr. Truman's dismissal of the Nation's greatest soldier are the voters of the United States. Their spontaneous protests have overwhelmed the telegraph offices of Washington. Thousands of their messages demand the impeachment of Truman and Acheson.

Mr. Truman went on the radio Wednesday night in an effort to stem this national tide of anger. He and Acheson realized that they had fired the general for saying what the people of the Nation think. It was therefore necessary for Truman to defend his foreign policy, particularly in Asia. That policy is based on a big lie, the big lie of collective security. Its defense required a series of little falsehoods and half truths.

"If history has taught us anything," asserted Mr. Truman, "it is that aggression anywhere in the world is a threat to peace everywhere in the world."

This is a lie, often repeated to justify killing American youths in every swamp or desert on the globe, in the role of world policemen. If aggression anywhere is a threat to peace everywhere, why is Mr. Truman silent about British aggression against the free nation of Egypt; about British exploitation of Iranian oil that is threatening to drive the Persians into the arms of Russia; about French enslavement of Morocco, and all the other aggressions of European colonialism?

He dwelt on free nations banding together for collective security. This is a double-barreled lie. There are no free countries aside from the United States, Scandinavia, and Switzerland. Britain is a Socialist tyranny at home and a colonial tyranny abroad. France combines Communist decay with tottering imperialism. Both have succumbed to the theory that man is the property of the state, which Truman seeks to inflict on us, and that means the death of freedom.

As for collective security, where is it? We provide the security, and the rest of the world does the collecting. The United Nations is a fraud. It reluctantly endorsed Mr. Truman's unconstitutional war in Korea, and has been doing everything in its power since to placate the Communists and give them across the conference table what they have failed to win by arms.

LIMITED WAR IS ITSELF A LIE

Mr. Truman said that in Korea we have taught the enemy a lesson. In the next breath he said that the enemy is building up forces for a new attack. What he didn't say is that this rally of Communist strength is being accomplished with his approval and assistance. His directive of March 20 forbade General MacArthur to go in force across the thirty-eighth parallel. This is what Mr. Truman calls limited war. It is not limited merely to Korea. It is limited to South Korea.

"Limited war" is in itself a lie. What is being conducted in Korea, by direction of Truman and the United Nations, is a war without an objective and without end. This is supposed to keep us out of a general war. Communist China fights us, but we are not to fight China. There is nothing limited about the casualties that this folly has inflicted on America.

Mr. Truman quite obviously doesn't want a military victory in Korea because the British, who dominate his policy, don't want one. This sell-out to the Reds is already prepared. They are to have Formosa and a seat in U. N., the British promise. In these circumstances Mr. Truman's conditions for peace in Korea become a mockery.

He says that fighting must stop, concrete steps must be taken to insure against resumption of fighting, and there must be an end to the aggression. This, he says, will prepare the way for the unification of Korea and the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

These are empty words. They cannot mean what Mr. Truman wants people to believe they mean. If he and the United Nations pursue such a program, Korea will be unified, but it will be as a Red Korea.

He would withdraw foreign forces. That leaves the North Korean Communist Army the master of the peninsula.

Mr. Truman's joint chiefs of staff only recently reported that it had no supply of such infantry weapons as mortars and machine guns with which to arm idle South Korean reserves. Those weapons, apparently, are earmarked for Europe. The Truman program, his speech makes apparent, is to liquidate his Korean misadventure in order to prepare American conscripts for a new slaughter across the Atlantic.

Truman's folly is as appalling as his falsehoods.

He and his Svengali, Acheson, must be impeached.

Scandal Marked White House Since Truman Took Over Rule

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the deluge of telegrams and letters from the highways and byways of the Nation and from people in all walks of life, protesting the middle-of-the-night action of President Truman in firing General MacArthur and the bitterness which his action has engendered on the home front is due in a large measure to the nausea inflicted on the people by the Truman administration.

This latest episode came almost 6 years ago to the day from the time the ex-Missouri haberdasher, who had been rescued by Tom Pendergast, was shoved behind the Chief Executive's desk in the White House.

On that occasion, Mr. Truman likened his feelings to having a load of hay fall on him. Almost each new act and each new utterance emphasizes the existence of the effects of such an experience.

Millions of Americans are suffering from an ailment which the family physician used to call overloaded stomach. They are sick at stomach and weary at heart. The high blood pressure among the citizens, brought on by the MacArthur removal, is as much a flare-up from national malnutrition caused by absence of grounds for confidence in officials in charge of foreign and domestic affairs in Washington as anything else.

This malady has been induced and aggravated by ptomaine poisoning from such things as 5-percenters, mink coats, deep freezers, perjury, disclosures of alliances between politicians and crooks, and ill-framed utterances from the White House in men's room language, concerning punched noses to be forthcoming when the Chief Executive turns in the keys to the White House because certain newspapermen have not always said honeyed words about the President and his family.

American citizens are once again proving themselves a patient lot. The President would do well to look about him for this trait in his fellow citizens and try to absorb some of it himself in these trying times.

Americans have had the atom-bomb secret stolen from them by Communist spies and yet heard the Chief Executive berate a congressional committee attempting to expose Moscow-directed espionage operations. They have learned of the theft of top-flight Government secrets and yet heard the Secretary of State say "he would not turn his back" on one of his aides accused in the plot. The aide, incidentally, was convicted of perjury and is now in jail.

They have tolerated a long list of scandals that have decorated the Truman Fair Deal administration like a Christmas tree.

A Washington newspaper, the Times-Herald, has summarized these scandals which have been inflicted on the public since Mr. Truman became boss in the White House. It appears they will have historical significance in this great and tragic era, and for that reason I am asking that the article be made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

SCANDAL MARKED WHITE HOUSE SINCE TRUMAN TOOK OVER RULE—FAVORITISM, INFLUENCE ORDER OF THE DAY PUNCTUATED WITH FREEZERS, MINK COATS

The Truman administration has been pockmarked by scandals almost from the day Harry S. Truman raised his right hand in the Cabinet room of the executive offices and became the thirty-third President of the United States.

While the new Chief Executive humbly begged for help in carrying out the task thrust upon his shoulders by death, an army of cronies, friends, political pals, and relatives went to work to help themselves mostly at the expense of taxpayers.

Favoritism and influence became the order of the day. Fixers, swindlers, manipulators, Communist spies, and Red fellow travelers operated within the administration and even from within the White House.

SCANDALS GALORE

The administration has been marked by scandals bursting in the air. These include favors, vote frauds, deep freezes, mink coats, vast profits for pals, spying, treason, 5 percent operations, and other forms of graft and corruption.

Administration apologists maintain that Mr. Truman doesn't know about the corruption around him. Critics maintain he doesn't care. The record is at hand to speak for itself.

Shortly after he became Vice President, Mr. Truman flew to Kansas City to attend the funeral of Tom Pendergast, boss of the notorious Kansas City Democratic machine, who had not long before been released from prison for income-tax evasion. Pendergast had picked Mr. Truman, after he had failed as a haberdasher, and launched him into politics. For loyal service to the machine Pendergast made him a Senator.

FIRED PENDERGAST'S JAILER

Almost his first act as President was to fire Maurice Milligán, United States attorney general in Kansas City. Milligan had put Pendergast in jail. Mr. Truman also fired Attorney General Francis Biddle, who had refused to remove Milligan.

Mr. Truman won the senatorial election in 1934 by 41,000 votes. The majority came from Kansas City where the Pendergast machine had long been and still is adept at stealing votes. In the 1934 election the announced count showed 120,180 votes for Mr. Truman and only 1,221 for his opponent.

Two years later a Federal judge started a clean-up which ended in removing 58,881 ghost votes from the Kansas City polling lists.

In the August 1946 primary vote frauds were charged and ballots were impounded. On a night in May 1947, while Mr. Truman was sleeping in a hotel a few blocks away, the courthouse safe, containing the ballots, was dynamited and the ballots were stolen. No one was ever prosecuted for the crime.

PARDONED IN VOTE FRAUD

A few months later Mr. Truman pardoned Mrs. Frances Ryan, one of 63 Kansas City election frauders, and restored her civil rights. This cog in the Pendergast machine was convicted for her part in 1936 vote frauds. The White House described the pardon as routine.

Last year another scandal exploded in Kansas City with fatal results. As the Senate Crime Committee was investigating the alliance between crime and the Democratic machine in that city, Charles Binaggio, gangster, was slain with his bodyguard in a Democratic ward headquarters. Binaggio met his death underneath a picture of Truman.

Binaggio's assassination blocked his plans to invest $200,000 in the New Mexico pumice enterprise of David F. Wallace, brother-in-law of the President. Wallace became interested in developing pumice when it appeared that the material might be used in building blocks more impervious to atomic radiation than other building materials. The involved fortunes of Pumex, a corporation formed to follow the development, have never been untangled by Congress.

From the outset of his administration Mr. Truman doled out plums to his pals and cronies with the lavish hand of a medieval monarch. Ability counted for nothing against friendship.

MRS. TRUMAN ON PAYROLL

The President began doling out Federal largesse when he was a Senator. He put Mrs. Truman on his senatorial payroll and eventually raised her to $4,000 a year. When this became a scandal because Mrs. Truman did not go to his office it was explained that Mrs. Truman helped her husband at home by reading Missouri newspapers. Daughter Margaret has parlayed the White House and an undistinguished voice into one of the highest paying radio contracts.

It was not long before activities of the President's official family were revealed, Brig. Gen. Wallace H. Graham, the President's personal physician, was found to have been trading in the grain market, using inside information to make profits. Instead of being removed, he was promoted.

FIVE-PERCENTER JAILED

Major General Vaughan, the President's military aide, was revealed to have accepted seven deep freezes in return for favors granted. One of the freezes went to Mrs. Truman. Vaughan pulled many wires even to getting scarce materials for a race track when veterans were clamoring for homes.

The deep freezes were an incident in the scandal of influence peddling by persons who charged 5 percent for their wire pulling. The inquiry by Congress resulted in only one jail sentence—that for John Maragon, a one-time Kansas City bootblack, who was sentenced to jail for perjury. Investigators charged him with making $120,000 in a 5-year period when he had sworn his income was only $30,000.

Donald Dawson, White House administrative assistant on personnel, is the latest member of the Truman official family to be involved in scandal. He is charged with employing influence to win RFC loans for friends and deserving Democrats. He has refused to appear before a Senate subcommittee investigating the RFC. Mr. Truman has not made him appear to tell his story.

Mrs. Lauretta Young, a White House stenographer, got a $9,500 pastel mink coat, which has figured in the investigation. Joseph Rosenbaum, interested in securing RFC loans, says he loaned money to her husband, E. Merl Young, so that he might purchase the coat.

FROM $1,900 TO $60,000

Mrs. Young was a secretary to the President when he was a Senator. Mr. Truman got the husband a job as messenger at $1,900 a year. When Mr. Truman became President, Young became an RFC examiner and then an expediter. That is, he assisted persons desiring RFC loans. His income for last year was estimated at $60,000 by Senate investigators.

The RFC scandal also uncovered a ship deal under which a group of administration figures and military men made a $2,800,000 profit on an investment of $100,000. The group included the late former Secretary of State Edward Stettinius, former Representative Joseph Casey, Democrat, of Massachusetts, Admiral William F. (Bull) Halsey and Brig. Gen. Julius Holmes.

The administration is working to shut off investigation of the RFC scandals. It is reliably reported that there are available almost a thousand influence letters to the RFC. Of these it is reported that Dawson wrote 100, Democratic National Chairman William Boyle wrote 50 and various Members of Congress wrote 800.

The administration is also seeking to shut off the investigation into crime, which has linked Democratic city machines to crime. Alliances have been uncovered in Chicago, Kansas City, Miami, New York, and other cities.

In New York gangsters were revealed as associating with top Democratic figures, including former Mayor William O'Dwyer, who resigned the mayoralty just before the lid blew off the scandal and was appointed ambassador to Mexico by Mr. Truman.

OTHERS GIVEN PARDON

James W. Curley, Democratic leader in Massachusetts and former mayor of Boston, got a pardon from Mr. Truman. He was sentenced to prison on a mail-fraud charge. Another New Dealer was convicted on the same fraud. He was Donald W. Smith, former National Labor Relations Board member.

Mr. Truman opened prison doors last December to E. F. Prichard, Jr., a protege of Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter, who was sentenced to 2 years in jail for ballot-box stuffing. Prichard, a Harvard graduate, was a New Deal lawyer.

Other recipients of Truman pardons and parole were Joseph M. Schenck, the motion-picture producer who was convicted on income-tax dodging; James Gavin, a pal of Vice President BARKLEY and a contributor to the Democratic Party, who also ran afoul of income-tax laws, and Frank Banning, a jewel thief. Banning admitted his pardon had been obtained by political influence. Within a year he was put back in jail under a 60-year sentence for shooting a policeman.

New Dealers and Fair Dealers sent to prison during Mr. Truman's years in the White House include: Former Representative Andrew J. May, Democrat, of Kentucky, who was convicted of accepting bribes of $53,634 to further fortunes of an Illinois munitions firm. Murray and Henry Garsson, heads of the firm, also went to jail.

Maj. Gen. Bennett E. Meyers of the Air Force, sentenced to prison for inducing a former business associate to lie under oath. Testimony showed that as second ranking Army Air Force purchasing officer he took profits of $150,000 out of an aviation electric corporation.

Eugene B. Casey, former White House aide to President Roosevelt, was sentenced to 6 months in jail and fined $30,000 in 1947 for income-tax evasion.

Kenneth Romney, Sergeant at Arms of the House for 15 years, was jailed in 1947 when a $143,863 shortage was found in his accounts.

The most sensational scandal of the Truman administration has been the disclosures of the influences of Communists and fellow travelers in the administration.

FIELD FLEES TO REDS

Capstone of this scandal is Alger Hiss, who went to jail last month after appeal to the Supreme Court failed on his conviction as a perjurer-spy. Although Hiss' spying was done under the Roosevelt administration, the Truman administration bent every effort to win his release. Even after the conviction State Secretary Acheson said he would not turn his back on his pal.

Henry Julian Wadleigh and Noel Field, State Department officials figured in the Hiss trial but were never accused themselves. Wadleigh admitted stealing 400 to 500 documents and passing them on for relay to Moscow. Field fled behind the iron curtain and is assumed to be in Russia.

Judith Coplon, an employee of the Justice Department, was convicted of spying by juries in New York and Washington. The New York conviction, which involved a Soviet U. N. attaché, Valentin Gubichev, was reversed and remanded for new trial. A Washington spying conviction still stands over her.

William Remington, a Commerce Department official, was convicted of lying about Communist connections. The administration had worked to discredit the case against him in a general indictment of Communist exposures as "red herrings."

BRIDGES CONVICTED AS LIAR

Harry Bridges, head of the west coast longshoremen's union, who was a stanch New Dealer, was convicted of lying when he swore that he wasn't a Communist at the time he took out naturalization papers.

The Amerasia case is another phase of the administration scandal involving Communists and Communist spying. John S. Service, a State Department official, and Philip J. Jaffe, editor of the magazine Amerasia, were among six persons involved in the case.

Others were Kate Mitchell, coeditor of the magazine; Andrew Roth, a Navy lieutenant; Emanual S. Larsen, another State Department employee, and Mark S. Gayn.

Class Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 9, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following resolution:

CITY OF CHELSEA, MASS., April 9, 1951.

RESOLUTION AGAINST THE DEFERMENT OF COLLEGE STUDENTS FROM ENTERING THE MILITARY SERVICE

Whereas the President has promulgated an order deferring the drafting of college students; and

Whereas the city government of Chelsea consider this an un-American method of all citizens bearing the same burden, both poor and rich; and

Whereas there should be no class legislation where the safety of a country is concerned and all Americans should bear their equal rights, privileges, and duties of their citizenship: Now, therefore, we register our protest and urge the President and Congress not to enforce this promulgation;

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and all the Senators and Congressmen from Massachusetts.

JAMES A. HANLON.

In board of aldermen, April 9, 1951, adopted.
Approved, April 11, 1951.

JOSEPH A. MELLEY,
Mayor.

A true copy.
Attest:

JOSEPH A. TYRRELL,
City Clerk.

Senator Wherry Defends General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the American people are deeply disturbed over the action of President Truman in summarily relieving General of the Army Douglas MacArthur from command of United Nations troops in the war in Korea.

Some observations on this tragic action were made by the junior Senator from Nebraska over the Mutual Broadcasting System last night in reply to a radio address by the President the previous night.

The junior Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for insertion and printing of his address in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR WHERRY DEFENDS GENERAL MACARTHUR

(Senator WHERRY denounces President Truman's removal of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur as supreme commander of United Nations forces in the war in Korea—as shabby treatment for a great soldier, statesman, and patriot; urges congressional hearing for General MacArthur and investigation of administration's foreign policies and national defense planning.)

My fellow Americans, the action of President Truman in summarily relieving Gen. Douglas MacArthur from his command over the United Nations forces in Korea—and from his other high commands in the Pacific—is added evidence there is vital need for examination and investigation by the Congress of the administration's foreign policies and national defense planning.

As we survey the world of today, the record of failure in foreign policies, that has brought us dangerously near another world war, the war in Korea dragging along in indecision, and increasing the tear-stained pillows across the Nation, the exposures of moral decay in high places, the Government's fiscal situation depending upon deeper and deeper drafts upon the taxpayers, the times cry aloud for this Congress to reassert its independence and develop a sound national defense policy.

In both foreign policy and national defense partisan political approaches deserve the condemnation of every patriotic citizen.

We must accomplish a united front in our dealings with foreign nations. To inject partisanship into national defense planning in which the lives and future of our youth are at stake is completely in contradiction with the American way.

But it is the right and duty of every citizen—and especially those of us in the Congress—to offer constructive criticism. That is the process of our republican form of government.

It is in this spirit that I address you tonight, and judging by the flood of telegrams and letters which have come to my office, and the volume of telephone calls from all parts of the country in the last 48 hours, the American people are deeply disturbed over the dismissal of General MacArthur, our vacillating foreign policy, and our hit-or-miss national defense planning.

What the American people want is national security. They are asking for a sound program of national defense. They are demanding a thorough congressional ventilation of the Truman-MacArthur affair, and other phases of the administration's zigzag, inept foreign policies that have led our Nation to the brink of another world war.

Cries of "wolf, wolf" and charges that others are trying to maneuver the United States into another world war, will not enable those responsible for our present perilous situation to escape the wrath of the American people.

To charge General MacArthur with attempting to involve the United States in a gigantic war with Red China and precipitate unleashing of a third world war is resented by every thinking American familiar with the glorious record of this great statesman, soldier, patriot.

The pygmies cannot bring down this giant, this tower of strength and deserving idol of the American people.

Compare the monumental record of General MacArthur with that of his accusers, with their record of moral decay, greed, corruption, and confusion of these weaklings in the Truman administration.

The result of such a comparison can be only an alarm to the American people.

With all the force that is in me, fellow Americans, I ask you to remember the admonition that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

The obvious truth is that the ship of state is floundering in a whirlpool of mink coats, paternalism, RFC-influenced loans, crooked political machines in league with national organizations, class arrayed against class, and a new scandal the order of the day.

Yes, fellow Americans, it is high time to become vigilant and militant. Your freedoms are at stake, and there is danger that runaway inflation will consume the people's wealth and render our beloved country unable to stand as the bulwark of freedom against the communistic threat.

Pollyanna speeches by the President that he is against war and is trying to prevent a third world war are not enough. The American people do not question his sincerity or his patriotism. None of us wants another world war. But there is an old adage that the road to destruction is paved with good intentions.

Fellow Americans, Gen. Douglas MacArthur needs no defense. He will take care of that when he comes home. And this leader of our victorious forces in the Pacific in World War II, this wounded hero of World War I, will return to his beloved country in triumph armed with the sword of experience and a knowledge of economic, political, and military conditions in the Far East unsurpassed by any living American.

On behalf of many Republican Members of the Congress (an overwhelming majority of them), I have introduced into the Senate a concurrent resolution, inviting General MacArthur to address a joint meeting of the Senate and House of Representatives.

An identical resolution has been introduced in the House by the minority leader, JOSEPH MARTIN, of Massachusetts. These resolutions should be adopted by both Houses, and we are making every effort we can for their adoption. On the floor of the Senate I invited all the members of the Democratic Party to join in support of the resolution.

General MacArthur is entitled to his day in court. The American people want to hear what General MacArthur has to say. They are waiting for his words of wisdom.

The Nation heard over this mutual network last night the President's weak defense of his shabby treatment of this great general and statesman. Now, let us hear from General MacArthur. Let's extend him an invitation to report to the Congress and to the American people.

But more than fair play is involved. Fundamental basic issues are at stake. They can be resolved only by the Congress as representatives of the people.

I do not question the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces to relieve General MacArthur—or any other military officer from his command or commands. But I do question the wisdom of the President in removing General MacArthur.

My memories go back to the court martialing of Gen. Billy Mitchell, the great exponent of air power. Oh, yes; there was a roar of condemnation against Billy Mitchell, because he exposed the stupidity of majoring in ground forces where there was available the overpowering weapon of airplanes.

Billy Mitchell, too, was smeared and finally drummed out of the air corps by court martial. But Billy Mitchell was right and—long after his death—the Congress belatedly recognized the tremendous service he had given to his country. A resolution was unanimously adopted and this great patriot was decorated posthumously. And this Nation owes Billy Mitchell an everlasting debt of gratitude for the services he performed.

Again and again the President, in his radio address last night, stated that he was trying to prevent a third world war, and that his removal of the general was designed to show, that it was done to prove he does not want a third world war.

Well, who got us into this war? This is Truman's war and let the record show that the President did not obtain a declaration of war by the Congress as the Constitution provides.

I have seen no statements by General MacArthur that he wants a third world war. I have not seen any statement by him that he wants to send American foot soldiers into Manchuria. Certainly he has not suggested an all-out war with China. He has advised, that the offer of a half-million anti-Communist Chinese on Formosa to join the United Nations forces should be accepted.

Is there any reason why these volunteers should be rejected? They will take the places of thousands of American boys who will be drafted and sent to Korea.

The North Korea Communists have no qualm against accepting the aid of any Communists, whether they be Chinese, Japanese, or Russian.

These anti-Communist Chinese on Formosa are directly interested in victory for the republican forces of Korea. They desire to aid the South Koreans. Why should their request for an opportunity to help be denied? Is it better to let your sons fight and die in Korea than to let these anti-Communist Chinese fight for a toehold toward eventual liberation of their native China?

But, yet, fellow Americans, that is what the administration's policy means.

General MacArthur has said that the United Nations forces are fighting with one arm behind their backs, meaning inability to bomb Communist supply bases across the Yalu River creates a great handicap. Everybody knows this is true. General MacArthur revealed no military secret in pointing that out.

And, fellow Americans, the constitutional power of the President—as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces—gives him no authority to consign American troops to fight under conditions in which they cannot defend themselves.

Certainly the Constitution does not give the Commander in Chief the power to subject American boys to enemy fire without the right to fire back.

Certainly this is the position that the Commander in Chief has taken in Korea, and you can interpret it no other way.

Over and over, the President says, he is against a third world war growing out of the conflict in Korea. But our forces in Korea are now fighting Chinese Reds. They are there by many thousands and there are hundreds of thousands behind them in China. Indications now are that they are going to continue to pour into Korea, and the fighting against Red Chinese and perhaps other "volunteer" Communists, will continue on and on in Korea.

And, I ask you, what hope did President Truman offer to you, the American people, last night for a victorious conclusion of his mission to Korea? When will it ever end?

Yes; and lest we forget, fellow Americans, it was his mission. He ordered the American forces into action without approval of the Congress. He usurped that power to make war. He did so without authority of the Congress; and, let me remind you, Congress never has surrendered its war-making power to the United Nations.

It appears, from the President's radio address, that there is a new policy for our forces in Korea. They were sent there originally to liberate all of Korea, take the offensive, and punish the North Koreans and their helpers into submission.

But now it is evident we are to wage a holding action in Korea somewhere near the thirty-eighth parallel. Our forces are to stand there like the Rock of Gibraltar—beating down the onrushing hordes from across the Yalu River.

We now are to prove to the Communist by this firm stand that it is folly for them to continue the war and they should humbly appeal for peace, turn over all of Korea to the Koreans, and never make war again.

Fellow Americans, the President now has written off his original venture into Korea to defeat the North Koreans and restore freedom to the whole country. His new policy now is to show the North Koreans and Red China that they cannot drive us out.

That's the Korean policy of the administration.

O Mr. President, there is not much comfort in this outlook. The new strategy means more and more tear-stained pillows throughout our land.

This is why the American people want to hear General MacArthur. They believe that from his vast knowledge and experience in the South Pacific, he can recommend a better way to accomplish vindication for the forces of freedom in Korea.

There is much more to this desperate situation than the mechanics of warfare. The attitude of Western Europe is obvious to the American people. It is quite natural that Western Europe would like to have priority on America's manpower and America's resources.

Why, the Socialist Government of Great Britain, which has not hesitated to permit the sale of war materials to Soviet Russia and Red China, and which has conducted a thriving business with the Communists through Hong Kong, now has the audacity to insist that Formosa be turned over to Red China and that Red China, the Moscow-directed bandits that took over the Republic of China, should sit with the United States in making a peace treaty with Japan.

The pattern is familiar. Step by step the Dean Acheson policy of appeasement of the Communists goes forward. There is rejoicing tonight among the pro-Communists who run in and out of the State Department like water through a sieve. Under

Mr. Acheson's let-the-dust-settle policy in Asia, the Reds were able to take over all of China and thrust their tentacles southward.

General MacArthur was in the Pacific all of this time. Let us hear from him. Let us have the truth, exposing the blackest chapter in American history. Let the American people know what pressures have been brought upon the Truman administration from Western European countries to wind up the Korean war with the best face-saver terms possible.

All of these matters should be thoroughly investigated by the Congress. The United States Senate in adopting recently a resolution approving the sending of four ground divisions to Europe for integration into the North Atlantic Treaty international army served notice upon the President that he should obtain the approval of the Congress before sending any more divisions over there.

This was a wholesome indication of revival of the Congress as the policy-making department of the Government. It was one road block to President Truman's efforts to establish a military dictatorship.

It was notice to the President and his power-grabbing clique that the Senate and the American people reject his philosophy that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, can assign them anywhere in the world for any purpose he deems in the public interest, and wherever he alone believes American security is threatened.

The President is Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, but he is not a dictator over the Nation's defense policies. Congress alone has the power to declare war.

We Americans don't believe in divine rights for kings or presidents.

My fellow Americans, there is grave danger that unless the Congress develops a sound global defense policy the Nation's manpower and resources will be frittered away by the administration in preparedness for a land war with Soviet Russia if she attacks.

The bayonet generals who dominate the Pentagon in Washington are calling the signals in cooperation with Dean Acheson's political manipulations around the globe.

The kind of thinking that dominates our national defense planning is reflected in an address made by Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, at the Army Day conference in Boston on February 4, 1949—and I quote General Bradley:

"I am convinced beyond any reasonable doubt that should this Nation be forced into still another conflict, we shall once more be forced to gain the inevitable victory over our dead bodies—those of our soldiers on the ground."

Now, General Bradley has served his Nation with great distinction. We honor him for his great contribution to victory in World War II, but he plainly wants to prepare for war along classical lines, long before the advent of the war plane.

General Bradley, General Marshall, General Collins, and the other dominant voices in the Pentagon are foot soldiers by training. They apparently have never learned the lessons in air power that Gen. Billy Mitchell gave.

They fail to recognize that the advent of the intercontinental bomber has revolutionized warfare. They refuse to admit that the United States now has long-range bombers that can fly from this country to any target in Russia and back home nonstop.

They fail to recognize that the Red air force is just 5½ hours away from the United States. They ignore the warning of General Vandenberg, a Chief of the Air Force, that if Russian long-range bombers strike the United States in force, over the North pole, 70 percent of them would get through and reduce our industrial centers to ashes.

No, fellow Americans, the bayonet generals of the Pentagon want to build a defensive army in Western Europe to fight Russia on the ground, Russia with her present 175 divisions in being, hundreds more available within weeks, and backed by 500,000,000 slave laborers.

To engage the Russian army on the ground, before her war industrial potential has been pulverized by air power, would be sheer madness, a reckless, wanton disregard for the lives of American boys and a cruel hoax upon the people of Western Europe.

General LeMay testified before the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees on the Wherry resolution, as follows:

"General LEMAY. Well, sir, I do not believe that we need to match Russia division for division fighting a full-scale war on the ground. I do not believe we should conduct a war against Russia in that manner.

"Senator WHERRY. How would you conduct it?

"General LEMAY. I would use the weapons at which we are more proficient and better capable of providing. We are not capable of fighting the Russian Empire by matching their manpower.

* * * * *

"Senator WHERRY. What would happen to the armies of Russia in the field if her war potential, the industrial war potential, were destroyed at home?

"General LEMAY. An army in the field becomes impotent when it is not resupplied.

"Senator WHERRY. So with the destruction of Russia's war potential, the Russian Army would disintegrate?

"General LEMAY. If they could not be resupplied they would become ineffective.

"Senator WHERRY. If you had to choose between defense dollars, and I would like to say that I accept the figures of Senator BYRD that the expenditures of budgets for the balance of this fiscal year and next year will reach approximately $144,700,000,000, if you had to choose defense dollars, what would you choose to spend to build the deterrent which you think would stop a Russian invasion?

"General LEMAY. I would choose the weapon of air power."

That was General LeMay speaking, the man who delivered by air the knock-out blows that paved the way for victory over Japan, blows that made it unnecessary to land foot soldiers on the soil of Japan.

Gen. Carl Spaatz, who commanded the Allied air forces in Western Europe in World War II, says, and I quote:

"A wall of flesh is being built in Western Europe."

General Spaatz further says that if we had been properly prepared in bombers at the outset of World War II there would have been no need for the Normandy landing.

My information is there has been a slowing down of orders for long-range bombers, the kind that can pulverize Russia's war potential, and a stepping up of orders for tactical planes, to be used as support for ground warfare in Europe if war comes.

Our air power is being dribbled out, deployed around the world in the fatuous planning to engage Russia in ground warfare, when, for every $1,000,000,000 spent on troops for Europe, we can build 280 strategic bombers which could be used to destroy Russia's war industrial potential. You would be shocked if I told you the small number we have.

The American people simply do not have the resources to raise, equip, and maintain an army in Western Europe big enough to stop the Russian hordes and at the same time finance an invincible navy and obtain mastery of the air.

We should cut our defense cloth to fit the pattern. We can afford to obtain mastery of the air, to build an invincible navy, and we can also afford to finance a mobile army.

But first priority is mastery of the air. Control the air and you control the ground under it.

Fellow Americans, crucial decisions in national defense planning are in the making. The issue soon will come up in the Congress when appropriations for national defense are considered. Then it will be up to the Congress to determine how the defense dollar shall be divided.

You, my fellow citizens, are the sovereign power to determine through your Congress how that defense dollar shall be divided and how many dollars shall be appropriated.

Congress, all of us, need the advice of such great military experts at Gen. Douglas MacArthur to help us in determining this question of high public policy.

We, the American people, want no more Yaltas, no more Tehrans, or Potsdams; no more Pearl Harbors; no more secrecy on matters that affect their lives and fortunes.

Time and again we Republicans in the Congress have offered our full, complete cooperation with President Truman in developing some effective foreign policies and national defense policies.

He has ignored the Republican leadership of the Congress in the development of both.

He claims the power of a dictator over our national defense policies and in foreign affairs and international policies. We learn of his commitments only after they have been made, sometimes through the press and radio.

My countrymen, this condition is intolerable among free people. Again I appeal to the President to work hand in hand with the Congress in determining the policies upon which the very life of the Republic may depend.

With all kindness in my heart, I urge the President to cast aside the radical clique that envelops him, to share his heavy burdens with the American people and their representatives in the Congress.

This is the historic way.

This is the American way.

And now, Mr. President, the American people demand it.

Public Opinion Poll by Elgin (Ill.) Daily Courier-News Upon National Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I submit for printing in the Appendix a very interesting poll of public opinion which was recently compiled by the Elgin (Ill.) Daily Courier-News.

The results are extremely interesting from both a local and a national standpoint and indicates by the size of the poll how deeply interested the people are in the matters which presently challenge the attention of Congress.

I believe the Elgin Courier-News is to be congratulated on this constructive effort in the field of public service. It will enhance citizen interest in the issues before Congress, in national affairs generally, as nothing else can do.

There being no objection, the poll was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Cumulative and percentage results of the Elgin (Ill.) Daily Courier-News readers' ballot upon national issues

[Ballot published in 1 issue of the paper, Mar. 31, 1951. Results include those received and tallied Apr. 2-9, 1951]

	Yes		No		Not voting (percent)
	Votes	Percent	Votes	Percent
Should 18-year-olds be drafted?	294	13.6	1,817	84.0	2.4
Should the Nation commit a large standing army to service in Europe?	68	3.1	2,054	95.0	1.9
Should a congressional committee continue an investigation of organized crime and graft in this country?	1,997	92.4	52	2.4	5.2
Should nondefense spending be cut to the bone?	1,875	86.7	234	10.8	2.5
Should Congress act to rid every department of the Government of Communists?	2,127	98.4	11	.5	1.1
Should the State Department be overhauled from top to bottom?	2,069	95.7	44	2.0	2.3
Should the President be prevented from committing American manpower to undeclared wars?	2,067	95.6	75	3.4	1.0
Should the Nation adopt universal military training?	1,060	49.0	1,012	46.8	4.2
Should Congress adopt all recommendations of the Hoover Commission for streamlining government?	1,839	85.0	159	7.3	7.7
Should Congress appropriate taxpayers' money to bolster prices of farm products and other commodities?	90	4.1	2,009	92.9	3.0

Voting upon the readership ballot was voluntary. Readers were invited in the news columns to clip and mark the ballots and mail or bring them to the newspaper office. Through the April 2 to 9 period in question, 1,497 ballots were returned, while the total of readers of legal age voting upon the issues were 2,161. Net paid circulation of the Courier-News upon the day the ballot was published, March 31, 1951, was 21,058. Additional returns are being received, but only those tallied through April 9 are included above.

The Korean War and the Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject the Korean War and the Dismissal of General MacArthur, which I delivered last night before the Yale Club of New York.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. The administration invoked the Korean war. In our general resistance to Communist aggression throughout the world we have necessarily adopted different policies in different places. To some states we give only economic aid. To other states, such as Greece and Turkey, we send military equipment and American officers for training purposes. In a few locations we are prepared to send American troops. Our program must be limited by our total economic and military strength, and by the hope for practical success, particularly if we are to send American soldiers into battle. Our Government decided that Korea was not defensible and withdrew our troops from Korea, something we never should have done if we intended to return. We put Korea in the class of those states which were to receive military aid, but we gave no aid, except small arms and military advice. We failed to send airplanes or tanks and heavy artillery. The State Department asked for money for that purpose but, after a year, it developed that none of the money had been spent. The President himself said finally that we were only undertaking to give arms to the South Koreans to prevent border raids and internal aggression. Some appeaser in the State Department was afraid that with real arms they might have attacked the Communists in North Korea. Then, in January 1950, Secretary Acheson made a public statement to the effect that the American line of defense in the Pacific was Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines. In order to support the State Department's left-wing prejudice against Chiang Kai-shek and the policy of defending Formosa, which he and others had suggested, Acheson made clear his policy that the United States would not assure either Korea or Formosa against attack by the sending of troops. With such a reaffirmation of our far eastern policy, is it any wonder that Soviet Russia and the Korean Communists took the Secretary of State at his word? If we were contemplating the recognition of Communist China, as the Secretary clearly indicated at that time, then certainly the Communists could well believe that if they could once occupy Korea, they could look forward to recognition by the United States of Communist Korea. To Soviet Russia, Korea was a soft spot into which they could move their Communist satellites without cost. Every indication is that a firm anti-Communist policy in Formosa and Korea would have avoided war altogether.

2. When the North Koreans attacked, the President without authority from Congress sent American soldiers into war. I have pointed out frequently that he completely usurped power where he had no constitutional right.

The President last night spent half of his speech justifying the action of the United States in entering the Korean war, on the ground that the attack was the first military aggression since the war and that failure to resist North Korean aggression would have led to world war III. Against the most serious handicaps, with full risk of involving both Communist China and Communist Russia in the war, he rashly sent to Korea every American soldier who was available. There have been nearly 60,000 casualties.

I agree there was a good logical argument for the United States, by action of President and Congress, to reverse our past policy and undertake to punish the first outright military aggression since the Second World War. We secured a recommendation of the Security Council to that effect, because the Russians were then boycotting the Council and were not present. But we overlooked the fact that this was merely a temporary condition and that when the Russians returned we could no longer count on United Nations support.

The United Nations army, made up almost entirely of Americans, was successful and captured most of North Korea. Certainly it had to move beyond the thirty-eighth parallel, and was authorized to do so; otherwise the whole theory of the United Nations would have been nullified. If the United Nations only drives back an aggressor to the border after the war has destroyed the country attacked and the aggressor country is not invaded or punished, then nations will have everything to gain by aggression, and nothing to lose.

But when the United Nations objective in Korea was almost accomplished, we faced a second aggression from a much more powerful nation, namely, Communist China. This was not only an aggression against Korea, it was an aggression against the United Nations itself and an attack on its army and its authority. This aggression has been largely successful and has reconquered half of Korea from the United Nations. But the Security Council refuses to act at all, and the United Nations Assembly at last reluctantly denounced the Red Chinese as aggressors, a fact obvious to everybody else for months. But they did nothing more, and they have, in fact, tried to hamper any punishment of the aggressor or even a retaking of the land which the aggressor has seized.

In this treatment of Communist China, the United Nations has abandoned every ideal for which it was established. If the original sending of American troops to Korea was to prevent world war III, then that purpose has been long completely lost from sight. It cannot now be accomplished without an aggressive war against Communist China and a punishment of the aggressor, as the North Koreans were punished.

The President's position is completely inconsistent. He justified an active move against Korean aggression as a means of preventing world war III. In the second half of his speech he claims world war III is prevented by a timid war against Communist China, and maintaining a Maginot line defense against an aggressor who has already accomplished half his purpose. He justifies two completely inconsistent courses as means of preventing world war III. I don't suppose there has ever been a more ridiculously inconsistent justification for vital moves in foreign policy.

The truth is we misjudged the power of the United Nations; we misjudged the intentions of the Chinese Communists and now we are in a situation to which there is no completely satisfactory solution.

3. Three policies are being proposed in Korea. Policy No. 1 is a more active battle against Red China. From a moral standpoint, we would be wholly justified in a complete invasion of China to punish an unprovoked aggressor. Practical considerations, of course, make it impossible, and no one has proposed it. Genereal MacArthur and everyone else knows it would take many American divisions, and that those divisions are not available and will not be for 2 years. Also I agree that such a move might unduly incite Soviet Russia to war.

Proposals for a more active war have been limited to two, as referred to by the President in his speech. One is that we assist Chinese Nationalist troops to land on the mainland of China. Second that we bomb communications, supply depots, and industrial plants in Manchuria and China itself. Neither of these would mean a general war in China. Both of them would have a direct effect in weakening the Chinese armies in Korea. It seems utterly ridiculous to me that when there are 500,000 soldiers on Formosa, some of them well-trained and ready to go, and thousands of guerrillas in south China with whom they can cooperate, we should not permit raids and invasion to make as much trouble for the Chinese Communists as possible and force the withdrawal of some of their troops from Korea. Probably Chiang could not make at this time an all-out invasion, but he could keep south China in an uproar and many Communist troops diverted from Korea. That might make all the difference in our success there, and might save thousands of American lives. I cannot see why such a policy would in any way incite Russia to war. Or we could use these soldiers in Korea, as Chiang proposed. The truth is that this policy is not undertaken, first, because of the prejudices of Secretary of State Acheson and Secretary of Defense Marshall against Chiang and, second, because it would upset the trade of the British with Communist China.

The bombing of communications and concentrations in China might have more possibility of bringing Russia into the war. But without it our Korean War presents a ridiculous spectacle. The whole Chinese attack on our Army can be built up behind the Yalu River in a kind of game sanctuary.

If there is no other way to bring war in Korea to an end, I think we would have to bomb these Chinese communications and Chinese Armies and take a chance of Russian aggression. In Europe we have not hesitated to do many things which the Russians may well regard as threatening their security. The whole Atlantic Pact, certainly the arming of Germany, is an incentive for Russia to enter the war before the army is built up. I cannot see that any bombing of China without invasion can be regarded in any way by Russia as an aggressive move against Russia itself, or a reason for war, unless they have made up their minds to start a third world war anyway.

The whole thesis of Senator KERR yesterday in the Senate that a full-scale invasion of China means a third world war is of no consequence because no one is proposing such a war. We are only trying to fight more successfully a war in Korea.

Policy No. 2 is that proposed by the President last night. It is a Maginot-line policy. We are to continue to conduct a war with our hands tied behind our backs. We are to refuse all assistance from the Chinese Nationalists. It is like a football game in which our team, when it reaches the 50-yard line, is always instructed to kick. Our team can never score, and sooner or later somebody on the other side will catch the ball and make a touchdown. As I read the President's speech, he suggests that if we don't notice that the Chinese are there in Korea, after a while they will go away. His hopes are almost pitiful. If we inflict sufficient casualties, he says, this "may discourage the Chinese Communists from continuing their attack." If they see the world arming "this may discourage the Communist rulers from continuing the war in Korea." If they realize they cannot defeat us in Korea (except to the extent they have already done so) "then they may recognize the folly of continuing their aggression. A peaceful settlement may then be possible." This certainly proposes a stalemate war. It makes a joke of the United Nations ban against aggression, and encourages aggression elsewhere. The President himself points out that back in China there "stand additional millions of Chinese soldiers." They will have lost nothing except a few men, and manpower in China is cheap. It is ridiculous to say that we are preventing either aggression or world war III by this stalemate war. The Chinese aggression has captured half of Korea and cowed most of the free world. Half of our effective Army is tied up in a position 5,000 miles from home, from which it would be very difficult to rescue it if the Russians started a war. It must be quite a temptation to them, if they really contemplate starting world war III.

Policy No. 3 is to end the war by appeasement. That is the policy with which the administration has constantly flirted. That is the policy which Secretary Acheson indicated before the Korean War when he proposed to turn over Formosa to the Communists. That is the policy the State Department approved when it instructed the American representatives to accept the cease-fire plan of January 13, 1951. That plan provided for the withdrawal of all foreign armies from Korea—almost certainly leaving the Korean Communists in full control. At the same time we agreed to sit down with the British, the Russians, and the Chinese Communists to discuss the admission of Communist China into the United Nations, and also the disposition of Formosa. The Chinese Nationalists were to be excluded. This is also the policy urged upon us by the British, who wish us to surrender Formosa and recognize Communist China by admitting them to the peace negotiations with Japan.

In view of Secretary Acheson's past acts, and under this wavering administration, no one can be certain that they will not adopt this program. The President uses the words "no appeasement," but he completely omitted from his speech any repudiation of the policy of surrendering Formosa to China or the United Nations or the policy of recognizing the Chinese Communists. Of course, such a policy would destroy the whole basis of the United Nations as an instrument against aggression. It would reward the aggressor instead of punishing the aggressor. Such a policy would render useless the death and wounding of 60,000 American boys in Korea. Such a policy would encourage the Chinese Communists to invade Indochina, Burma, Thailand, and Malaya. It would be undiluted appeasement and would not even save our face. I have never been able to understand the British position, which seems to me a terrible mistake from their own standpoint. We certainly know enough of Communist thinking today to be certain that they would sweep on into the soft spots of southeast Asia until the British lose both Hong Kong and Singapore. The British ought to be backing Chiang Kai-shek in South China to prevent the development of any such program.

I have discussed the three plans for conducting the Korean War. General MacArthur favored the first, but I think his determination to bring his views to the American people was brought about far more by his fear, and his justified fear, of the adoption of plan No. 3. I think he spoke out, endangering his own position, because he felt that only thus could the American people be brought to realize the danger of the Acheson policy. The firing of General MacArthur has led the world to believe that we are looking in the direction of appeasement. It is a blow to every man and every country in the Far East that favored an aggressive attitude toward the spread of communism. It is an encouragement to every Communist in the Far East and throughout the world. It has caused a tragic weakening of our moral position.

More than that, it throws away a large part of the good will we had created in Japan. The white man by himself cannot today undertake to rule the Far East. The influence of freedom can only be built up by believers in freedom among the far-eastern peoples themselves. The only strong friends we had in the Far East were the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa and the Japanese. The President has discouraged both by the dismissal of MacArthur.

It would be hard to deliberately invent a more disastrous series of policy moves than this administration has adopted during the past 18 months in the Far East. Far from preventing world war III it has involved us in a major war which now has no purpose whatsoever; and it has encouraged an aggression which makes a larger war far more likely in the future. Any American must be sick at heart to see the useless waste of life and the wavering weakness of the administration, which has reduced the United States position in Asia to a new low.

The Place of Big Business in Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a recent editorial entitled "Bigger and Better Businesses Needed," published in the Washington (Pa.) Observer.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BIGGER AND BETTER BUSINESSES NEEDED

Bigger and better businesses will be needed in the United States in the years ahead to meet the tremendous expense of mobilization in combating the threats of world conditions, especially the determined aggressions of Soviet Russia.

The United States News and World Report in the current issue cites General Motors Corp. as an example of what one of the big business firms of the Nation is doing to help keep the wheels of our Government turning.

General Motors during 1950 did a gross business of $7,500,000,000. It turned out products that satisfied its customers.

Of that amount, United States News states that $1,700,000,000 was paid directly to the Government in taxes.

The firm's workers, 465,000 of them, received $1,900,000,000. The Government collected at least $200,000,000 in taxes from the workers. Firms supplying General Motors with needed materials and equipment received $3,500,000,000. The Government collected another $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 from the supply firms.

The 445,000 stockholders received $539,000,000 in dividends. The Government collected an estimated $150,000,000 more in taxes from the stockholders.

General Motors produced at least $1,700,000,000 taxes for the Government.

United States News Week makes this comment:

"With $70,000,000,000 in bills to pay, the Federal Government must encourage corporations to grow and to be prosperous. Otherwise the Government will find it harder to do the things it wants to do."

The Kefauver Crime Investigating Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the column of Walter Winchell published in the New York Daily Mirror on March 27 last, in which he discussed the investigation by the Kefauver committee.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN NEW YORK

(By Walter Winchell)

MR. AND MRS. UNITED STATES: The Kefauver committee has done a good job of showing up the American underworld with its political tie-ups. But never in history has the sinful life been given the effective—and misleading—advertising it got from the Senate hearings in the last few weeks. When the average, hard-working, debt-ridden citizen heard that a Frank Costello can swing elections and keep $50,000 in cash around the house for spending money—his first reaction was not apt to be indignation so much as envy.

But that's one of the limitations of this modern world. Television can give a picture, but only the mind can give the view. For every so-called successful Costello there are 5,000 misled kids in reform schools and 10,000 men behind prison bars. Frank Costello, on the surface, was a winner. But the losers in the criminal game—the prisoners in the penitentiary—could have testified that all of Costello's money isn't worth the right of a free man to take a walk in the spring.

When the chic Virginia Hill unfolded her amazing life story (contributing nothing to the committee's knowledge of crime—after her tardy arrival was excused by Senator KEFAUVER with the explanation "ladies from my part of the country are traditionally late"), many a young girl must have wondered: Who really knows best? Mother or Virginia Hill? After doing all the things called wrong, there she was on top of the world, with a beautiful home in Miami Beach and a handsome husband and baby.

But it is a very hard life for any woman to receive more attention than affection—and even harder to receive more affection than respect. The life of Virginia Hill sounds glamorous to the uninitiated. But as Damon Runyon said: "It reads a whole lot better than it lives." Most women would gladly trade every fur coat or Miami mansion they might own to avoid having the man they love shot between the eyes with a rifle—or the thousand tortured hours spent waiting for it. And, of course, for every girl like Virginia Hill who hit the high lights of the shadow circuit, there are 10,000 pitifully dependent upon the whim of a criminal's twisted mind for their next meal. Television could not tell anyone of their stories—not only because it is too gruesome—but because there is nothing more boring than repeated sordidness.

The Senators have proven that the underworld is based on one principal source of revenue—gambling—and 90 percent of that horse gambling. But some eminent psychologists would tell you the reason public interest and indignation are so high was not because the spotlight was on Frank Costello—but because America was holding the mirror up to itself. Frank Costello, sitting in the witness chair, was not the average citizen's $2 bet come home to win—but come home to roost.

Whether or not the average citizen likes to believe it, it is just as immoral for him to place an illegal bet with the gamblers as it is for the gamblers to bribe public officials. The gamblers do not use their own money to bribe public officials; they haven't enough. They must use the public's. Anyone born before noon today knows that part of his $2 bet goes to the crooked combine between criminals and politicians. Under the common law, knowing that, makes him an accessory before the fact—and an accessory before the fact is a principal to the crime. Accordingly, Mr. and Mrs. Betting America, take a good look at Frank Costello, because more than he was your enemy—he was your agent.

What the television pictures lacked was a montage. They should have had plenty of background shots; in fact, they left out the main character, which was Mr. and Mrs. Millions of Betting Public. They should have shown background shots of the crowds swarming up to the betting windows; the busy horse rooms around the country serviced by the eminently respectable A. T. & T., and the conservative newspapers with the racing results. And, of course, the delegation of happy United States Senators being received by the Governor of Kentucky at last year's Kentucky Derby. Or, to make it more timely, the horde of Washington politicians skipping the Kefauver hearings to swarm out to the opening of Laurel last Good Friday.

This is no defense of gambling or official bribing, but it is an attack on hypocrisy. Under his constitutional rights, Frank Costello need not confess to anything on the witness stand. On the other hand, Costello is perfectly satisfied with the gambling situation. Mr. and Mrs. America and the United States Senate are not. They want to do something about it. But, unfortunately, it is a first rule of the law they say they seek to uphold that the applicant come in with clean hands. Well, Mr. and Mrs. America, at least half of you haven't got them. The hands of half the adult population are soiled by the billions of dollars they have paid out in $2 bets—the tiny little raindrops out of which comes the torrent of corruption. Mr. and Mrs. Two-Dollar Bettor, you can stop speculating on who is the man higher up. Not very surprisingly—to those who know how the system works—Mr. and Mrs. Two-Dollar Bettor—it is you.

Vice alone does not make a hypocrite. A hypocrite is a man who denies his own vices—while he seeks to punish his own failings in others. Whatever the betting laws may say, betting on horse races is an ancient American tradition, a long-fixed habit, and a time-honored institution. Once this is admitted, the public won't need the underworld as its broker—any more than it now needs a rum-runner to deliver its $8,000,000,000 annual intake of alcoholic liquors. Sure gambling is bad for you, but overeating kills 1,000 times more breadwinners yearly than all the roulette wheels combined.

Gambling is as broad as the Nation—and not as narrow as the televised pictures of the witness stand. What people are—and what people should be—is as old a story as the Garden of Eden. As Lincoln Steffens said of that: "It wasn't Adam's fault and it wasn't Eve's fault. It wasn't the serpent's fault either. It was the fault of the apple they wanted."

The great crime of a hypocrite is that he demands a scapegoat as proof of the truth of the lie he is telling to himself. In the long scheme of justice, it can't be good law that a nondescript goes to jail as a common gambler, while the judge who sentences him knows that the prisoner helped pay the man who gave the judge his job on the bench. A long historical record proves that if the code of the silent criminal were not stronger than the criminal code of New York State, there would have been many prisoners who would have testified they were less guilty than the judges who sentenced them—and that the hearts of those judges were as black as their robes.

Again, this is no defense of gambling. But it does charge that the aristocratic bluebloods of the jockey club—who stage the races—and Frank Costello, the common gambler—are more than brothers under the skin. They are brothers under the table. And Mr. and Mrs. Two Dollar Bettor—you are the first guilty link of the chains—on another man's wrist.

Hope for the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARLE C. CLEMENTS
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Only What You Help Make It," written by "Bud" Calman, and published in the April 5 edition of the Sturgis News, of Sturgis, Ky.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONLY WHAT YOU HELP MAKE IT

(By "Bud" Calman)

A young man asked of me the other day, "To what does the present generation have to look forward to and plan for?"—that was a real question. I know that in back of that young man's mind were the thoughts of continued rising taxes; taxes for this, taxes for that, give to this and give to that—blood banks to try and save lives offered up in the name of peace, with little outlook for peace; save on this and save on that—sacrifices—buy defense bonds, high prices and hard to make both ends meet with only the forecast of things to get worse, rather than better. Yes; our forefathers had a struggle to establish this country of ours, but then each day, each week they could see some progress being made, while today the young people see naught in the future but sacrifices, while all the time the conditions seem to get worse. What hope does the future hold? Only, my young friend, that men may be free eventually from tyranny of men like Hitlers, Mussolinis, and Stalins—when that will be, if you will live to see it, none can foretell, but whatever the price, it is not too great so long as you can call yourself free men, so long as you can have sanctity of home; so long as you are free to choose your religion; so long as there is hope left in man, there is a chance for a better world for some future generation, maybe not yours, maybe for your great-great-grandchildren—it was to that end that the Pilgrims made the initial sacrifice and to which generations since on this continent have dedicated their endeavors. Raise your head young man, look to the heavens, there is a future for you—where and when, only time will tell, only God in those heavens knows and he will reveal that time to you, when in his plan of things, the time is right, but never, never give up hope, it is the foundation on which the structure of your life is built; it is the bulwark against the rising tides of hate and greed and tyranny; it is the rainbow that promises for you and all mankind a tomorrow, which can only be what you help to make it.

The President's Radio Address on Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Walter Winchell:

NEW YORK, April 12.—The President's speech—and the truth—false and misleading statements are shunned in the commercial world. In the diplomatic world, however, they are exalted as state papers. The President gave his grounds for firing MacArthur at 10:30 Wednesday night, but the real reasons and the real cause had been printed that very morning on the front page of the New York Times.

This is the dispatch: WASHINGTON.—"Britain has suggested to the United States that Communist China be brought into the negotiations for a Japanese peace treaty * * * and, further, that the treaty provide for the ultimate if not immediate return of Formosa to 'China.' * * * By China, the British mean the regime of Mao Tse-tung (Communist)." In short, Secretary Acheson's commitments to London call not only for the sellout of Formosa, but Japan also.

Said Mr. Truman: "If history has taught us anything, it is that aggression anywhere in the world is a threat to peace anywhere in the world. And since World War II, we have been putting that lesson into practice—we're working with the free nations to check the designs of the Soviet Union. * * * That is what we did in Greece."

The actual records show that since the Second World War, the President has earned the title of the greatest appeaser in history. "This is what we did in Greece," is not what Mr. Truman did in Czechoslovakia, Poland, and 11 other countries. He surrendered them. He didn't intend to oppose Communist imperialism. If he did, why did he, as recently as 1 year ago, pigeonhole the 70-group Air Force, mothball the fleet, and then tell the American people that "peace" was near? The news is that until very recently history hadn't as yet taught President Truman the simple fundamental that you can't appease a dictator.

"The attack in Korea was part of a great plan for conquering all of Asia," said the President. This is the very same man who called it a "police action" only eight bloody months ago. "I would like to read to you from a secret intelligence report which came after the attack," continued the President. It is apparent that for a considerable time the President has been furnished an intelligence report after events happen, such as the Bogota riots. An intelligence report after an event isn't an intelligence report at all. It is an alibi. Obviously, if the intelligence report had been effective, President Truman would have had more troops ready to meet the attack. The so-called intelligence report had already been confirmed by thousands of American corpses. If the President really wanted the people to read an intelligence report, he would release the Wedemeyer report to the public. That will be the day.

Said the President: "The whole Communist imperialism is back of the attack on peace in the Far East. It was the Soviet Union that trained and equipped the North Koreans for aggression." But the President failed to mention that the Russians were sold jets by Great Britain; that the Soviet Army rolls on British rubber and the Soviet soldier sleeps in an English woolen blanket. The President did not say that the chief source of Red China's supply was not Moscow, but Hong Kong and Singapore. That would interfere with peaceful international relations, as the truth often does.

"The question we have had to face," continued the President, "is whether the Communist plan of conquest can be stopped without a general war." The President apparently forgot his Secretary of Defense, George Marshall, had within the last month told the American people they were already in a global war and fighting for their lives.

"We have taught the enemy a lesson," intoned the President. "He has found out that aggression is not cheap or easy." The truth is, however, and the records show, that the enemy seized 11 countries while Mr. Truman was busy disarming our country on an economy basis. The "enemy" took 11 countries without firing a single shot, and without loss of a single Russian soldier. That's an easy bargain, as the Gold Star Mothers of Korea would be happy to testify.

"The Communist side must now choose its course of action," said the President. This, in diplomatic language, is a frank admission that the President has surrendered the initiative. It is not a United Nations or an American program that is to be decisive. In short, what happens next is Stalin's choice. This is great policy for Marshal Stalin—especially to tell him so.

Said the President: "Behind the North Koreans and Chinese Communists stand millions of Chinese soldiers. And behind the Chinese soldiers stand the tanks, the planes, the submarines, the soldiers and the scheming rulers of the Soviet Union." But this isn't what the President said last June. At that time he called it a mere "police action." The President failed to tell the American people what he was doing while the Communist strength, which he now admits, was being built up. President Truman's administration was busy selling war factories, mothballing the fleet, and disbanding the Army. As a matter of fact, within the last month his own Democratic Senators proved that ex-convict John Maragon, armed with a White House letter from General Vaughan, was selling the very United States arms the President now says we must build up.

Said the President of General MacArthur: "It was with deepest personal regret that I found myself compelled to take this action. General MacArthur is one of our greatest military commanders. But the cause of world peace is more important than any individual." The Daily Worker, in much more abusive language, heartily agrees with President Truman in calling General MacArthur a danger to world peace. Today's headlines in the Daily Worker hail President Truman—and say that no greater blow has ever been struck for their cause. For once, the Daily Worker is right.

Will Communist China Become a Member of the United Nations?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the administration's sudden effort to go back to appease Russia through the urging of India, Great Britain, and quite a majority of the members of the United Nations, will not succeed in the admission of Red China to membership in the United Nations, the surrender of the Nationalist Chinese to their executioners and the abandonment of Japan and the Philippines.

With Russia in the League, no world peace is possible and anyone with any understanding at all of the aims of Russia ought to know that. If Red China is admitted, the chances of world peace become much less. With India and Great Britain clamoring for this recognition of Communist China, you can see that world peace of the capitalistic countries is doomed. Russia is determined to exterminate the religion of all countries and to destroy capitalism anywhere and everywhere. An appeasement program makes Russia just that much stronger, and the recognition of Red China would be a fitting climax to the downfall of all hopes of world peace and the downfall of the United Nations, so far as we are concerned. If our purpose in the Orient is to stop the spread of communism, the recognition of Red China, branded by the UN as an aggressor, is furthering and not arresting the spread of communism.

If Red China is admitted to the UN., it is noticed that if any aggressor wants to start on a campaign of slaughter of the troops of the UN and do enough of it, that is the surest way to gain a membership in the UN.

The President says he wants to confine the war to Korea and not cause a third world war. That is just what Russia wants—they want to have us fight in Korea and not go beyond that while Russia siphons the troops of Manchuria and the rest of China to meet us with hordes that we can never kill off fast enough to win that war. It's a nice arrangement for our enemies, but an impossible goal for the United States.

England is dead-set on having Red China recognized. Does anyone not know why the English take this attitude? They take it for business reasons—just as they always do in protecting the trade of England. They are nicely seated in Hong Kong and Singapore, and are carrying on a brisk trade right now in strategic war material with Red China, while her own men—what few she has sent to Korea—are presumed to be fighting against Red China. There is no doubt now—none whatever—that England will transfer material—which we give her—to our enemies. England is likewise still trading with the Russians.

Under these circumstances, should this Nation feel disposed to send our boys overseas to protect England? Have not we any sense left, or have we lost our balance?

The President has boldly told Congress that he will send troops anywhere he wants and engage in any conflict he wants to, in any part of the world, without the consent of Congress. The President will do it, too, because there is not moral fiber enough left in a spineless Congress to stop him. An attempt was made Wednesday to do it, but the vote was 168 to 192 against interfering with the President.

A Guy Who Knows the Score

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH HARVEY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ed Kennedy, from the Indianapolis Times of April 10, 1951:

A GUY WHO KNOWS THE SCORE—BATTLE-WORN GI's SHUN POLITICS, BACK UP MAC—PLASTER PARIS ROW IN ATTERBURY HOSPITAL RIDES ALONG WITH GENERAL IN CONDUCT OF WAR

(By Ed Kennedy)

They don't give a damn for politics on plaster-paris row.

But they have some very definite ideas on the way the Korean War should be handled.

Plaster-paris row is made up of the wards at the Camp Atterbury General Hospital where the boys back from the front mend their Commie bullet-shattered bones.

Nobody's asked them what they think about the present row over General MacArthur. Nobody ever asks combat soldiers what they think.

"We'll take that hill, men"—or "we'll hold this line if it takes all winter" is all they ever hear until a spade slaps them in the face—with full military honors, of course, or they land in a hospital.

NUTS

As the "MacArthur's genius" against MacArthur "should be sacked" argument sweeps Washington and European capitals, the wounded GI's at Atterbury got a chance to voice their opinions to the Times.

"Nuts to the politicians," one of them cracked. "Mac's the only one in the bunch that understands the far-eastern problem and has guts enough to stand up to it."

The soldiers expressed no great love for MacArthur the man. But they did express great respect for MacArthur the soldier and statesman.

On his present statements they backed him to a man.

1. Chinese Nationalist troops should be permitted and helped to make a landing on the Red-held mainland of China.

2. Our planes should not be restricted in their bombing of Red bases which supply their forces in Korea.

A HELLUVA NOTE

3. The United Nations commander is a country mile ahead of Washington, the State Department, and the politicians who would smear him.

"It's a helluva note to be out there fighting for a guy who knows the score and then read your home-town newspaper to see some jerk back in Washington blasting him," a young officer remarked.

Another officer summed it up another way: "To me the argument is stupid. They call one issue a military issue—this they say MacArthur can talk about. They call another issue political and say he can't talk about it. They put that out of his realm.

WAR IS POLITICAL

"This is screwy. War in itself is political. It is a continuation of our national policy by force. Policy is politics. Not Republican versus Democrat politics, but international politics. At MacArthur's level you can't separate the two," he asserted.

Other typical comments:

"If he hadn't been out there the last 6 years, they would have talked us clean back to Pearl Harbor." "He never made any secret deals with the Russians." "He's getting old—but he knows how to handle them." "He'd turn his back on Alger Hiss, I'll bet." "If he wants it and thinks it's best for the country, I'm for it." "What a show-off, but he's the only real authority on the problem; they're damn fools to treat him the way they do." "I'm only 17. I enlisted in a peacetime Army. I think everything stinks. When I'm better I want out. The hell with it. Got a cigarette?"

"THINK" STUFF IS OUT

Comic books are the only thing that would stand a chance to make a best seller's list at the Atterbury hospital—the "think" stuff is out.

But when it comes to the Korean War they have some ideas. And the ideas of the privates first class and platoon leaders alike, are with Doug.

Training of Draftees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. BROWNSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BROWNSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to include the following letters in the RECORD, which are in connection with the training some of our draftees are receiving before they are sent into combat. This brings out one reason why I believe we urgently need UMT in the very near future, because the present training system is not working in the best interests of either our men or of our country. A study of the separation of procedures for combat training and technical training should be made by the Armed Services Committee in detail and in an early attempt to produce workable UMT legislation for the period of the emergency instead of the unforeseeable future.

The letters follow:

APRIL 10, 1951.

HON. CHARLES BROWNSON,
Old House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We received a telegram last Friday, April 6, telling us our son was killed in action in Korea on March 16, 1951. He was our only child and we are heartbroken to get such news.

We are also very, very bitter, not because he was drafted, but because he was sent to cooking school at Fort Knox, Ky., from which he graduated January 2, 1951, then they turned around and sent him right to Korea with no advanced training whatsoever and put him in the First Cavalry Division and into the front lines. In less than 3 weeks in action and 6 months in service he was killed. I am not the only bitter and grieving mother of boys here from Indianapolis whose boys are in the same division over there now whom I know are being slaughtered in the same way. It is about time something is done to stop these wars.

Our son was inducted into the Army here in Indianapolis, September 6, 1950, and sent to Fort Knox, Ky. After just barely 5 weeks of basic training, he was sent to 2128 ASU Food Service School there at Fort Knox to become a cook. He graduated from there and received his diploma on January 2, 1951. He came home on a 14-day furlough and left here January 19, 1951, for Camp Stoneman, Calif., arriving there January 22, 1951. Their ship (U. S. S. Gen. Stuart Heintzelman) sailed January 30, 1951. They arrived at Tokyo, Japan, about February 19 or 20 and were at Camp Drake, near Tokyo. We had the one letter from Tokyo written February 21. The next and only letter from Korea was written March 4, 1951, so, you see, they were just about 1 week in Tokyo and sent right into Korea and put in the front lines where he was killed March 16, 1951, after not even 3 weeks in battle.

Our son never handled a gun in his life and was it fair to train them to be cooks and then put them in the front lines? Perhaps if he had been trained for such a thing he might have had a chance. Now, the rest of those boys who were his buddies are perhaps still in there fighting with no more training than he had.

Most sincerely,

APRIL 9, 1951.

HON. CHARLES B. BROWNSON,
Office of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHUCK: This morning one of our employees came to me with a problem that I believe is worthy of investigation at your level.

His son was called into service, September 5, 1950, and sent to Fort Knox, Ky. After just 1 month of training he was assigned to the cooks and bakers school. He attended this school until December and upon graduation was sent home for a 3-week leave. At the end of his leave he was sent to San Francisco and within a week was shipped to Japan. Four days after arrival he was in the front lines as a combat infantryman. It is obvious on the face of it that this lad was sent into combat with only a month of training which is totally inadequate. You and I both know the terrific cost that we paid by sending untrained personnel into battle. Recently I attended a conference in Chicago at which a member of the Defense Board was present. I asked him about this question of untrained personnel being sent into combat and he stated that it was their policy that lads with no previous military training were to be given 4 months of basic training before they could be shipped out of the country. Following their movement to foreign shores they would be given 2 months of combat training before they would be allowed to enter combat. This is an excellent policy if it is followed. While I recognize that mistakes can be made, in this particular case the boy had two friends of his who had about the same experience. All three boys were from Indianapolis and all three were sent into Korea with inadequate training. One of those boys was killed a couple of weeks ago. The son of our employee was wounded on March 8.

I really believe that this is a matter which you should investigate for the good of our Army as well as the interest of our citizenship. Please let me know if you need any additional information.

Yours very truly,

——— ———.

———

APRIL 11, 1951.

HON. CHARLES BROWNSON,
Office of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BROWNSON: Following is a letter which I also sent to the Secretary of the Army. I am appealing to you as my Congressman to see if there is something that you can do to aid in the investigation of this practice. I would appreciate any assistance that you can give to see that problems like this are straightened out.

As a parent I wish to register a protest against a practice of sending untrained boys into combat. This practice is contrary to my understanding of the policy of the armed services and it should be investigated.

My son, ——— ———, was inducted September 6, 1950, and sent to Fort Knox, Ky. After about a month of training, he was sent to the cooks and bakers school there. Graduating January 2, 1951, he came home for 3 weeks. Then he was sent to San Francisco. Within a week he was sent to Japan and 4 days after arrival he was in Korea as a combat infantryman. He was wounded March 8, 1951, and since March 20 I have had no word from him.

It is my understanding that new inductees without any previous military service were supposed to receive 4 months' basic training and 2 months of combat training before entering combat. My son had hardly a month of basic training. His schooling is completely wasted.

Do you not agree that this is an example of some of the mistakes made in World War II? Untrained men suffer more casualties than trained men. Surely some system can be worked out to see that the men we send into battle know how to do their job right.

I would admit the possibility of a mistake if it were not that two other men, just like my son, from Indianapolis, and at the same time, had almost the same experience. One of these men is now dead.

For the sake of insuring the best army that we can get, can you not investigate how such errors can be made. I am positive my son was sent into battle months before he was adequately trained.

Sincerely yours,

——— ———.

The Bonus March

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINT SMITH
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, in view of the rumblings coming from the underground and rumors emanating from the left-wing press, it is clearly evident a campaign is getting underway to start smearing General MacArthur.

These Communist-inspired forces will attempt to show that General MacArthur was the one who inspired and caused the "bonus marchers" to be evicted from the Capital. In view of this prospective smear campaign, I set forth what I believe to be the facts relative to this eviction.

The Communist-inspired bonus march in 1932 is described in un-American activities reports and other official documents as Communist inspired and led.

It was the first open effort to coerce the Congress of the United States by physical manpower force.

July 28, 1932, found a portion of the bonus marchers camped in abandoned temporary buildings from which the police were ordered to move them. They defied the police. Several policemen were injured.

In the fighting which followed one bonus marcher was killed and another received injuries from which he died.

The civil authorities, in writing, told President Hoover that the civil authorities could not control the situation and asked for troops.

The President told Secretary of War Patrick J. Hurley to restore order.

Hurley passed the order on to General MacArthur as Chief of Staff of the Army.

MacArthur told Lt. Col. George Patton, Jr., to submit a plan.

Patton proposed use of a company of tanks and a squadron of cavalry, pointing out that if infantry were used the agitators would push participants against the bayonets and bloodshed would follow. Patton contended that cavalry on horseback and men in tanks could see over the heads of the crowd, spot the agitators, and retain control without bloodshed. The plan was approved by MacArthur.

The Patton-led troops, accompanied by MacArthur, moved to the bonus-marchers' encampment.

MacArthur, moving out alone, ahead of the troops, met the leaders and told them they had 1 hour to get out of town.

By the end of that hour the movement out of town began.

From the time the military took over no one was seriously injured, no shot was fired, and the subsequent propaganda in Communist publications that soldiers of 1932 used bayonets and bullets to kill veterans of 1918 was flat falsification.

The War Department release of August 3, 1932, over the signature of General Hurley, covers these facts. It is a matter of filed record and can be obtained by the Armed Services Committee or any other committee of Congress which cares to look at the record.

When Representative PAUL SHAFER, of Michigan, read into the RECORD yesterday the exultation of the Communist Daily Worker over the decapitation of General MacArthur, the reasons for the Communist jubilation were not, perhaps, fully explained. But consider these facts:

The Communists, by their bonus march, tried to use physical force to intimidate Congress in connection with pending legislation.

Four men, in chain of command, stopped that move. They were President Hoover, Secretary of War Hurley, General MacArthur, and Colonel, later General, Patton.

Every Member of this House knows the subsequent continued drive of the Communist forces in America against these four men. Every Member who is willing to look at the record knows that each of the four fought the Communists to a bitter standstill.

President Hoover and Secretary Hurley are out of office and General Patton is dead. General MacArthur was the one remaining target.

There has been loose talk about the bonus march, and what it really was, and who motivated it.

I am presenting these facts, without rancor, just to keep the record straight, by sticking to the record.

Heroic Stand of Sixty-fifth Puerto Rican Infantry Regiment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK T. BOW
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I called the attention of the House of Representatives to the heroic stand made by the Puerto Rican Sixty-fifth Infantry Regiment in covering the successful retreat of our mainland Marines in Korea.

I believe my colleagues will be interested in reading the latest report coming out of Korea dealing with the bravery and stamina of these Americans from Puerto Rico. It appeared in the New York Times for Sunday, April 8, being a dispatch from Greg MacGregor, a correspondent.

This article points out that our Puerto Rican soldiers have "won the highest respect from men of all nations fighting in the United Nations line" and that despite the history of heavy action by this group, the Puerto Ricans have more volunteers than they can use. It is said this is the only regiment in Korea that has no replacement problem.

Since this story appeared at about the same time, the press carried the decision of a Federal judge imposing the death penalty on a Puerto Rican for his part in a revoluntionary plot, this account of the daring of a truly American regiment of Puerto Ricans is worthy of our attention:

SOMEWHERE IN KOREA, April 7.—Only 8 miles behind the front lines, a hard-played softball game was going on this afternoon. Going into the ninth inning, with the score tied, both teams were giving everything they had.

As the sun beat down on the diamond, marked off by flour on a fat tract in the rice paddies, the spectators were going wild with excitement, jumping up and down and shouting encouragement and advice.

Just 5 days ago, the same players and spectators were fighting for their lives as they drove the Chinese Communists back across the thirty-eighth parallel. These were members of the Puerto Rican Sixty-fifth Infantry Regiment of the Third Division.

Since these Latin-American warriors arrived on the peninsula on September 23, they have shown the same spirit on the battlefield that they showed in the ball game this afternoon. They have asked no quarter nor have they given any. They won the highest respect from men of all nations fighting in the United Nations lines.

This war has given these Americans their first chance to show their mettle as a unit. Although they fought with credit during World War II in southern France and North Africa, they were always assigned in small units to other regiments. In this war, they were determined to prove to their country and the world that they take a back seat to no one on the field of battle when they work together as a team.

The Sixty-fifth has been cited for its accomplishments in Korea "above and beyond the call of duty." They distinguished themselves at Hamhung, they fought a rear guard action at the Hungnam evacuation and aided materially in preventing this retreat from becoming a hopeless rout. And, recently, they fought their way from the Han River up over the thirty-eighth parallel.

Despite this history of heavy action, the Puerto Ricans have more volunteers than they can use. It can be stated accurately that this regiment is the only one in Korea with no replacement problem. It has replacements in rear areas eager to be called into action against the Communists.

In addition, military leaders here have been notified that it would be no problem to raise another 50,000 Puerto Rican volunteers in their homeland, which is justly proud of its own regiment.

Although the sub-zero Korean winter is very foreign to these troops, accustomed to the warm sun of their island, their casualties from frost and cold are no greater than those suffered by any other regiment.

Colonel William W. Harris of St. Louis, who commands the regiment, has only the highest praise for his men.

"I have never seen men more eager and willing to do a good job for you," he said. "They are very proud people, both as Puerto Ricans and members of the Sixty-fifth. Morale is no problem in this outfit. I can honestly say it is as high or higher than in any other regiment in Korea."

To date, the Puerto Ricans have destroyed 19 of the enemy for every man they have lost.

St. Lawrence Seaway and Power-Development Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by me over the facilities of the Mutual Broadcasting System on Tuesday, April 10, on the subject of the St. Lawrence seaway and power-development project.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

One of the many questions involving the security of the Nation, now pending before the United States Congress, is the question of the St. Lawrence seaway and power-development project. This is not a new question. It has been under consideration in one form or another for more than three decades. Today, however, it is an urgent and vital question which must be taken up and acted upon without further delay.

I have always favored the St. Lawrence seaway and power project and have urged it for the past 30 years. It has been similarly urged and advocated by every President of the United States since Woodrow Wilson—both Republicans and Democrats. Today, however, we can no longer afford to spend more time in merely urging it. Today we must build it. Today it is a question of our national security.

I am not alone in making such a statement. This statement, as to the vital necessity of the St. Lawrence undertaking, has been made by the Secretary of Defense George Marshall, by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, by our Secretary of State, by the Secretary of Commerce, by the Secretary of Agriculture, and by the Secretary of the Interior. It has been made by the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, Mr. Charles E. Wilson.

Every civilian and military authority in a position of responsibility for our defense and mobilization, and many other ranking Government officials have stated that this is an essential project and must be immediately undertaken.

I cannot understand how the opponents of this project can assume for themselves the responsibility of declaring that this project is not essential to our security. Who are these groups and individuals who presume to tell the people that General Marshall is wrong; that General Bradley is wrong; that General Collins is wrong; that Admiral Sherman is wrong; that General Vandenberg is wrong; that Secretary Acheson is wrong and that President Truman is wrong in declaring that the St. Lawrence Project is necessary to the defense and the effective mobilization of the United States?

These opponents are the spokesmen for certain railroad interests and for certain shipping and port interests which believe—very mistakenly—that their own business and economic enterprises would be harmfully affected by the construction of this great project. These opponents are the private power interests who are opposed to the low cost public power that would be available for the industries and people of New York State and of the neighboring New England States.

These are the groups which declare that the St. Lawrence Project is not essential for our defense and security. These groups argue that the St. Lawrence Project would cost too much and that it will not be useful.

Of course neither of these arguments is true. Every responsible official has testified to the economic soundness of the project, to its feasibility, and to its necessity. By further delaying this project we cater to the fears and prejudices of a few private interests—fears and prejudices which are entirely unfounded—at the expense of the welfare of the entire Nation and, under present conditions, at the expense of our national security.

Today we are short on electric power throughout the Northeast. In many cities and towns, industries cannot expand—and new ones cannot be located—because of the shortage of available power, and especially of low-cost power. Yet here is a river rushing down to the sea carrying water which could, at this very moment, be providing us with 2,200,000 additional horsepower.

Every year that the St. Lawrence Project remains unbuilt we are losing 13 billion kilowatt hours of electrical energy. Every day, every hour that goes by without this power project, we are wasting electricity and committing an extravagance just as great as if we were to throw the number of dollars equivalent to the value of this power into the Atlantic Ocean.

At this moment all of our efforts are being directed toward increasing the productive power of our national industrial machine. The St. Lawrence project is a necessary step toward that end. It will increase the ability of the United States to turn out the matériel and armaments necessary to defend our territory and our people. But the St. Lawrence project goes beyond this. It will safeguard the lives of American seamen in the event of hostilities. For these reasons alone, how can we hesitate to give it our full support?

The St. Lawrence project involves improving short stretches of the St. Lawrence River channel in order to make this entire river navigable for ocean-going vessels. We would thus provide a new waterway from the Atlantic reaching into the very heart of our country and of Canada. This is the seaway part of the St. Lawrence project.

As a sponsor of the St. Lawrence legislation, I have had to give serious thought to the burdens now weighing down on the American taxpayer. The St. Lawrence dual project, I am happy to say, will completely pay for itself. Over a period of 50 years, the seaway will pay for itself. Over a much shorter period, the power project will pay for itself.

Besides costing the taxpayer nothing, the project will save millions of dollars in transportation and power costs. We in New York State can well appreciate that, for we now are paying higher rates for electricity than all but seven States in the Union.

I mention the cost, however, only to give an idea of the soundness of the proposal. I am firmly convinced that no matter what price we must pay for the security of our people, it is a bargain. But in the case of the St. Lawrence, the result will be not an expense but a vast saving, not only to the people but to the Government.

If the St. Lawrence River is made navigable, ships will be able to bring iron ore directly from Labrador and Canada to steel mills at Cleveland, Toledo, or any port on the Great Lakes. Compared with shipping the ore through the Atlantic Ocean and then inland by rail, the savings will be tremendous. Those savings would be reflected in the price of steel, since you, as taxpayers, are buying colossal quantities of steel through your Government, it is in your own interest to build this seaway.

More important, the cargo shipped through the seaway is sure of reaching its destination. The tragedy of ore ships, torpedoed in the last war is too recent to be forgotten. Five out of seven of our ships bringing ore from Chile through the Atlantic were sunk in the last war. American lives were lost. Now we have an opportunity to ship ore through a protected waterway which in wartime would avoid dangerous Atlantic waters. And by doing this we would avoid risking the lives of many American boys.

There are some people in my own city of New York who oppose the St. Lawrence project. They claim that the export trade of New York will be harmed by the seaway. Their fears are unfounded. The 30,000,000 tons of iron ore which will one day move through the seaway are not New York traffic. The grain freighters which will bear 10,000,000 tons of the Nation's wheat and corn from the Midwest to the markets of the world are not stealing that traffic from New York.

New York is entering, I am sure, a great period of expansion. This will be promoted and encouraged by the St. Lawrence project.

Russia has announced that she will develop 20,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity on the Volga River. That is roughly twice what we plan to develop on the St. Lawrence. Russia is building canals across hundreds of miles to connect the White, the Black, the Baltic, and the Caspian Seas. How can we dare to sit back and watch these activities without taking some action on our own? Only 114 miles of the St. Lawrence River remain to be cleared to open a waterway almost 2,500 miles long, a lifeline from the Atlantic Ocean to the interior of the continent. The cost, about $566,000,000 to be expended over a period of several years and all of which is to be repaid, is tiny in a $60,000,000,000 defense budget.

The signs point to a long period of mobilizing our strength. General Bradley and General Eisenhower have estimated this period at 10 to 20 years. By starting the St. Lawrence project immediately it can be finished in 4 years and the strength of this hemisphere immeasurably increased.

My fellow citizens, this is a matter of the greatest urgency. This is not a matter of my personal opinion. It is the consensus of our responsible defense leaders. Would you take the word of General Marshall and of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the need to build three new aircraft carriers or B-36 airplanes? Why not take the word of these same leaders on a project which would cost even less than the aircraft carriers or B-36 planes, which would be self-liquidating and which would result in great benefits for this country of ours, for which our children and our grandchildren will thank us?

Indicate your support of this project to your Representatives and Senators in Congress. The time is now. We shall have a tragic account to settle with history if we delay this project any further.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, during all my service in Congress I have never seen such a spontaneous uprising on the part of the American people in indignation over the firing of Gen. Douglas MacArthur by President Truman.

The people of my district are alarmed, disgusted, bitter, and angry. They have every reason to be. I have received many long-distance phone calls, and hundreds of letters and telegrams expressing resentment of the President's action.

No words of mine can adequately convey just how the people of my district feel about this, and I am accordingly inserting in the RECORD just a few samples of the telegrams I have received. In this way I shall be able to convey to the Congress and to the country what my people think about the firing of our country's great military leader who probably knows, more than any other man, the exact situation in the Far East.

Here are some samples:

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—For heaven's sake, LES, what has happened to this Government of the people, by the people, and for the people? Let's forget about the Republicans and Democrats for a while and try to find enough real Americans down there to salvage something from this wreckage.

PAXTON, ILL.—Time for Congress to change Commander in Chief, that American affairs, both national and foreign, be conducted by Americans for Americans. Time that we stop appeasing the enemies who are killing our boys in Korea. Time for Congress to work on the American plan. Do it now.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—Firing MacArthur is Joe Stalin's greatest achievement. Worst news since Pearl Harbor. Everybody wants to know where do we go from here.

KANKAKEE, ILL.—As a good Democrat, I advocate the impeachment of President Truman.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—If you can't oust Truman please kick out Marshall and Acheson.

PAXTON, ILL.—It's later than you think. At least MacArthur had his own foreign policy—more than we can say for our State Department. Let's wake up, give us some legislation to let us at least know why our boys are being killed. We veterans of World War I and II think the whole mess stinks, especially in Washington.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—Please use your influence to have terrible wrong done American people and General MacArthur corrected by having Acheson fired and General MacArthur appointed Secretary of State.

CHENOA, ILL.—This community shocked by treatment of General MacArthur. This has brought about more comment and discussion in our grain office today than anything in history. We feel that the time has come for action to remedy this situation that brought this about. We hope action will be forthcoming by all Members of Congress.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—Impeach the little ward politician stupidity from Kansas City. This is another sell-out of our country to those dirty Britons who run the Far East while our sons give up their lives for British domination and dirty dollars. It's just more dirty politics.

ROANOKE, ILL.—Keep MacArthur and impeach Truman.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—Shocked with irresponsible dismissal of MacArthur. Administration policy threatens our survival. Congress must reestablish its constitutional powers. Impeachment urged.

We Must Not Rush Into World War III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I have prepared on the subject We Must Not Rush Into World War III.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the present turbulent days when people are greatly upset over world conditions in general, it has been difficult to explain why General MacArthur should leave his post and be replaced at the President's orders by his former subordinate. Possibly General Eisenhower gave us a clue in his address to Congress on February 1 immediately after his return from Europe. When he had outlined the powers and resources of the democracies, he was asked why we should be frightened of dictator nations if we had great quantities of oil and steel far superior to theirs. He replied, "Only for one reason—because they have unity of purpose." Then he added: "What we have got to do is to meet that unity with a higher type, the unity of free men that will not be defeated."

It has been interesting to me that a group of scientists working at the research laboratory at Los Alamos, N. Mex., which is the principal center of study on all atomic explosion activities in this country, have seen the issue more clearly than most people view it. They sensed that the demands of General MacArthur could bring on a third world war. It has been pointed out in the last few hours that MacArthur sought the right, not only to bomb Chinese bases in Manchuria, but also to bombard the China coast and that he would have liked to have the troops of Chiang Kai-shek armed by the United States and land on the Chinese mainland in a major invasion. That, of course, could only mean that everyone of Chiang's troops would have to be accompanied by a half-dozen soldiers from the United States. Since Russia has a nonaggression pact with China, that could only mean the beginning of world war III.

These scientists at Los Alamos preferred to have a group in the United Nations direct the army in Korea. They know the power of the weapons which they are helping to create. They know how much the destructive force of an atomic explosion has been multiplied by recent scientific developments which they have largely directed. Therefore, it was of particular interest to me to read in the Albuquerque Journal of April 8 an item pointing out how these men at Los Alamos tried to make their contribution toward keeping America out of a third world war. They wanted the research and study which they have been making of nuclear energy to be of benefit in lifting burdens off the backs of the peoples of the world and not used in a sudden attempt to see if explosion after explosion could rock our great cities, destroy our homes and slaughter people by the millions. The article from the Albuquerque Journal is as follows:

"Some of the leading scientists at Los Alamos, research center for hydrogen bomb work, are worried men these days. Working with weapons of cataclysmic proportions naturally makes for sharp reflections on world conditions, and the thought of many physicists, chemists and mathematicians is that the conduct of the Korean war is bringing the world dangerously near the inferno of an atomic world war.

"These men, many of them from countries all over the world, feel the Korean war should be conducted by the United Nations rather than by Gen. Douglas MacArthur. The fear is that MacArthur may provoke the Chinese Communists into a large-scale move against the UN forces which would be certain, in their opinion, to precipitate a world-wide conflagration.

"For the past few years, any worries or thoughts Los Alamos residents have had have been limited to private discussions among friends. But 2 weeks ago, some scientists felt that continued silence was shirking their duty and they met to draw up a proposal calling for creation of a group in the UN to direct the army in Korea.

"The feeling was that a statement of this kind coming from Los Alamos might be taken more seriously than a similar action from other cities."

In addition, I think it noteworthy that not all our military leaders were trigger-happy, that nearly all of them were opposed to an Army clique overriding civilian government. It is of tremendous significance that every member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff favored the removal of General MacArthur. They recognized that it was his privilege to want to conduct a general war, but they could remember how wrong he had been in his judgment that the Chinese Communists would not be brought into the Korean conflict if he crossed the thirty-eighth parallel and shoved his armies close to the Manchurian border.

Therefore, it is possible that other military leaders might not have been impressed by his feeling that if we bombed the mainland of China and placed our battleships off the Chinese coast and sprayed shells into their cities, the Chinese Communists would flee in fright and that Russia would not come to their assistance. There were those who believed that such an action by us could only be the beginning of a third world war.

One of the most useful editorials that I have read was one which appeared in the Washington Post of April 12, entitled "The President Acts." It is quite obvious that the editors of the Washington Post regretted that the career of General MacArthur should end on such an unhappy note but they proceeded to analyze the crisis which had developed. It is that analysis which strikes me as helpful in trying to understand the reasons for the President's action. The editorial is as follows:

"THE PRESIDENT ACTS

"The illustrious career of General MacArthur came to an end upon an inglorious note which will be regretted by all America. But there was no help for it. There is no room in our society for indispensable men or for ungovernable generals, no provision in our Constitution for the President to play second fiddle. Civil supremacy had to be reasserted, and it was wisest to reassert civil supremacy unmistakably. The German peril got its head and sustenance from the hospitality of the German people to a general staff that had become a law unto itself. Japan was taken on the warpath by an army clique that overrode civilian government. These things must not happen here. We all have reason to be grateful that no segment of our society has been more critical of the self-willed conduct of General MacArthur than the high officers of our armed services. MacArthur, we feel sure, had no military following outside the dazzled court with which he had surrounded himself in Tokyo.

"The supercession of General MacArthur is the first sign in months of a firm hand at the helm of our affairs. Mr. Truman should never again relax his initiative. He is the Commander in Chief and the organ of our foreign affairs, yet he had seemed to be giving General MacArthur one opportunity after another to indulge his assumption of the highest authority. This he did, in particular, when he declared time after time that decisions at the thirty-eighth parallel were properly those of the supreme commander. In so doing he seemed to be giving a free hand to a man he knew had no sympathy with the policy he was given to execute. Our policy is to fight a limited war in the Far East; MacArthur wanted to fight a general and an all-out war. MacArthur is a crusader who feels that, with or without allies, the United States must embark up a 'jihad' against communism in Asia—which means communism everywhere. This is an aim that has no settled lodgment in official Washington.

"Our policy-makers, alas, have hitherto blown hot and cold about the nature of our adversary as well as about the problem of authority. It is time they developed a new clarity. To act upon the theory that our military enemy is communism is to condemn this country to an endless military adventure that would dig its grave and the grave of Western civilization. The religious wars of the sixteenth century are the supreme lesson in history that an idea cannot be conquered militarily. On the contrary, an idea thrives on military operations against it, and it is conceivable, perhaps sure, that communism would still be going stronger after all Russia had been laid in waste. The enemy against which the free world is arming is the gang who have captured Russia. Any identification of the enemy along the ideological lines of General MacArthur's reasoning is the way to play the game of Soviet Russia. 'So long as there are discontented groups within the Western nations,' says Herbert Butterfield in Christianity and History, 'the Soviet Union is perhaps clear-sighted in its recognition of the interest it has in keeping diplomacy on an ideological basis.'

"So the greatest urgency underlines the need to set our military sights straight in our two-headed struggle. This the President can furnish by leadership. To be a leader in a democracy in a crisis is to be a prophet—an awakener, as Jacques Maritain calls it. Lack of such leadership will infallibly turn people to false prophets. And that is not all. Popular recognition of leadership requires not only inspiration at the top but confidence in the men in positions of subordinate authority. Now that the President has shown who's boss, he ought to seek the people's suffrage by revamping his official family. Certainly the crisis is not over as a result of his ouster of MacArthur. It may be only beginning, and the President should rise to his opportunity, not be content to react to a breach of discipline. There is a house to put in order in Washington as well as in Tokyo."

Finally, I have been greatly interested in the appraisals of columnists and commentators. From the column of Stewart Alsop in this morning's Washington Post I pick out these words as informative: "Either President Truman or General MacArthur had to be fired, and a general cannot fire his Commander in Chief. It is really as simple as that."

Marquis Childs, under the heading, "Storm over MacArthur," had many interesting things to say. Here are two or three paragraphs from that article:

"Some who are so passionately for MacArthur seem to be for him in the belief that if he were only given his own way, he would find a magical means to end the war and bring peace to the Pacific. This does not, of course, conform to the facts. The MacArthur policy would certainly have expanded the Pacific war.

"Behind MacArthur is the whole of the so-called China lobby. It has large resources of money, including the support of a half-dozen Chinese in this country, most of the members of the Soong family, who are reported to have sums in banks in Switzerland, the Argentine, Holland, and the United States.

"This violent quarrel can mean a further paralysis of Government at a time when it is vital to rearm and, through rearming, to unify the coalition of western nations. If we can't have our way in the Far East, the extremists may say, in effect, to the President, "Then you will not get your way in Europe." Obstructionism under our system of divided powers can do a lot when there is no really responsible control in Congress as between Republicans and Democrats.

"Already the evidence of it has been ample in this Congress. If it now goes on to impede vital measures, we shall have paid a terrible price for our divisions."

That is the note which needs to be remembered. The actions of General MacArthur in proclaiming that Formosa is more important to the defense of the United States than France, his action in writing to the Republican leader of the House of Representatives, JOE MARTIN, in support of a policy completely contrary to the policy of his Commander in Chief could only mean a division, a disunity, and give a clue as to why his removal was imperative. Our country had to come to the principle which General Eisenhower had laid down. One thing was required and that was unity of purpose. If it has been impossible to achieve it in the Congress, it nevertheless had to be obtained in the Korean command.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article on the St. Lawrence seaway, written by Clem Norton and published in the Lynn (Mass.) Telegram-News of April 8, 1951, including certain corrections of typographical errors.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. LAWRENCE

Boston's leaders are wrong in opposing the St. Lawrence waterway. It will help the port of Boston. Every President since Wilson has recommended it. President Truman and Eisenhower claim that it's necessary for national security. Steel officials who once termed the idea a "Socialist's ditch" now approve, so as to bring ore by ship from the Quebec, Labrador area, because our Mesabi ore is running out. Today, Quebec ore comes by ocean steamer to Montreal and is then dumped into boats small enough to navigate the 14-foot Canadian Canal which bypasses the International Rapids, but this method is too expensive. United States Steel has built a plant on the water near Philadelphia so as to utilize ore from Venezuela. National Steel contemplates building mills in Connecticut. If Midwest steel is unable to obtain foreign ore by water, then it may mean that it will have to move east, and this would mean ghost cities and a tremendous economic upheaval.

The St. Lawrence is the greatest undeveloped hydroelectric river on the continent. It's a Mediterranean Sea, stretching 2,200 miles into the heart of the continent from the ocean to Duluth. It reaches right into the great industrial and agricultural heart of the Midwest. The steady-flowing St. Lawrence, fed by the Great Lakes containing half the fresh water of the world will produce 2,600,000 kilowatts of electricity annually, half to go to Canada, at about half the cost of steam-generated power. President Truman claims that we produced over 100,000 planes during the war, a fantastic figure, only because of Tennessee and Columbia River hydroelectric power. New England a power-starved area, can use some of that cheap electricity. American homes have more than doubled their consumption of electricity in the past 10 years.

WHO?

Well, who is stopping this development? Who is strong enough to thwart our war chiefs who claim that it's necessary for national security? A lobby made up of representatives of utilities, chambers of commerce, railroads, and ports on the eastern seaboards, plus banks and insurance companies who have investments in the said enterprises. And what's their argument? That they'll lose freight revenue. That the cocoa and coffee, say, that now comes by boat to an Atlantic port and is then shipped by rail to Detroit, will be taken by ship, right to Detroit if the St. Lawrence is deepened. That autos that now come from Detroit to Boston by rail, will then come by ship, but why not if the freight rate is $20 to $30 less an auto?

The Boston Chamber once approved the idea when private capital was to do the job. Ninety percent of the work has been completed. Less than 125 miles of dredging remains to be done at the International Rapids between Ogdensburg, N. Y., and Cornwall, Ontario.

Here are other arguments used against the idea, but none seem valid. It will be frozen up, 5 months of the year. There is fog. A 27-foot depth is not enough. The Federal Government will have to dredge out harbors at Chicago, Detroit, and so on. Answer: Montreal, frozen up 5 months a year, does more business than any port on the continent with the exception of New York. Fog does not interfere. The Soo Canal on the Great Lakes, frozen up 5 months a year, does a bigger business than the Panama and Suez Canals put together. General Marshall testified that most of the world's ships could use the 27-foot depth, and facts support him, for the average ship is seldom loaded to the limit. And if a greater depth is necessary, that can come later.

Opening up the St. Lawrence will bring up a Midwest market to, say, the baby-carriage manufacturer in Gardner, Mass. A thousand other illustrations might be given. And Boston, being the largest near port to the St. Lawrence, should benefit, as it benefited by the opening of the Panama Canal. But when Panama was suggested, certain Boston officials objected, as they object today to the St. Lawrence affair.

How much longer will millions of our people in the Midwest allow themselves to continue to be locked up from access to the oceans of the world, when the project calls for an expenditure of less than $800,000,000 and the dredging of less than 125 miles? The money will be paid back, because the idea is self-liquidating because of tolls.

We think nothing of giving a needy nation $800,000,000 or more outright. The sum, as money goes today, is peanuts.

With a third world war threatening, and millions of our boys offering their lives, and our national leaders demanding this improvement for national security purposes, how much longer can selfish interests prevent progress?

But the idea is so right, that it is coming, just as sure as is tomorrow.

If we only could get these basic facts to the people.

Presentation of ECA Certificates of Cooperation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Mr. William C. Foster, Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration, at the national presentation ceremony of ECA certificates of cooperation, held in Washington on April 3.

Mr. Foster is one of our ablest and most distinguished administrators, with long experience, both in business and in Government. He came into Government with the admiration of the business community through his outstanding work for the Committee for Economic Development and elsewhere. He has won the support of everyone with whom he has worked in Washington, and, although there are many executives who are more publicized, I doubt whether there is any in Washington today who is more popular or respected.

I call the particular attention of the Congress to his admonition that—

If anything approximating a $100,000,000,000 increase in European productivity is to be achieved, it must have the full support of European management and European labor—and to obtain that support, the ECA must undertake one of the greatest educational jobs in history—to teach new ideas, new techniques, to peoples whose economic tradition causes them to reject innovation almost by reflex action.

In these few phrases Mr. Foster outlines the difficult road of the future on which we are now embarked. I know his many warm friends in the Congress, among whom I am proud to number myself, all wish him well in his great and unprecedented task.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF WILLIAM C. FOSTER, ADMINISTRATOR, ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION

My principal assignment today—certainly one of the most pleasant that I have ever had—is to express, on behalf of all of us in ECA, the profound appreciation we all feel for the constructive and intimate cooperation we have received from American management and from American labor.

I am especially pleased that our colleagues and partners in the European Recovery Program, as represented by the distinguished Ambassadors and Ministers of the Western European governments, have been able to join us today. By their very presence, they testify to the appreciation felt by their own peoples for the contributions of American management and labor to the success of the Marshall plan.

From the outset, the support of management and labor—both through their individual members and their associations and chambers and unions—has helped to sustain the Marshall plan and to give it drive and direction. Such organizations as the NAM and the CIO, the United States chamber and the A. F. of L., the CED and the International Association of Machinists, the Foreign Trade Council and others have conducted their own careful and searching studies of the Marshall plan. Then they endorsed it, helping to sway public opinion in its favor. And every time the Marshall plan came up before Congress for a review of things done, and a forecast of things still to be done, these groups of management and labor continued their support—not by means of any blanket approval but by means of constructive criticism, and suggestions for improvement. Equally important, perhaps, has been the way in which these management and labor groups have helped us at ECA to recruit the kind of skilled executive and technical and labor personnel to staff ECA here in Washington and overseas.

In my opinion, however, the most valuable contribution American management and American labor have made to the Marshall plan is to be found in their wholehearted cooperation in our technical assistance program.

For I firmly believe that the future of western civilization in substantial measure depends upon the ability of management, labor and governments in Western Europe to grasp the principles of American productivity and put them into practice. The essentials of American productivity are being demonstrated by our technical assistance program, and are being applied, at an ever-increasing rate. But both demonstration and application need to be tremendously stepped up in speed, in size, and in scope. No need is more urgent; no task demands more attention than to expand and to quicken our technical assistance program which must stand at the very core of our efforts to produce more in Western Europe—to produce more so that everybody will have more.

I should like to summarize—very briefly—a few of the accomplishments already chalked up to the credit of our ECA technical assistance program.

During the past 2 years, ECA has brought to the United States more than 400 teams of technicians, managers, and workers from almost every sector of Western European industry.

Thanks to the cooperation of our business and industrial associations, and particularly the individual manufacturing firms, these teams were able to visit more than 2,000 plants, to study our American methods in production and distribution. They have been able to discuss their observations with all ranks of American producers in the plants they visited. They talked to top executives in the board room and to workers at punch presses and looms and lathes and along assembly lines. Thanks to the cooperation of the labor unions, these teams have been given the opportunity to discuss work conditions in United States industry with thousands of our own working men and women. They have heard from them what American productivity means to them and their families.

It is still too early to fully assess the results of this program. But we do know it is yielding encouraging results. This is reflected by the fact that industrial production in Western Europe had in 1950 reached a level of 27 percent above 1938; agricultural production 9 percent above; intra-European trade 25 percent, and European exports to the rest of the world 30 percent above prewar.

But quite as significant as these physical results is the fact that Western Europe is rapidly becoming "productivity conscious." This is particularly true among younger executives and labor leaders. In many plants, in many industries, they are building up pressures to break down the obsolescent, wasteful methods that have become so firmly entrenched in the European industrial tradition. They are replacing outworn methods with modern methods. And in hundreds of Western European factories, they are succeeding with astonishing results. To illustrate this trend, let me read just a single paragraph from the report of one of our ECA representatives abroad, written after a visit to a French foundry:

"Upon his return from a technical assistance mission to the United States, the head of the foundry division at Etablissement Japhy Freres decided to overhaul operations. He cut out the making of certain castings, rearranged his equipment, and retrained his workers. In 1 year he reduced man-hours per ton from 222 to 83, cut his prices 25 to 30 percent, and raised wages 20 to 25 percent. A year ago this foundry was losing 2,000,000 francs a month; today it is in the black."

Today, on the third anniversary of the Marshall plan, all of us in this room can feel a deep sense of gratification at the goals that have been gained. In most of Western Europe the job of rehabilitation has been largely completed. If we lived in a peaceful world, today, I think we might well be able to say that the job of European recovery has been virtually accomplished, and that Marshall plan outlays could be reduced to a small volume of "wind-up" aid to a few countries.

But I am compelled by the circumstances we all face to tell you very bluntly, there is more to do. For the brutal fact is that we do not live in a peaceful world today, nor in anything approaching it.

We live in a world that may be plunged into total, atomic war, by one of the most ruthless, imperialistic powers in history—a power that has already demonstrated through its satellites and puppets, its willingness to resort to naked aggression.

Remarkable progress—as General Marshall says "near miraculous" progress has been made by Western Europe under the Marshall plan. Nevertheless, the ERP countries are still not strong enough to sustain—by themselves alone—the kind of defense program that the Soviet menace requires—without seriously impairing the living standard they have recently restored. To reduce those living standards now, to any appreciable extent, would be to jeopardize the gains we have scored during the first 3 years of the Marshall plan. People who have just emerged from the quagmire of poverty and deprivation will not welcome the prospect of being bogged down again. Any serious impairment of living standards in Western Europe today would change the psychological climate from hopefulness and confidence and the will to resist Soviet threats into pessimism, doubt and "neutralism." It would certainly generate the kind of social and political unrest which might very possibly leave Western Europe even more vulnerable to aggression from within than she is to aggression from without.

I have already mentioned that the industrial and agricultural production of the ERP countries is well above prewar. Against this, however, must be weighed a 10 percent increase in population and the crucial fact that prewar standards of living in most European countries were so low that they gave rise to nazism and fascism, and plunged us all into World War II.

To many Europeans the defense program which we are urging upon them, looks, not like a choice between guns and butter but like a choice between guns and bread. The limiting factor of preparedness efforts in Western Europe is not the unwillingness of the governments or the peoples to defend themselves; it is simply their economic inability to carry an adequate defense program, superimposed upon the civilian economies.

The United States is now compelled, in its own self-interest to help Western Europe rearm.

However, we in ECA believe that the western European countries, within a few years, cannot only assume the full burden of a defense program, but also can raise the living standards of their people—at the same time.

We do not believe that the choice for Western Europe is between guns or bread. We are convinced that Western Europe can—if its people will make the necessary effort and take the necessary risks—have both guns and bread, and a little butter too. We are convinced that the ERP countries can, within a reasonable number of years, increase their total output of goods and services by an additional $100,000,000,000 worth annually. That should be their goal.

Obviously, if anything approaching a $100,000,000,000 increase in annual output can be achieved by Western Europe, its countries can undertake a defense program many times the size of the Military Establishment now proposed. They could carry a defense program of $40,000,000,000 to $50,000,000,000 annually, if necessary, and at the same time raise their living standards by 50 percent. And what is most important both to American taxpayers and to the western Europeans themselves, today's ERP countries could soon become completely independent of outside economic assistance.

Many of us in ECA think that one answer to Western Europe's defense problems, her economic problems, her social and political problems, can be summed up in one single word—productivity. And when I say productivity, I include all of the elements—human and material—that make productivity possible and effective.

I am sure that many of our friends in Western Europe share with us the conviction that the very existence of their civilization, that the success of the Western World's effort to meet the menace of communism depends upon a creative and operative and very specific and realistic program to raise their productivity. Our particular part of the job is to show them that the goal of raising that productivity by even such a high amount as $100,000,000,000 is something that can be—and, indeed, must be—achieved. It is our part of the job to help them realize more clearly and perhaps more understandingly the inescapable necessity of doing all the difficult and even painful things that are part and parcel of a successful productivity program.

Let me list what we in ECA consider to be the indispensable ingredients in any such undertaking:

First of all, there must be an expanded technical assistance program. Under our present TA arrangements, we have been able to convey the lessons of American productivity to a few thousands of western European managers, technicians, and workers. Now, we must develop techniques to drive these lessons home to all European management, to all European technicians, to all European labor, and to their governments.

Second, a mass market must be created to enable western European producers to sell their wares at a price at a profit that will justify their adoption of mass production and distribution methods. By this I mean that the ERP countries must take swift and positive action to bring into being now a mass European market.

Third, the savings which result from improved production and distribution methods must be passed on to the consumers in the form of lower prices and to the worker in the form of higher wages. Otherwise, it will be impossible to release the purchasing power required to create that mass market and to keep it going. To say all this in another way, what I mean is more goods, such as bread, and shoes, for the people and more services, such as electric light and medical care for the people and more guns and more tanks and more planes for their defense.

Fourth, the self-strangulating practices of so many European industries in restricting output, in limiting markets, in pegging high prices must be abolished. In their place must come both the psychological and practical acceptance of high-volume production, high wages, high profits, all based upon an ever-lower-unit cost.

Fifth, sound fiscal and financial policies must be vigorously applied both by European governments and by the European business community. Without drastic fiscal reforms, without new attitudes toward the role of the budget and the fiscal machinery, it will be impossible to develop mass markets in Western Europe.

Sixth, our friends in Western Europe are recognizing more and more that American productivity does not derive only from installing expensive equipment in a factory—even though that equipment may be important to that factory's record of production. They are recognizing that even more important is the ability—the know-how—of making the best possible use of all the equipment, of all the tools, of all the material on hand. Consider, for example, the experience of a French shoe manufacturer who visited the United States with a technical mission last spring. His name is Maurice Douheret. He is the manager-owner of Etablissements ROC, and he has been able to increase his output from 400 to 600 pairs of shoes per day, simply by rejigging his machines and standardizing his output. His only capital expenditure was a modest sum to install automatic regulators, and improve his lighting and ventilating systems. As a result of this productivity increase, Mr. Douheret reports that he has raised the wages of his workers 20 percent and absorbed a 20-percent advance in raw-material costs, without raising his prices.

The ECA therefore believes that Western European industry could quickly achieve a substantial increase in its ability to produce with a comparatively small outlay of new capital, simply by using more efficiently its human and material resources inside the plant and by completely revamping its merchandising methods. These, of course, are problems of education. They are problems of teaching; they are problems of imparting the lore and learning of American management and technicians and labor to their opposite numbers in Western Europe.

In view of this need to educate, I think that the ECA has got to find a way to bring management and labor even more closely into our program than ever before. I am sure that you, representatives of the great business and union organizations appreciate quite as much as I do that the venture I have just outlined cannot fulfill its aims through the efforts of governments alone. If anything approximating a $100,000,000,000 increase in European productivity is to be achieved, it must have the full support of European management and European labor. To obtain that support, the ECA in concert with the governments of Western Europe must undertake one of the greatest educational jobs in history. It is the job of teaching new ideas, and new techniques, to peoples whose economic tradition causes them to reject innovation almost by reflex action.

I am only revealing the obvious when I say that you representatives of American management and American labor can certainly command a more sympathetic audience from your opposite numbers in Western Europe than can ECA officials. We are, after all, the officials of a foreign government. But you can discuss new methods and new ideas from a common approach, a common concern, a common preoccupation, and a common store of experience. Your opposite numbers abroad will therefore heed you more attentively than they would heed even the officials of their own government agencies.

In the very near future, my associates and I expect to call upon you gentlemen and your colleagues in industrial and labor groups, to seek your advice and recommendations. We are going to ask you to join us in this educational job, along every step of the way.

I have said that a prodigious increase in productivity for Western Europe can build the strength to forefend both internal and external aggression. Hence productivity has to be regarded, not merely as a means to heighten physical resources but also as a means to heighten spiritual resources. When the chips are down men will defend only those values in which they believe, only those institutions in which they participate. Seen in this light, productivity is an instrument of peace—that peace which can be based only upon "strength for the free world." Strength for the free world is more than a slogan. It is the lifeline of freedom in our day.

Proposed Amalgamation of Dixie Democrats and Yank Republicans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. STENNIS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, on Monday last, April 9, the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] delivered an interesting and informative speech to the Exchange Club in Jackson, Miss.

An editorial written by Mr. Fred Sullens, distinguished and able editor of the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News, and a report of the speech of the Senator from South Dakota, appeared in the April 9 issue of this newspaper.

On behalf of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] and myself, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial and the news report of the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and the news report of the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News of April 10, 1951]

SENATOR MUNDT'S GREAT SPEECH

Senator KARL MUNDT, South Dakota Republican, has the answer, and it is a very definite answer.

Only through a coalition of conservative Republicans and States' rights Democrats can the Nation's drift toward a welfare state be checked.

A welfare state, be it understood, is communism in the making.

When the South Dakota Senator, addressing the Exchange Club of Jackson Monday afternoon, proposed a coalition of this character in the presidential campaign next year to oppose the welfare-state Democrats he was cheered to the echo. Not mere polite applause, mind you, but ear-splitting rebel yells of the kind heard at political gatherings in this State threescore years ago. Members of the Exchange Club and their guests almost lifted the roof from the Hotel Edwards ballroom. It was a complete refutation of the belief that citizens of Jackson had long since forgotten how to cheer; that they manifest applause only by polite handclapping. This time they surely had their hearts in it.

The Exchange Club is not a political organization—just another of those rather numerous luncheon clubs—but it has within its membership many of the leading business and professional men of Jackson, mostly of the younger generation, men who keep abreast of the times, who are familiar with current trends, and of whom it can be fairly said that they represent a first-class cross-section of public sentiment in this community.

That such a body of men would not only respectfully listen to a proposal from a Republican political leader, but receive his proposal with the wildest enthusiasm, would have astonished President Truman and his welfare-state leaders if they had been privileged to hear it.

The important truth is that political history was written at that Exchange Club meeting in Jackson Monday afternoon—history from which this Nation is going to hear some distinct repercussions in the near future.

In truth and in fact, it was the beginning of a movement to launch a new national political movement or organization that will have to be reckoned with in the presidential campaign next year.

It may be known as the Democratic-Republican alliance, the Liberty Party, the Human Rights Party, or some other name that will adequately describe its purpose, and that purpose will be to get rid of the Government now in power in Washington.

Senator MUNDT was coldly logical in his proposal. Affirming his faith in the doctrine of States' rights as it has been so earnestly preached by southern Democrats, he declared that this doctrine is equally important in all other States of the Union. It is a doctrine now denied in platforms of both the Republican and Democratic Parties. In fact, the platforms of the two parties are so much alike that one might well say to each, "A plague on both your houses."

With cogent reasoning and splendid eloquence Senator MUNDT drew a picture of the dangers into which this Nation is drifting. The rights and functions of free men are dwindling, free enterprise and individual initiative are being thwarted, and if the freedom for which our forefathers fought is to be restored in these United States we must have a political upheaval that will sweep out of office all who favor a welfare state, White House dictatorship, and the deadly encroachments of bureaucracy. Our citizens have inalienable rights in the Federal Government and the States that must not be surrendered or modified. It is the curse of communism slowly eating at the vitals of our Nation, just as it is doing in other parts of the world where more than one-half of all people now living are dominated by communism and will eventually be reduced to an economic state nothing short of slavery.

Communism is a lie on its face, said Senator MUNDT. It is not a sharing and sharing alike of worldly goods. It is not even a sharing according to need as preached by Marx, Lenin, and Stalin. Communism is a Godless way of life. It is financial control by a greedy and remorseless few of the entire social and economic fabric of the Nation. Communism is a remorseless dictatorship that not only denies God but likewise the rights of free men and women.

It is to battle with a deadly menace such as this that Senator MUNDT urged southern Democrats and conservative Republicans to join forces next year and put forth a candidate for President who will recognize the rights of States, the time-honored traditions of the South, and offer to the Nation a platform of which all citizens who love freedom can stand.

It will be useless, said the speaker, for the South to hope to win its fight within the Democratic Party. The melancholy truth is that the South lost control of the Democratic Party at the party national convention in Chicago in 1936 when it agreed to repeal of the two-thirds rule, and that power will never be restored to the South by Northern, Eastern, and Western States.

Throughout his address, covering more than an hour, Senator MUNDT was earnest, forceful, and plausible. Not once did he descend to demagogy or sprinkle his speech with specious reasoning.

And he did bring down the house—something no other Republican ever succeeded in doing in this general latitude and longitude. That in itself was an astonishing achievement.

Just about this time next year—maybe sooner—you are going to be hearing some lively echoes of a political speech delivered in Jackson on Monday afternoon, April 9, by Senator KARL MUNDT, Republican, of South Dakota.

[From the Jackson (Miss.) Daily News of April 9, 1951]

MUNDT TELLS JACKSON CIVIC LEADERS DIXIE DEMOCRATS CAN JOIN YANK REPUBLICANS

"It is entirely within the realm of political possibility that northern Republicans and southern Democrats may form an alliance by the next presidential election," Senator KARL MUNDT (Republican, South Dakota) told the Jackson Exchange Club Monday at noon.

About 300 Jackson and Mississippi leaders heard the Republican Senator make this history-making statement.

Senator MUNDT is one of three Members of the United States Senate investigating committee who Monday morning opened hearings on charges of Federal job sales in Mississippi.

"All over America, in every State, there has never before been so much interest in the alliance between southern Democrats and northern Republicans of like mind, so that they can vote for the same candidate for President and elect an administration dedicated to the preservation of States' rights, the protection of the individual freedoms of our citizens, and our private enterprise economy," MUNDT declared.

He declined to predict who might be favored as a Presidential candidate in the event the two groups formed an alliance by the next election.

He said, however, that perhaps the slate would be a combination of northern Republicans and southern Democrats.

"As in any alliance, each group has to come halfway across the street," he continued.

"By bringing together two groups that have the same basic political and economic interests the hurdle of party labels can be eliminated in the interests of basic American principals," said MUNDT.

Today, said MUNDT, America is reaping the sorry dividence of a multiparty system. He warned that splinter parties were becoming so numerous that they were weakening the Nation.

The Republican Senator, introduced by Senator JOHN STENNIS, paid tribute to Gov. Fielding Wright for the courage to stand up against the Truman Democrats and their platform of socialism.

Senator MUNDT said for the 16 years he has been in Congress, "I have voted with the conservative Senators from the South against legislation with socialistic trends."

He said he would like to see the Democrats of the South walk out again if their party at the 1952 convention nominates Truman or any other of his kind with leftist leanings.

Then, he added, these Southern conservative leaders could instead of trying to form a third party, come to the Republican convention and tell us Republicans to nominate a conservative Democrat for the Vice Presidency on a Republican ticket * * * and also advise us about what planks in our platform are repugnant to the South.

Since the socialist trend began in 1935, MUNDT emphasized, both major parties have been appealing in their platforms for the big city socialistic blocs.

"What we have today," he declared, actually is four splinter parties * * * the conservative and so-called liberal elements of Republicans and Democrats."

Predicting that with ingenuity and proper engineering the conservative elements of the North and South can form an alliance to insure proper leadership, MUNDT suggested:

"Let's abandon the elephant and the jackass of the two major parties by forming this alliance and use maybe the eagle as an emblem of a party. Surely, we would then have a genuine two-party system in which there would be no mistake or misunderstanding on principles."

"Only Dixie can save the Nation, and saving the Nation means saving the world," declared Senator KARL MUNDT in a mind-gripping speech that held the closest attention of its hearers.

Senator MUNDT is the open champion and staunch advocate of a coalition between conservative Republicans and Southern Democrats for the purpose of restoring State rights as a fundamental principle of our Government.

"We are today in the midst of that ageless contest between man and State to determine which shall be the master," said Senator MUNDT. "Today we see our Government steadily encroaching on the rights as well as the plain duties of our people, through a vicious policy of asking them to look to Washington for everything.

"Personally, I am a liberal in the concept of Thomas Jefferson. I am a firm believer in State rights but I also believe in the people assuming their full responsibility and not looking to the Government to provide them with easy living. When all these new proposals are being made to us by those who champion the welfare State we should stop and ask ourselves are such things necessary, are such things practical, and can we afford the expense involved. If we continue in our present path the end is bankruptcy. We must not permit the Government to become masters of the people. Too many men are exercising too much authority over too many people for too long a time. They must be forced to remember that they are servants, not masters."

Senator MUNDT's statements on States rights and private-enterprise principles were interrupted by generous applause of Exchange Club members and about 200 guests of outstanding Mississippi political leaders and businessmen. He spoke 30 minutes past the civic club dead line.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Seaway Arguments," published in the Omaha World-Herald of March 23, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SEAWAY ARGUMENTS

When the St. Lawrence seaway project was proposed to Congress this year, the battle lines formed almost immediately.

New England, the Atlantic ports and the Eastern railroads were against it. Most of the Great Lakes ports, except Chicago, were for it. Chicago, as always, seemed to be suffering from a bad case of schizophrenia. It was both for the seaway and against it.

New York's Mayor Impellitteri sounded off about this madcap scheme and Detroit and Milwaukee interests implied that grass will grow in their streets unless the seaway is completed. Such extravagant claims are no longer news.

The seaway is not a madcap scheme, nor is the commercial future of a few lake cities a matter of compelling national importance. The only possible justification for the project in these huge-spending times is its importance to national defense.

The Department of Defense and Defense Mobilizer Charles E. Wilson say it is urgently needed. They say the channeling of the St. Lawrence will permit Labrador iron ore to reach Pittsburgh and Gary, thus easing the American shortage of high-grade ore.

If the seaway can be sold to the country on this basis, well and good. But there should be no more of the regional sparring by the what's-in-it-for-me boys. Long ago they prejudiced many people against the St. Lawrence seaway project and they could be the means of killing it now.

MacArthur's Dismissal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "MacArthur's Dismissal," published in the Birmingham (Ala.) News of April 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR'S DISMISSAL

Pronounced differences of view between General MacArthur and those to whom he was responsible produced a situation that could not be permitted to continue indefinitely.

To have ignored that sharp conflict over policy in the conduct of the Korean conflict would probably have had progressively serious effects.

Surely the reaction among United States and United Nations troops to such a continuing situation would have been bad. Our relations with our allies would likely have been worsened. The Communists doubtless would have exploited these differences to the utmost. Something had to be done.

This paper believes the great majority of the American people will recognize that military commanders should be subject to their superiors in the making of general policy. MacArthur has indicated quite clearly that he intended to make certain of his own views known, notably in his recent letter to Representative JOE MARTIN, Massachusetts Republican. The general plainly desired to extend the conflict. He endorsed MARTIN'S idea of using Chinese Nationalist troops to open another front. He expressed the view that Asia rather than Europe is the major theater of conflict now with communism.

These ideas go directly against the policy of the United States Government and of the United Nations to limit the Korean conflict as much as is feasible.

The divergences produced great uncertainties as to the conduct of the war—uncertainties among our allies, uncertainties among the Communists.

President Truman could have rebuked General MacArthur. But the commander already had had repeated plain indications that his comments expressing conflicting views on broad policy were not in order. The President evidently felt that the results of a reprimand would not be satisfactory. And while such a drastic step as removal of a great military leader produces deep regrets in this country in one respect, it is not difficult to understand how Mr. Truman reached the conclusion that such a step was now called for.

It should be borne clearly in mind that the differences in this situation did not involve only the President and MacArthur. The Joint Chiefs of Staff is largely responsible for American military policy. It has opposed extending the war.

What General MacArthur thought would be the course of such an extension is far from clear. Of course he has not set forth his ideas in that connection. Could he have thought a decisive victory could have been won over the Communists in a general war in China? Does he believe the Russians would remain out of such a conflict? Where would it lead?

MacArthur, as Mr. Truman emphasizes, has performed tremendous services to the country. He has been responsible for some great military achievements. He has the gratitude and admiration of the Nation for these services.

It is fortunate that so able a commander as General Ridgway is available to take over the far-reaching responsibilities of command in the Far East.

Value of the Dollar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Dollars and Sense," delivered by Frank Lilly, of Spokane, Wash., before the Coeur d'Alene (Idaho) Chamber of Commerce on April 5, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOLLARS AND SENSE

(By Frank Lilly)

If, back in 1940, your doctor told you after a physical check-up that you were sound as a dollar, and if, thereafter, it developed that you actually had various weaknesses which have resulted in the loss of sight of one eye, the loss of hearing in one ear, the use of an arm and a leg, and in addition, you now have both asthma and stomach ulcers, your doctor was absolutely right: you were as sound as the 1940 dollar which has had a bad case of dropsy, dropping down to a present value of less than 50 cents on the average and as low as 27 cents for such items as bread, butter, coffee, sugar, corn, cotton, beef, lard, copper, lead, zinc, tin, among numerous examples that could be given.

Thus, even if you now have more than twice as much in the bank, twice as much savings, life insurance, bonds, real estate, and other assets as you had in 1940, you are not quite so well off as you were at that time, and 11 years of your life are gone. Believe it or not, you are not so well off as you were in 1933 unless you now have assets more than two and one-half times larger than in that depression year if measured in terms of the constant dollar used in a recent report of the United States Department of Commerce.

The practical effect of this decrease in the value of the dollar is the same as if the Government had made a capital levy of over 50 percent, leaving you the short end of your savings, life insurance, and any pensions you may have earned in the service of an employer of your Government.

It is true that a part of the dollar's depreciation was due to the war, and few of us object to the loss sustained in the purchase of the so-called savings bonds, but the fact is that the depreciation started before the war and that the largest part of the loss of value has occurred in the last 5 years.

It is important to bear in mind that the dollar has no meaning except in terms of what it will buy. Confusion in this connection is responsible for much of the muddled thinking and the hue and cry over inflation, as if it were some new and strange animal that ate dollars. Actually inflation is the corollary of the depreciation, or deflation, of the dollar.

The stage for inflation was set back in 1933 when we went off gold and adopted irredeemable printing press paper currency. Like the sawdust that Mortimer Snerd substituted for the wheat bran he fed his chickens, it seemed to work; but it was inevitable that sooner or later we would find ourselves getting woodpeckers instead of little chicks out of the settings of wooden eggs.

This is the way the paper currency system works: Federal Reserve notes (IOU's) are issued against public and private debt, and because such so-called money is easily created it is in turn easily spent. Sooner or later, usually sooner, these debt-based dollars become so numerous that they lose a part of their buying power. In other words, prices rise and you have inflation through deflation of the dollar.

At this juncture, I suggest that you take a good look at one of your $10 bills. You will find that it is a Federal Reserve note which is redeemable in lawful money at the United States Treasury. If you are curious to see what "lawful money" looks like and send your bill to the Treasury, you will receive two $5 United States notes which are redeemable in lawful money—and that is as far as you go.

You may say, as some people have said to me: I don't care what it is, money, currency, or what not, just so long as I can get enough of it to buy what I want with it. And, because more currency is needed to buy what people want to buy, wages are increased to meet higher prices and more and more debts are created as a base for more and more paper currency. This puts prices and wages up again and so on and on.

Eventually efforts are made to stop the paper-money racket responsible for the inflation. Price and wage controls are tried with resultant black markets and strikes. Bankers are required to tighten up on loans which, for the most part, are required only by small business since big business usually has ample funds, or can get them through Government loans by hiring the right attorney or with the gift of a pink mink fur coat.

In some quarters, it has been suggested that higher taxes will halt inflation. Maybe so, but an increase of 1,117 percent since 1940 in the Federal tax-take from your income and profits has not stopped inflation. Under the present monetary set-up, any increase in the tax-take will, in all probability, be offset by more printing-press debt-based currency.

The plain, unadulterated, and simple truth of the matter is that we must restore to this country the sound money of the Constitution, after which all other reforms can be accomplished. Managed currency requires a management to control prices and management of personal affairs, and these in turn lead to socialism and/or communism.

If and when an American citizen can redeem his currency in hard money, his bonds will have a sound and relatively constant value. Why doesn't our Government give us honest, gold-backed money so that we can know that the bonds we buy will be good down through the years? Provide such a bond and it will not be necessary to put on expensive campaigns and pressures to buy and hold them, or to pay more than a minimum interest on them if the interest is made payable in gold.

The United States should set an example for the world by providing its citizens with the best money in the world. As matters now stand, our paper currency is not as good as some other currencies, and no one wants our paper dollars except to buy goods from us or exchange them for gold which we sell abroad at a lower price than any other country will sell, while, at the same time, denying the right to own gold to our own citizens.

To put back into the dollar the cents it has lost we must put some sense into our monetary system and discard the practices foisted upon us by textbook economists and Marxists. No nation can be truly free with a paper currency that is not redeemable in something which has a storage of value.

Gold and silver are simple and definite forms of wealth, understood by men throughout the civilized world. They are not tainted with debt or deceit; they cannot be created at will and can be produced only by honest sweat and toil. They cannot be inflated, deflated, or debauched. Why don't we make full use of them, instead of kidding ourselves that a debt-based printing-press paper currency can be as good as gold?

It is your inalienable right as a citizen to own gold, which is the one best and safest form of wealth in this world. You owe it to yourself and to your loved ones to insist that this right be speedily restored by providing our country with a sound, honest constitutional hard money system.

In conclusion, I quote from Money Makes the Mare Go, by John McBride:

"An unsound monetary system is more fruitful of human misery than war, pestilence, and famine, and has brought more injustice than all the bad laws ever written. Until a sound monetary system is adopted, all the present frenzied efforts for permanent peace, economic recovery, a balanced budget, tax reduction, better labor-management relations, foreign aid, and a free world are just so much sound and fury signifying nothing. The dumping of additional billions of dollars into Europe and Asia will serve only as a temporary expedient, just prolong the agony, and hasten us on the way to bankruptcy."

Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, on the 12th day of April, the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette carried a surpassing editorial entitled "Battlefield Courage." It should be read by all, but particularly by all who are suffering from the present Nation-wide epidemic of acute MacArthuritis. I ask unanimous consent that this praiseworthy editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BATTLEFIELD COURAGE—MACARTHUR WAS DISMISSED FOR DOING WHAT HE HIMSELF WOULDN'T TOLERATE

Yesterday marked the passing from the active military picture of one of this country's greatest generals. The man whose name has been gospel to adult and schoolboy alike for more than a decade as he led our GI's to victory after victory from Pearl Harbor to Korea was placed on the inactive list for the one thing he himself would not tolerate—insubordination.

General MacArthur was fired by the only man in the world who could do the job, his boss—the President of the United States.

Mr. Truman, regardless of any shortcomings, has shown once more that he has guts and he will act when he thinks he acts for the welfare of the Nation.

Make no mistake about it. It took battlefield courage—the same kind of courage with which the general is familiar—for the President to remove MacArthur from his command.

He fully realized the decision would be unpopular. Certainly he anticipated the reaction arising from the people who idolize MacArthur and think he can do no wrong. This newspaper has been one of his stanchest admirers.

Many of these are the same people who elected Mr. Truman as their President in 1948. By doing so they made him Commander in Chief over all branches of the Armed Forces and every man serving in them—including General MacArthur.

These are the people to whom Mr. Truman must answer for his every act, while his subordinate, General MacArthur, had only to answer to his Commander in Chief.

The removal order was not the idea of President Truman alone. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, highest military authority in the United States, stamped their approval on the order. It was not done with snap judgment but only after days and months of studied consideration.

General MacArthur was relieved of his armies because of insubordination which can no more be condoned in a general than it can be in a private in the ranks.

He was disobedient—not once, but repeatedly. To allow such disobedience to continue would make the function of the military impossible. In every sense and under every condition, it was MacArthur's duty to obey orders from the President and the Joint Chiefs of Staff strictly and without question. This he did not do.

His flagrant defiance of the President was indirectly a defiance of every citizen of the United States. This defiant and arrogant ignoring of Mr. Truman had weakened the authority and the influence of the President of the United States throughout the world.

And for all of General MacArthur's tremendous reputation, he could not act as President, the chosen leader of all the people of the United States.

While MacArthur wielded his great influence in a restricted sphere of the world, the President is the symbol of this Nation's authority throughout the globe, encompassing that part that General MacArthur has preferred to treat peculiarly as his own.

MacArthur had plainly tried to dictate our policy as respects conditions in that zone. He had no authority whatever to do so. His actions repeatedly have crossed up Washington and the United Nations. The President is authorized to set foreign policies. His military commanders are required only to carry them out, not make them. This MacArthur was trying to do despite the fact his knowledge was limited to the East. It must be remembered he has been absent from this country for 15 years.

The President, holding in his hand the fate of our reputation in the over-all, broad realm of policy, would not let MacArthur get away with it.

As long ago as last December 8 the Gazette said editorially:

"To keep MacArthur in command because of any sentimental consideration would be such disregard of practical procedure as to be not only childishly foolish but positively criminal. The lives of hundreds of thousands of our young men are at stake, and the prestige of this country has already suffered distressingly. We cannot afford to risk anything more on a man who has pitifully failed and who, under the circumstances, could be depended upon to be responsible for further failures."

We have not altered from that position.

About the most charitable thing we can say about General MacArthur is that the piling up of the years may have served to warp his judgment and to impair his usefulness.

Whether he is the unwitting tool of certain politicians is not entirely clear. We are slow to believe that he would sell out his command and his country for political office, misled as he may be. But he has followed what many define as a party line instead of the patriotic line.

For some time it has been obvious that MacArthur was the darling of the Hearst newspapers. Now the blatant Hearst press, the antiadministration newspapers, and MacArthur's own sizable corps of press agents will drum up his dismissal into a cause celebre.

The deposed general should take a hint from our other remarkably popular general, Ike Eisenhower, who has expressed the hope that MacArthur will not intentionally allow himself to be held up as a wounded martyr to the further disunity of a troubled Nation faced with growing danger.

Leaders of both our major political parties must reassess their consciences and reawaken again that spirit of cooperation which carried America through the perilous years of World War II. There has been disunity in the ranks of both Democrats and Republicans. Things must be put right.

The people of our Nation too must stop and reflect. Hasty, feverish, and thoughtless action will not suffice.

Let the people answer these questions:

How would MacArthur have acted if one of his battlefield commanders had disobeyed?

How has he acted?

The Replacement of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Fundamental Principle Was at Stake," published in the Staunton News-Leader, Staunton, Va., on Thursday, April 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLE WAS AT STAKE

Involved in the recall of Gen. Douglas MacArthur is a more fundamental question than that of doing something to win an outright victory in the Korean War, or of the decisive theater (Asia or Europe) in the war for survival. It is that of the supremacy of the civil government over the military establishment and over any great general, however popular a hero he may be.

From its very birth, the Republic has feared militarism, meaning rule by generals who scorn the civil authority and force it to do their will. This fear emanated from the experiences of the early settlers in their native lands of Europe. They knew that militarism led to oppression and tyranny, and often to war for the aggrandizement of military leaders. This fear was reflected in the Constitution, which subordinated the military services to the civil authority by making the President Commander in Chief, and through the first 10 amendments (the Bill of Rights) placed certain restrictions upon the military to protect the rights of civilians.

It is only necessary to recall the march of militarism in other nations in our own time to realize how wise the founding fathers were in definitely subordinating the military branches to the civil authority, and how wise each generation has been in guarding against any step which might breach this safeguard. No democratic republic could long survive as such once the military establishment gained supremacy, for military rule and popular rule simply cannot operate simultaneously.

The record now released shows that General MacArthur had clearly and persistently flouted the civil authority and the policy-making, over-all strategic authority of the Military Establishment itself. He went over the heads of his constitutional superiors, to Congress and people. This he could properly have done by retiring from his vital command positions and going openly to the hustings. Instead, he chose a path of defiance, and one which invited a serious and perhaps fatal rupture with our allies in the free world.

President Truman has shown real courage in dealing condignly with the great hero. He knew that for relieving him, he would be assailed by Republican leaders with all the vigor and vituperation at their command, and that they would have a strong measure of popular support because many will believe MacArthur right in his concept of Asia as the decisive theater and in his demand for freedom of action against Communist China.

When this second great debate has ended, the majority support of Congress and people will be behind the President, for he has necessarily upheld the civil authority in recalling a general who would not take orders or directives, and the realities of the world situation make Europe and not Asia the decisive theater for years to come. Moreover, there is a wide realization that MacArthur has had a Jehovah complex for years, and the American people generally do not cotton to a leader who believes himself infallible, the late F. D. R. to the contrary.

All sorts of black results will be written into the President's action. It will be viewed as destructive of Army morale in Korea, as alienating the Japanese people, who have come to look upon MacArthur as something of a god, and as aiding the Communist armies by removing a leader with strategical genius who is feared by the enemy. The extreme view which some no doubt will advance is that world war III will be hastened because of the advantages accruing to the Soviet.

It is too much to expect the Republicans and other critics of the administration's handling of the war and the program for defense of the free world to keep their shirts on. None of the dire results already being predicted will eventuate, but the rearmament program will be slowed down by Republican attacks. They would have found something else of which to make political capital, however, so Mr. Truman was wise in disregarding the ammunition he would provide them in firing MacArthur. It is nothing short of tragic that the people in Washington can't pull together in war and defense matters and fight their political battles over domestic issues.

In addition to upholding the power of the civil authority, the President's summary action should result at least in the formulation of clear-cut policy in regard to the Korean War, on the part of both the United States and the United Nations. With China ignoring all efforts of the latter to negotiate and this country engaging in a controversy over the question of basic strategy, there is little probability that Peiping will backtrack now on its appeasement demands. Washington and the UN majority have shown no disposition to entertain those demands, and they will certainly not be tolerated now that the UN forces have shown their ability to maul the Reds in Korea and either advance or hold.

With Russia pledged by the Moscow pact with Red China to assist the latter if attacked, there will be no diminution of western fears of all-out war if the MacArthur demands for action against the mainland were to prevail. With no negotiations in progress and none in prospect, and with appeasement of Red China unthinkable, the wisest course for the west is to announce that there will be no general advance beyond the vicinity of the thirty-eighth parallel and that it will hold on that line until the Reds get enough men killed to stop their aggression.

Concurrently, an effective South Korean defense army should be built, equipped, and trained, that the UN forces may eventually disengage. If there is any other course open, other than a continuation of the present impossible war without objectives, it is not apparent unless western nations decide they are willing to risk all-out war in the Orient, which would mean the certain fall of Western Europe to Russia.

Dismissal of General MacArthur is a Victory for Soviet Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of many, including myself, it would seem that the dismissal of General MacArthur by the President is a victory for Soviet Russia. If anyone has a different viewpoint a reading of the Daily Worker would convince them otherwise. This paper which is looked upon as the mouthpiece in the United States of Moscow policy has demonstrated time and again its opposition to General MacArthur. It has time and again demanded his recall. When this was accomplished it literally screamed its satisfaction.

In an article appearing in the Times-Herald, Washington, D. C., today by George Sokolsky, he says:

The President's dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur may prove to be as great a military victory for Soviet Russia as Stalingrad and as great a diplomatic victory as Yalta.

The article in its entirety reads as follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

The President's dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur may prove to be as great a military victory for Soviet Russia as Stalingrad and as great a diplomatic victory as Yalta.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur did not make the Korean War. Every step he took after VJ-day (August 14, 1945) has been designed to prevent just such a war.

He sought to build an East Asian League of Nations, including Nationalist China, which would be a bulwark against the advancing might of Soviet Russia in that vastly populated area of the world. He realized early that our policy in China was ill-conceived and without reality.

He supported the Wedemeyer reports on China and Korea—reports which would have saved us from our current grief. MacArthur did not believe that Korea could be held by the United States on the terms arranged at Teheran and Yalta, but when on June 25, 1950, he was ordered into war there by President Truman and Dean Acheson, he undertook to save the glory of the American flag with his eyes blindfolded and at least one hand tied behind his back.

Within a few days, he discovered that he was not an American commander, but a United Nations commander.

He discovered that unlike any other commanding general in the field, his decisions were subject to the approval of a vast congress of nations, large and small, among whom are our enemies, Soviet Russia and Poland, to mention only two.

He also discovered that Great Britain, with as much responsibility as we have to maintain treaty obligations and the integrity of the United Nations, was engaged in a weird strategy which included three divergent and contradictory factors:

1. To send token troops to fight in the Korean War;

2. To oppose such second-front tactics as might be useful, as, for instance, support of Nationalist China and the anti-Communist guerrillas on the mainland;

3. To use all efforts, including their effective propaganda agencies, to limit the Korean War to a stalemated, targetless action with the view that American aid and largesse might not be diverted from Europe to Asia.

And in conjunction with this, MacArthur discovered that India, just freed from the British raj, emerged as a Soviet spokesman, the reason for this unusual demarche being the Kashmir and other antagonisms against Pakistan, Nehru seeking Russian support in his struggle against Moslems in India.

On all sides he saw the United States being sacrificed while American sons were being killed.

War is unpleasant under any circumstances; it becomes a horror when the commanding general is being stabbed in the back and the troops under him are being sacrificed on the altar of political necessities. No general wants his men to die for nothing.

All this, General MacArthur in his roundabout language to Congressman JOE MARTIN, has made clear to the American people.

It is a pity that General MacArthur had to use such means as letters to Congressmen and private individuals to break through his muzzling by the Pentagon and the State Department.

He wanted his own people to know that it is impossible to bring this Korean War to a victorious end. For this, he has been dismissed on the basis of insubordination.

As a military man, he knows that what the geniuses in Washington want to do is ridiculous, impossible. They want to play an unending game of tag, with nobody getting hurt except the troops there.

The plan is the loquacious dream of gentle personalities who have a great capacity for loving the enemy.

Their confusion arises from a lack of focus; they are global in their outlook, without anchorage in the United States of America.

They do not quite know whether they really prefer the American system of life or any other. Acheson and Marshall accept British policy because they cannot devise a policy of their own.

To a man of MacArthur's training and history, these men must appear like curiosities, more perilous than a fighting enemy, for lacking cohesion of thought, they move simultaneously in different directions which at times make them appear to be miasmic.

The crime against Gen. Douglas MacArthur has been that he has been given responsibility, but he has not been permitted to win a war or to tell America why we are failing in a war. No man could have held such a position too long with dignity and honor.

Televising of Congressional Hearings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 13 (legislative day of Monday, March 26), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, from all over the Nation I have received innumerable letters from average citizens, attorneys, radio and TV people on the subject of my comments on the televising of congressional hearings. I have pointed out that television is a miraculous medium which can have tremendous constructive values for public education.

At the same time, I have also indicated that the televising of open hearings at which criminals and other questionable characters appear, can lay the basis for slander to a degree which we have heretofore never conceived. In other words, if poorly prepared open hearings are held, without there having been executive sessions previously to sift testimony, weigh facts, consider evidence, and give individuals the opportunity to defend themselves if they are accused, then congressional committees will have violated their responsibility. They will have permitted the smearing of innocent names and reputations before millions of televiewers. That is why I submitted Senate Resolution 106, providing for a study of this whole subject.

As an indication of the reactions of many people throughout our country, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—

(a) Excerpts from numerous letters to me on this issue, as well as

(b) Excerpts from a column by Mr. Allen Sims which appeared in the April 5 issue of the Barron (Wis.) News-Shield.

(c) Excerpts from a very interesting article on the more general subject of broadcasting legislative proceedings. This article, entitled "Congress on the Air," was written by Mr. Ralph Goldman and published in the Public Opinion Quarterly, winter 1950–51 issue. It reviews the long controversy of broadcasting floor sessions of the Congress.

There being no objection, the correspondence and news comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From a distinguished attorney in Milwaukee:

"MARCH 31, 1951.

"Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
"United States Senator,
"Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I think that you are to be congratulated in the stand that you have taken with reference to televising proceedings of committees of Congress. You are certainly the very first to point out the dangers inherent in a congressional investigation which is being televised. Some of us feel very strongly that if a witness does not desire to testify before the television apparatus, that such witness' feelings should be respected, at least within certain limits. You have performed an outstanding public service in suggesting the difficulties inherent in a congressional investigation, and I am sure that as a result of your analysis, either legislation will be proposed or a tradition established by the Congress which will represent whatever compromise may be necessary between the public welfare on the one hand and individual rights of witnesses on the other."

An individual in Missouri:

"MARCH 26, 1951.

"Hon. Senator WILEY,
"Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SENATOR: I want to endorse your position relative to the television shows that are being put on by some television companies. This exhibition is not in my opinion for the purpose of promoting law enforcement but purely for commercial business. It seems to me that thing is below the standards of dignity. It will not be long if this thing is allowed to be carried on that the soap, beer, and cereal companies are advertising their wares at these investigations and court trial."

From Brooklyn, N. Y.:

"MARCH 22, 1951.

"Senator ALEXANDER WILEY:
"Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I have just been reading an Associated Press dispatch in which you are quoted as having said that the televising of congressional committee investigations could 'become a monster which can destroy innocent individuals, whole corporations, political parties and entire administrations.'

"Much the same thought must have come to millions of others during the broadcasting of the Kefauver hearings in New York.

"In view of your many months of experience with the Senate Crime Investigating Committee, I hope that you will be able to make a substantial recommendation to the Senate soon in this regard."

[From the Barron County (Wis.) News-Shield of April 5, 1951]

YOU AND I

(By Alan Sims)

How would you like to be listening to or watching a television program and suddenly hear your name or telephone number mentioned in connection with some gambler, gangster, or hoodlum?

How would you like to be asked to tell in public how much you earn or how much wealth you have?

These are not ridiculous questions. The recent hearings held by the very sincere and capably led Kefauver Crime Committee had such experiences. Gamblers were asked to check lists of telephone numbers which had come to the attention of the committee. Among the names and numbers were those of other gamblers * * * but also there were names of relatives, social acquaintances * * * and even that of a doctor. And in another instance the name of a well-known industrialist, a man of high standing, was used by a gangster to try to convey a close friendship and to excuse his appearance at a political meeting.

The Kefauver Crime Committee has accomplished much good. It has shown the public what lies behind political campaigns in New York City and in some other large communities. It has shown the public what gangsters look like. It has revealed connections between certain politicians and law-enforcement officers and criminals. But the general implications of a Senate Crime Committee are most dangerous. It is too easy to bring in the name of innocent people and in this present day we are too apt to judge a man by association. And the questions that inquire into a man's wealth or earnings * * * even those of a gangster, it seems, would be best asked in private hearings. The answers to these questions are too tempting to other criminals in terms of blackmail or kidnaping or robbery.

In our courts, many safeguards have been built over the centuries to protect innocent people. These safeguards are lacking in these crime investigations.

And consider, too, what might happen if a crime committee were put under the leadership of less honorable men * * * possibly of some fanatical laborite or industrialist or some overzealous religious mind. Such powers could be used to destroy one's enemies, to ruin innocent people, to bring disaster upon great institutions.

* * * * *

Senator WILEY has come out emphatically against more crime investigation as it is now being done. He has pointed out the dangers and has requested a thorough study of the problems that have developed and the dangers to innocent people. He should be given fullest support to the end that every fair effort to combat crime should be developed while at the same time everything that can be should be done to protect innocent men and women.

Law-enforcement agencies should be made to do their work honestly and fully * * * under the usual safeguards for innocent people * * * then there would be no need for these public television shows.

CONGRESS ON THE AIR

(By Ralph M. Goldman)

The impact of communication technique upon the scope, intensity, and very nature of politics has long been recognized by political professionals. In the field of Presidential campaigning alone, the sources, content, methods, channels, and effects of communication have been of keenest concern to the men in charge. Hamilton spoke through John Fenno's Gazette of the United States, Jefferson's party had Philip Freeneau's National Gazette. Jackson's managers used the mass meeting as it never had been used before. Ben Day's one-cent New York Sun in 1833, supplementing the six-cent newspapers, brought the newly enfranchised masses into national politics. Mark Hanna revolutionized campaigning with his army of 1,400 campaign speakers and his barrage of 120,000,000 campaign pamphlets and other documents. Coolidge pioneered in making use of the new radio medium. Franklin D. Roosevelt's effectiveness over the air made history. The National Conventions were televised in 1948.

Thus the party contest for the office of Chief Executive has become a complex and massive communications operation, involving television, radio, newspapers, magazines, motion pictures, rallies, telephone, correspondence, pamphlets, and personal face-to-face forms of communication. The rest of the world generally looks to an American Presidential contest as one of the most important ingredients of our democracy-at-work.

But American democracy has its legislative as well as its executive aspect. The communications revolution is bound to catch up with the legislative process even more than it already has. The newspapers have long covered and interpreted Congress, its activities and its leadership, with amplitude and skill. Radio and television have only begun to explore the possibilities. A new synthesis of legislative process and mass media is in the making and seems only to wait upon the appropriate catalyst, for the elements to be combined are many and the inertia to be overcome is great.

LEGISLATIVE BROADCASTS: PRO AND CON

Broadcasting congressional proceedings is no longer a novel idea, nor would it be an adventure into uncharted fields. Experience in the field of broadcasting legislative proceedings is plentiful at every level of government, from the United Nations to the New York City Council. The synthesis is not an easy one to make, but the ways in which it has been achieved have been numerous, and often ingenious. Before examining some of these, it may be useful to mention some of the theoretical pros and cons on this subject. On the credit side the arguments run as follows:

1. Legislative broadcasts help focus public attention upon the debate and discussion stage of democratic policy making. Recent use of radio by public executives and strong leaders has given a monolithic appearance to the policy-making processes. The give-and-take of debate and reconciliation has been obscured and could best be presented to the general public by broadcasts of legislative proceedings.

2. Legislative broadcasts tend to strengthen our conceptions of popular sovereignty. The people have the right to hear their representatives in action. In like manner, the awareness of a large and immediate public audience has a salutary effect upon the activities of representatives in legislative session. Popular sovereignty is effective in direct proportion to the extent to which representatives are self-conscious and responsible.

3. Legislative broadcasts serve as a major channel for popular political education, a testing ground for the quality of leadership and the issues of the day.

4. Among the media of mass communication, the psychologists tell us, radio is the one which gives its audience the greatest sense of direct personal participation. This sense of participation is another vital aspect of democratic group life and one which is enlarged and reinforced by the broadcasting of legislative deliberations.

5. Reports of legislative activity usually reach the public through several different channels, with varying degrees of accuracy and objectivity. Putting the legislature on the air is a method of checking the reports received by way of the other media.

6. Such broadcasts help constituents to separate out the worth-while from the inept among their representatives.

There are a great number of difficult technical questions, which, of themselves, operate to discourage proposals for legislative broadcasts. Setting these technical matters aside for the moment, the more general criticisms usually are as follows:

1. Legislative proceedings bore the average radio listener and succeed in attracting only a very limited audience.

2. Legislators use air time to harangue the folks back home rather than concentrate upon legislative business.

3. Public knowledge of legislative goings-on and bickering might seriously discredit the entire legislative process itself.

4. American commercial radio cannot meet its business requirements by putting prolonged legislative proceedings on the air. The objections of advertisers—the main source of operating income for broadcasters—would have to be given serious consideration so long as American broadcasting remains a self-supporting industry.

5. Selective broadcasting would present delicate, even insurmountable, editing problems.

6. Since legislators are immune from suit, radio would provide them with another outlet for abusive slander, libel, and innuendo, with perhaps even more serious consequences than now experienced through the other media.

SOME EXPERIENCES: INTERNATIONAL AND NATIONAL

The United Nations: Legislative broadcasts have emanated from different levels of government—international, national, State, and local. At the international level, it is premature to call the United Nations a government or a legislature in the true sense of these terms. At most, we may call the UN an incipient government. In any event, the broadcasting of UN proceedings goes back to its very first sessions, in 1946. Early coverage was quite inadequate. Complaints were heard that the large networks scheduled only a smattering of the UN broadcast material made available to them. Distant stations found the costs of telephone lines from UN headquarters prohibitive. Commercial requirements forced the networks away from this kind of public-service broadcast and the task devolved upon WNYC, New York City's noncommercial, low-budget station.

Station WNYC gives complete coverage to the Security Council and the General Assembly meetings, providing its own pick-up and serving as an originating station for any other independent station which may care to carry the material (a popular practice during the UN's first year.)

* * * * *

In addition to the programing offered to it by Station WNYC, the American public also hears the United Nations Today, a daily quarter-hour review of significant international developments. This program is highlighted by the recorded voices of delegates as they speak. It goes over more than 170 stations coast to coast and is heard in 16 States. Weekly programs include: Memo from Lake Success, carried by 96 CBS affiliates; Two Billion Strong, a half-hour ABC program; and UN Story, carried over 300 stations.

New Zealand: What have been the developments with respect to legislatures at the national level? The first country to broadcast the proceedings of its legislature was New Zealand. In 1936 this country's first Labor Party Prime Minister, Michael Joseph Savage, contended that the Conservative-dominated press was not giving his party fair news coverage. When the Government-owned Station 2-YA was established, Savage appointed himself as the first Minister of Broadcasting. Broadcasting the proceedings of the House of Representatives was his own project, to serve not only partisan but also national needs.

Since the House of Representatives is the heart of the New Zealand legislative process, it alone was wired for broadcast purposes. Some five microphones were strategically located throughout the Chamber. At first, all proceedings were broadcast, the time span usually running from 2:30 p. m. to 11 p. m. or longer, with a two hour intermission for dinner. Later, the broadcasts were limited to fewer and more closely scheduled hours, 11 p. m. becoming the regular sign-off time.

The use of radio made necessary some modifications in parliamentary practice. For instance, the selection of speakers from both parties, from day to day, and the order in which it was agreed that they should take the floor became matters of considerable importance in view of the fact that those who took the floor during the most popular listening hours were assured of a wider audience than they would otherwise enjoy. In addition, both Government and opposition insisted upon an equal number of speakers in each and every debate. For purposes of military security during wartime, the Speaker was authorized to censor speeches by use of a push-button which could cut off the broadcast. A green light in front of the Speaker's table indicated that the speech was on the air; a red light flashed on when a speech had been cut off.

* * * * *

On July 10, 1946, broadcasts from the Australian Parliament were commenced over the government-owned radio station of that country. Before broadcasts began, there was an intensive search for some formula whereby the weekly 16 hours of air time could be divided equitably between the Senate and the House of Representatives. Steps were taken in the direction of protecting members against libel suits. There was also great anxiety that the public might view with contempt the legislative proceedings and much attention was given to the matter of controlling the more boisterous members. That the program has been a success is evident from the results of a survey made in August 1946, by the Australian public-opinion polls, Asked: "Do you think the broadcasts from Parliament should be continued, reduced, or stopped," the Australian people voted decisively for continuation. Specifically, the distribution of the vote was:

	Percent
Continued	68
Reduced	7
Stopped	18
Undecided	7

THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS

The case history with respect to our own Congress has been more experimental and inconclusive. It is generally known that Congressmen, as individuals, have made good use of radio. For example, the Columbia Broadcasting System alone has reported that, from 1928 to 1940, Senators addressed radio audiences over Columbia sustaining programs more than 700 times and Representatives over 500 times. * * *

At a time when a resolution to authorize direct pick-up broadcasting was pending before Congress, New York's Station WMCA undertook to dramatize the proceedings as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. During December 1944, "The Halls of Congress" went on the air. Senators and Congressmen were portrayed by professional actors. Many outstanding congressional debates were presented; for example, those on FEPC, the poll tax, Bretton Woods, etc. Best broadcast hours—during 1 year from 3:30 to 4 p. m. on Sundays, during another from 9:30 to 10 p. m. on Wednesdays—were assigned to this popular weekly program.

"Following Congress," a dramatization similar to that of WMCA, has been one of the novel public-affairs offerings of the University of Wisconsin College of the Air. It is a weekly half-hour program on some important subject selected from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Speeches are abstracted and parts are acted out by students. The entire project is aimed at augmenting classroom contact with the work of Congress. Copies of the script are mimeographed for use by other schools.

In Congress itself, bills and resolutions have been introduced from time to time since 1931 calling for the broadcasting of proceedings directly from the floor of each House. * * *

Putting Congress on the air was one of the more significant matters dealt with during the 1945 hearings before the LaFollette-Monroney Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress. Some of the testimony and comment are both informative and suggestive.

A limited broadcast period with short speeches was among the suggestions offered. One Senator suggested a daily Senate broadcast from 10 a. m. to noon, with the speaking schedule arranged by committees on the majority and minority sides. The problems of time allocation, unrepresentative coverage, and public disinterest were stressed by one critical Representative. Another Representative argued that selective broadcasts need emphasize only the more dramatic moments in the legislature's work. Since half or more of congressional time is consumed in technical and detailed discussion of bills, use of recording devices was recommended so that edited transcriptions could be put on the air during evening hours. It was noted that American commercial stations must necessarily plan their broadcasting schedule a week in advance, a factor which would require that meetings of Congress be more closely planned.

Among the questions raised were these: (1) Should the listener have the option of tuning in to different stations in order to hear the separate proceedings of the Senate, the House, or the various committees? (2) Would a Government-owned station be necessary in order to get this type of broadcasting onto the air? (3) Would it be desirable to make some prior announcement of legislative program content for the information and convenience of listeners?

* * * * *

A statement by Dr. Robert D. Leigh, director of the Commission on Freedom of the Press, set forth a particularly interesting approach to this problem. "It will be necessary for Congress to organize its procedure and discussion so that the necessary condensations and emphasis upon important issues can actually be brought to the microphone." Full meetings of the two Houses, he pointed out, generally serve either of two purposes: (1) To record the votes on measures reported out from committees; and (2) to carry debate aimed primarily at influencing opinion among the Congressmen's constituents or at explaining reasons for individual decisions taken on particular measures. Dr. Leigh suggested that these functions could be performed over two kinds of evening radio sessions, each of which would occupy one evening a week. One would be a voting session very much like an opinion day in the Supreme Court. The other evening would carry congressional debates on important issues, arranged by a special bipartisan steering committee.

Typical of the kind of resolution placed before Congress is the Pepper-Coffee resolution which was pending at the time of the La Follette-Monroney hearings. In part, it stated: "Radio broadcasting stations and radio broadcasting networks are hereby authorized to broadcast any proceedings on the floor of the Senate or of the House of Representatives: Provided, however, That no station or network shall be required to broadcast any proceedings, nor shall any proceedings of either House be broadcast when such House otherwise orders." This kind of resolution, of course, is entirely inadequate to the proposal it makes. Its generality ignores the intricacies of arranging this kind of broadcast. It calls for no permanent or certain commitments on the part of either Congress or the stations. It gives no permanent agency the responsibility for getting things done and for resolving operating problems.

At the time of the La Follette-Monroney investigation, engineers of the Federal Communications Commission favored the use of Government-assigned short-wave facilities. It was estimated that a new broadcasting plant in the Capitol would cost about $2,000,000. The annual cost of two congressional stations was set at about $800,000. The Big Four among the networks—Mutual, NBC, CBS, and ABC—also submitted plans describing proposed recording, broadcasting, and television facilities. To date Congress has taken no action on any of these proposals.

CONCLUSIONS: RECONCILING LEGISLATIVE PROCESS AND COMMUNICATION SYSTEM

We see therefore, that broadcasting the proceedings of a legislature is no longer a matter of reform. It is more a matter of initiative and working out the details. However, these are no small obstacles. The details include the wide diversity of interests to be reconciled and the hard-to-crack technical questions. The American system of radio broadcasting is a complex commercial process, involving relationships among network, regional, and local broadcasters, advertisers, advertising agencies, the Federal Communications Commission, the manufacturers of radio sets, programing organizations, and trade, labor, professional, and audience groups. The United States Congress is an equally complex legislative process, involving relationships among its Members, political parties, pressure groups, constituents, and other branches of the National Government.

Some of the technical questions are these: Shall AM, FM, or short-wave channels be used? Shall the program be financed by the broadcasters, by Congress, or by some new blend of public-service broadcasting and commercial advertising? Shall coverage of the proceedings be complete or selective? If selective, shall selection be a preliminary process, for example, closer planning of legislative proceedings, or shall selection take place ex post facto, perhaps by having transcriptions edited by a bipartisan committee? What are best broadcast hours? What about the use of commentators and professional actors? Are these desirable?

The most stubborn stumbling block of all is the question of initiative. * * *

Finally, there are the broadcasters, facing, as always, the hard necessity of earning their own way. For them, the proposal to put Congress on the air may offer a rare opportunity for rendering public service, for meeting the challenge of the other media, for broadening the base for cross-network cooperation, for dealing with the notorious shortage of fresh broadcast material, and for undertaking new experiments in broadcaster-advertiser arrangements. On the other hand, it is easy to understand why broadcaster initiative might be resented by the other principals. In the final analysis, some specially created, representative, and thoroughly detached agency, capable of carrying the ball and of inventing adjustments for the achievement of short- and long-term objectives, may be the most effective way to reconcile the needs of the legislative process and the communication system.

One thing, however, seems certain. The Congress of the United States should enjoy all the advantages and disadvantages of twentieth-century communications in the same way that the Presidency does. Furthermore, putting Congress on the air would demonstrate for all the world to hear how a democracy is able to create unity out of diversity.

A Victory for Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, there are millions of sincere and thoughtful Americans who see in President Truman's shabby treatment of Gen. Douglas MacArthur a victory for Russia.

The following editorial taken from the Altoona (Pa.) Tribune is well worth reading:

A VICTORY FOR RUSSIA

Soviet Russia won its greatest victory of the cold war Wednesday at 1 a. m. when President Truman announced to the world that Gen. Douglas MacArthur had been relieved of all his commands.

Perhaps an adequate commentary on this action is to be found in the words of a British diplomat, quoted by the Associated Press Wednesday night. Said the Briton, "Good old Harry."

But, observe what some leading Americans said:

Former President Hoover: "This action can bring great tragedy to our country."

An Altoona shopman said, "I believe he should have been left there (MacArthur). He knows what it's all about."

Mr. Truman has given in again to the pressure of the British Socialists, who have been clamoring for him to get rid of MacArthur for months. The British don't want anything to upset their position in the Orient any further. They even had the gall to demand that Red China, our bitter enemy, shall have a role in the Japanese peace pact.

MacArthur constantly sought to crush the enemy, to get the job done. He repeatedly has asked for more troops, more freedom to wage war against the Reds. Always he has been refused.

Well, now the British Socialists have won. And Mr. Acheson, who places Europe above all, has succeeded in removing a thorn in the side of the State Department, MacArthur. A thorn, because MacArthur ignored State Department stupidity, and handled Japan as the State Department has never handled any responsibility.

Calls received from the public, at the Tribune office, and at the local office of Representative JAMES E. VAN ZANDT in the postoffice building, show the trend of thought.

And, that trend tragically shows a lack of confidence in the administration.

Why? Because in one instance after the other, those who called proved to be women, wives and mothers, and all showed concern for their men in the service now.

What does that show? Certainly, it shows lack of faith in our Washington leadership, and confidence of the highest caliber in MacArthur.

That is the real test of leadership, no matter what else one may say—faith.

A Japanese cab driver remarked, "It is a great pity."

It is a great pity that international politics, and diplomacy in this country directed by inept men, can remove one of our greatest leaders.

It is enough to cause concern for the future of America.

General MacArthur has shown the only successful administration of an occupied land, Japan. He has succeeded in keeping Russia in its place in Japan. And he is the only American, civilian or military, who has been able to do this.

Since the end of World War II, the Russians have fought with MacArthur over the occupation of Japan. Time and again he has put them in their place. They have made no headway against him.

Now, their greatest obstacle in Japan has been removed, and by his own Government.

He has had over 30 years' experience in the Far East. General Ridgway, undoubtedly an able soldier, who replaces him, served in Sicily and Normandy.

How is he fitted to take over command in the Far East?

It is amazing that the President should show such prejudice and ill judgment as to remove our top commander while our forces are advancing in Korea, and bracing for enemy attack.

General Ridgway, MacArthur's successor, is quoted as saying much the same thing MacArthur was fired for saying.

Ridgway said only 3 days ago, "I see no end to the military operations unless there is a political settlement. For the Communists, this is a life and death struggle. They will not vary their objective. These fellows are out to destroy us no matter how long it takes.

MacArthur wanted to destroy the enemy in the quickest, most efficient way, and with the least cost in American lives.

Both these military men, Ridgway and his predecessor, MacArthur, see no end to the bloody Korean war as it is being fought now.

Yet, Mr. Truman insists that it be fought that way. London wants it that way. Paris wants it that way.

But, how about the 200,000 Yanks who are doing the fighting and dying? How do they want it? Don't they want to get it done, and get out of there? How does Mr. Truman's action serve them?

Peanut Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, "peanut politicians" in high places are still at work. The latest display of really petty stuff was the snub given the head of the Nation's largest farm organization when President Truman failed to appoint President Allan B. Kline, of the American Farm Bureau, as a member of the new Mobilization Policy Advisory Board.

The following article by Earl Richert which appeared in the Washington News of April 10, 1951, tells the story. It can fairly be assumed that Secretary of Agriculture Brannan passed upon the appointments as far as the four agriculture members of the Board are concerned before the appointments were made by President Truman. Friends and members of the American Farm Bureau sincerely hope that President Truman and Secretary Brannan are getting a lot of satisfaction out of such petty political maneuvering:

President Truman has gone out of his way to snub the head of the Nation's largest farm organization, President Allan B. Kline, of the American Farm Bureau.

Result is that now, with labor officially back in the mobilization set-up after weeks of maneuvering, it's the Farm Bureau that's "off the reservation."

The Kline snub—one of the most direct the Capital has seen in a long time—came last week end when Mr. Truman appointed the 16 members of his new Mobilization Policy Advisory Board. (This is the Board that's supposed to bring harmony to the mobilization set-up.)

As agriculture's four board members the President named the presidents of the No. 2, No. 3, and No. 4 largest farm organizations—Herschel D. Newsom, of the Grange; James G. Patton, of the Farmers' Union; and D. W. Brooks, of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives. Then for the Farm Bureau's representative the President went far down in the bureau set-up to pick Ray B. Wiser, president of the California Farm Bureau. Mr. Wiser is not even on the Farm Bureau's 20-man board of directors.

Mr. Wiser, reportedly because of the snub to Mr. Kline, informed President Truman yesterday that he would be unable to serve. A White House spokesman declined to comment on the resignation. No successor has been chosen.

Farm Bureau leaders say no boycott of the Mobilization Board is contemplated.

"How can you boycott something you haven't been asked to join?" asked Roger Fleming, legislative representative of the Farm Bureau.

It was pointed out that Mr. Truman had named to the new board the presidents of the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Federation of Labor, and the CIO, as well as the presidents of the other three big farm groups.

Senator GEORGE AIKEN, Republican, of Vermont, said he thought all American Farm Bureau members would take the Kline snub as an affront. "I think it most unfortunate that the administration saw fit to take a slap at the largest farm organization at this time when we need cooperation from everybody," he said.

Mr. Kline has long been the major thorn in the side of Agriculture Secretary Charles Brannan. He has been the most active opponent of the Secretary's controversial farm plan.

Mr. Kline only recently recommended a 20 percent slash in the Agriculture Department's administrative expenses and a large cut in funds for the soil conservation program. He said this should be done in the interests of Government economy.

"I guess," said one Farm Bureau official, "that John L. Lewis now has a rival. Mr. Truman wouldn't even consider Mr. Kline for dog catcher either."

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD BREEN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BREEN. Mr. Speaker, in the thousands of paragraphs that have already been written in the pro and con discussion in regard to General MacArthur's removal as United States commander in chief in the Far East, the following editorial, which appeared in the Dayton Daily News for April 11, 1951, spotlights with great clarity some of the important features of today's most controversial subject.

The publisher of the Dayton Daily News is the Honorable James M. Cox, former three-time Governor of the great State of Ohio, and the Democratic standard bearer for the Presidency of the United States in 1920. The Governor's thinking in the matter is directly reflected in this editoral, and his excellent background and study in national and international matters makes this editorial doubly valuable and important.

I wish to extend my compliments to the editorial staff of the Dayton Daily News; and to my colleagues, I respectfully invite their attention to the following editorial:

TRUMAN AND MACARTHUR

It is a tragedy, in many respects, that the long and brilliant command of General MacArthur in the Far East has ended in his dismissal by the President. MacArthur has been one of the world's outstanding soldiers and soldier-strategists. He has been a fine administrator of Japan. His prestige is deservedly high in Asia. He has great claims on the gratitude of America.

On sober reflection, we are sure, a majority of Americans will come to feel that the President had no choice but to terminate MacArthur's command. MacArthur's view of global policy was badly distorted; from most of a military lifetime spent in Asia, he thought, perhaps naturally, that the fate of the world revolved about Asia. If his advice had been followed, it could have led us into tragic pitfalls.

But that is not the issue on which MacArthur was dismissed. If he had been content to press his views through military channels, to argue to his heart's content with his superiors, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and then to accept their decision and carry on like the good soldier, the case would have been different. But MacArthur, in spite of repeated urgings that later were translated into definite warnings, insisted on going over the heads of his superiors and carrying the arguments to Members of Congress, the newspapers, and the people.

To put it bluntly, MacArthur was insubordinate. Insubordination is one quality that cannot be tolerated in a soldier, whether he be a general or a private. Without discipline, without loyal discharge of the commands of superiors, there can be no effective army. Would MacArthur himself have permitted General Ridgway to lobby in the press and in Congress against his (MacArthur's) strategy? Would Ridgway have permitted his division commanders this freedom? Would one of Ridgway's brigade commanders have allowed a captain to make a public issue of whether Hill 101 or Hill 114 should be the next objective of his company? Surely not. What would happen, even in a football game, if a halfback who didn't think the play called by the quarterback would work, were to rush to the sidelines, grab a megaphone from the hands of a cheerleader, and make an impassioned speech to the spectators about it?

Abraham Lincoln had trouble with more than one general, such as McClellan and "Fighting Joe" Hooker, who were mixed up in their view of the pyramid of authority. Lincoln, after many displays of patience, got rid of his insubordinate generals. It is hard to imagine what the outcome of the war might have been if he hadn't.

At issue here, of course, is not only the inviolability of a military chain of command, but something even higher. That is the American principle of ultimate civilian control of military policy. Theater commanders who will not stick to commanding but who insist on invading the field of over-all military and diplomatic strategy present a direct challenge to this basic safeguard planted in the United States Constitution by a very wise set of founding fathers.

The immediate issue is that of MacArthur's insubordination, and the impossibility of conducting effective policy in the atmosphere created by it. However, it is not beside the point to consider where the country might have been led had MacArthur's advice finally prevailed, or, worse still, had he at last embarked on certain military actions in defiance of authority.

1. We might easily have precipitated war with Russia, which no person of sound sense wants to do at this time. Russia has a mutual assistance pact with China, which might be brought into play if we bombed Manchuria or if we turned Chiang Kai-shek's troops on Formosa loose for an invasion of the Chinese mainland. This, incidentally, is the opinion expressed by Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, who in World War II was one of MacArthur's two top Pacific commanders. General Eichelberger said:

"I believe Stalin committed himself to protect China from attack when he succeeded in getting the Chinese Reds into action in Korea."

2. At the least we would have spread the war in China, extending our involvement from the narrow peninsula of Korea, which can be held with a couple of hundred thousand men, to the mainland, in which we might have to sink millions. In this way we would have bled ourselves white while Russia sat back and watched without expending a single division of her own army.

3. By getting bogged down in Asia, we would have diverted our main drive from the defense of Europe, presenting Stalin with an easy conquest of highly industrialized nations which, once settled in his orbit, would give him the power to outproduce us for war and make our ultimate defeat inevitable. MacArthur would have succeeded in doing what he failed to do in the last war, namely, in overriding the very wise priority which was given to European operations by Roosevelt and Churchill.

4. We could have lost the vital support of our European allies. Sensing our inability to give them effective help in defending themselves while our face was turned toward Asia, they would be likely to give up the ghost and seek to make the best terms possible with Stalin.

5. We could have pushed the 400,000,000 people of India (and millions of other Asiatic waverers) from the neutral column into the enemy column. The ultimate consequences of uniting all Asia against us would be incalculable.

6. We could have lost our chance to detach 450,000,000 Chinese from the Russian orbit. As developing Communist tyranny rips the mask from the falsely advertised face of Red benevolence, there is a chance that the Chinese, fiercely individualistic and never for long hospitable to foreign masters, will take the path that Tito took in Yugoslavia. But if we were to loose the hated, discredited Chiang Kai-shek upon them, we would be the villains in their eyes. Instead of giving the Russians enough rope to hang themselves, we would take the rope right out of their hands and fit it to our own neck.

There will be much discussion as to whether President Truman, by moving drastically to preserve the integrity of our chain of command, the inviolability of our principle of civil control over the military, and the chance for success of our foreign policy, acted, from the standpoint of politics, unwisely. We say there was nothing else he could do, and we think the public will come to admire a President, who, with his country's safety at stake, had the courage to rise above politics. It is fair to assume, meanwhile, that the decision was shared by Secretary of Defense George Marshall, Chief of Staff Omar Bradley, and the three service chiefs, Admiral Sherman and Generals Collins and Vandenberg, and that it was applauded by our allies.

As we said in the beginning, it is a tragedy that MacArthur's brilliant and immensely useful career had to come to this end. But it is not President Truman who has tarnished the bright shield; MacArthur did it himself by his own rash refusal to play a team game in America's greatest crisis.

Public Reaction to MacArthur's Dismissal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED E. BUSBEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include additional samples of the hundreds of messages which I have received since the President relieved General MacArthur of his command. They are from citizens of Chicago, Ill.:

Why have the people's representatives in Government in Washington allowed corruption, scandal, communism, sex perversion, gangsterism, swindling, and all the evils that go with our present Government to remain in spite of public exposure. Why don't you act to remove the stench? The time has come for you and your colleagues to look deeply into your souls. America first before party loyalty. America first before you trade your political favors. America first before internal graft and corruption. America first before England and Europe. I urgently petition the immediate removal of Truman, Acheson, and Marshall from office. I petition MacArthur be reinstated and given a full public hearing in the United States Senate and House.

MacArthur dismissal tragic almost unbelievable. Looks like Russian victory from inside Washington. Please protest out loud. Need your help.

Dismissal MacArthur stunning blow to myself, family, and friends. Stop. How long can this fine country of ours tolerate deceit, half-truths, insincerity, inefficiency, and political corruption promulgated by present administration? Stop. Impeachment proceedings should be seriously considered.

We think that Presidential dismissal of General MacArthur is tragic and deplorable. A great loss to our country. We cannot go on forever killing and wounding American boys in Korea for what. We have faith in MacArthur's wisdom. Washington's whole Asiatic foreign policy needs revealing investigation. We are looking to you for action. You have our support.

What difference does it make whether or not we have a united Korea. Ireland is not united, so what? Ask the President to fire the boys in Korea and bring them back with MacArthur.

Say, the people I have contacted are bitterly shocked over the President's actions towards General MacArthur is putting it mildly. As long as Mr. Truman saw fit to take this action against one of the greatest generals ever known, why not pull our boys out along with him?

Urge impeachment of Truman and congressional investigation of Acheson. Please notice Communist approval of Truman's base action.

Truman-Acheson policy of appeasement must be stopped. Impeachments imperative.

Urge immediate dismissal and investigation of Dean Acheson and impeachment of President Truman. Urge appearance of General MacArthur before joint session. America's future now depends on the action taken by you and your colleagues. We urge you to act vigorously and promptly.

Just heard President Truman's speech. Think it very poorly said. Please impeach him.

Deplore MacArthur's dismissal. Demand Truman's impeachment. No appeasement of Communists.

After hearing our beloved Harry speak tonight our club is unanimous opinion impeach him (141 members).

Because the United States is not a British Colony you will have the complete support of this family of four in any impeachment proceedings against the President.

Firing of MacArthur a terrible tragedy and a national disgrace. Situation should be investigated to find out why American interests are subordinated to those of England and other United Nations. MacArthur is superior to all in the administration, in everything but title. Administration's Far East policy proved wrong in every phase during the past 5 years. Why not get MacArthur to state his views to Congress (20 signatures).

Urge immediate impeachment President Truman and cronies. America must be represented by people whose real interest is in their own country and not influenced by foreign nations. Reinstate MacArthur (18 signatures).

You are undoubtedly conscious of the widespread concern of our fellow Americans in this critical hour in Washington. We trust to you to support all necessary measures and make use of the guiding knowledge that General MacArthur has for us Americans in this critical hour. We are all worried and feel you are not going to fail us.

I want to register my protest of the firing of General MacArthur. Of all the people in the United Nations and our Executive and State Department, he is the only one who has a policy and objective. President Truman and Secretary Acheson should be impeached. They have played into the hands of the Russians.

Truman finally showed his hand. Let us know ours and impeach an untrue man.

As a common voter I am not in favor of Truman's firing MacArthur. To me it is the act of an inferior leader. There was time enough for a good leader to have prevented the incident. There is a very fine line being drawn between military and political policy.

Stunned over Truman's arbitrary dismissal of General MacArthur. This is not a matter of party politics but of national existence. Congressional inquiry is mandatory.

MacArthur a casualty of political factors behind our effort in the Korean war. The President declared war in Korea without authority of Congress and then dismissed our most brilliant military leader. President's action is a victory for communism even if he is too stupid to see it. Down with communistic thinking here and abroad. Down with inefficient thinking in high Government offices. Impeachment action desirable to stop wasteful spending of American lives and money and to stop goofy Government.

Harry had his inning. See that Mac gets to bat.

When an ex-National Guard captain fires a 5-star general impeachment of the National Guard captain is in order.

Truman has again proven his inability to think clearly or act wisely. Unless he is removed from office promptly we are facing a tragic future.

Please register protest to blundering Truman policies in foreign affairs and especially to the MacArthur removal.

MacArthur dismissal is the most disgraceful act in American history.

As our representative in Congress your duty lies in demanding impeachment Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson. The fumbling incompetence of their administration must be removed while we still have a country and a way of life to protect.

So the best general in the world gets fired by the worst President in the world. Nice knowing that we have so many Representatives in Washington that really believe in protecting the American way of life.

The deplorable lack of firm and moral leadership is a national disgrace. Congress must take over that leadership immediately, and if necessary start impeachment proceedings.

Shocking isn't it. A great American like General MacArthur treated so terribly by the little men in high places in Washington.

The men who have fought and died in the Pacific have died in vain. Throw off the British yoke. Restore MacArthur. Oust the State Department crowd. Do it now.

It is my honest belief that the people of the United States are being sold out and American blood is being spilled and will continue to be spilled to satisfy and justify the whims and stubbornness of a man who has repeatedly exhibited his ignorance and incompetence in the highest office in the land.

The action strikes me as being the most drastic of a long series of circumstances leading to eventual complete capitulation to communism by the administration.

You must realize that the latest outrageous act of the President and his cohorts is more than the American people can stomach.

Impeach that stupid President and let's get back to a free country. Also while you are at it run the United Nations back to Switzerland and let's have a free America again.

In view of the many disclosures of decadence within the administration and the petty politicking in the removal of General MacArthur, I respectfully request that you move for the immediate impeachment of President Harry S. Truman and the dismissal from office of Secretary of State Acheson and others of his ilk.

Because General MacArthur dared to be an American he is summarily discharged. We have finally sold out to England and the other Europeans who do not like General MacArthur.

Address of His Holiness Pope Pius XII

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, one of the deepest elements of religious conviction since the beginning of time has been the aspiration of man to exist in a world without war. For many centuries this has been a great hope—in our own country it has become a great necessity. The development of the atomic bomb makes it certain that another world war may mean the end of our planet.

In this connection, I am inserting in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement recently made by His Holiness, Pope Pius XII, in the course of an audience with delegates of the Fourth Congress of the World Movement for World Federal Government, on April 6. Among those present at this audience were two Americans, Paul Shipman Andrews, dean of the School of Law of Syracuse University, and the Reverend Donald Harrington, of New York City, who represented a United States organization which participated in the Congress, the United World Federalists.

As one who has been a consistent supporter of House Concurrent Resolution 64, to strengthen the United Nations, which has been cosponsored by Representative HAYS of Arkansas and Representative JUDD of Minnesota, and who has always regarded the development and strengthening of the United Nations to the point where it can prevent aggression and maintain peace, as an act which accords with my deepest religious convictions, I am proud and happy to learn that the Pope has expressed his support for those who are striving to achieve a federal world government.

The address follows:

We are very appreciative of the deference you have shown us by this visit to the Vatican, and we have pleasure in addressing you members of the World Movement for World Federal Government. We give you cordial greetings of welcome. Our warm interest in the cause of peace in the midst of humanity so grievously tormented is well known to you. We have given frequent proofs of this interest. It is, moreover, inherent in our mission. The maintenance or reestablishment of peace has always been and always will be the object of our constant solicitude. And if, too often, the results have been far from equal to our efforts and our acts, lack of success will never discourage us, so long as peace does not reign in the world. Faithful to the spirit of Christ, the church is striving and working with all her strength; she does this by her precepts and by her exhortations, by her incessant activities, and by ceaseless prayers.

The church is indeed a power for peace, at least where one respects and appreciates at their true value independence and the mission which the church holds from God, in spheres where one does not seek to make her the docile servant of political egoists, and where she is not treated as an enemy.

The church longs for peace, she strives incessantly for peace, and her heart is always with those who, like her, desire peace and devote themselves to it. Also, she knows, and this is her duty, how to discern the true and the false friends of peace.

She desires it, and therefore she applies herself to the promotion of everything which, within the framework of the divine, natural and supernatural order, contributes to the assurance of peace. Your movement, my friends, has the task of creating an effective political order. There is nothing more in keeping with the traditional doctrines of the church, or better adapted to her teaching, as to legitimate and illegitimate war, especially in the present world crisis An organization of this nature must, therefore, be set up, even if only to end the competitive rearming of nations, through which, for decades past, peoples have exhausted their efforts and drained their resources. You, my friends, are of the opinion that, in order to be effective, this world political order should be of a Federal nature. If you understand by this that this order should not be bound to the wheels of some mechanical system, you are again in harmony with the principles of political and social life so firmly laid down and sustained by the church. Indeed, no world organization could exist if it did not harmonize with human relations as a whole and with the normal organic order regulating relations between men and between diverse peoples. Failing this, whatever might be its structure, it would be impossible for this organization to stand up and endure.

For this reason we are convinced that your first care should be to establish solidly and restore these fundamental principles in every national and constitutional, economic and social, cultural and moral sphere.

At the present time in the national and constitutional sphere, the life of nations is everywhere dislocated by the blind worship of the value of majorities. It is the citizen who is the elector. But, as such he is in reality nothing but one of the units, the total of which constitutes a majority or a minority, which the displacement of a few votes or even of a single one would suffice to reverse. Although an elector, he does not count as such, but there is no question as to the place and part he takes in his family and profession.

In the economic and social sphere there is no natural organic unity amongst producers, since quantitative utilitarianism, which is the sole consideration in the matter of cost price, is the only norm determining the places of production and distribution of labor; since it is the question of class which divides men artificially in society, and the standard is no longer that of cooperation within the professional community.

In the cultural and moral domain, individual liberty, freed from all ties, all rules, all objective and social values, is only in reality a devastating anarchy, especially in the education of the young.

Until one has strengthened the universal political organization and placed it on the indispensable basis, there is a risk of it infecting itself with the deadly germs of mechanical unitarianism. We should like to invite those who are thinking of this remedy, for example, to a world parliament, particularly from a federalist point of view, to reflect on this. Otherwise, they would be hand in glove with the forces of destruction, from which our political and social order has already suffered too much; they would only finish by adding one more legal automaton to the many others which threaten to stifle the nations and to reduce man to the state of an inert instrument.

If, therefore, within the meaning of federalism, the future world political organization cannot, under any pretext, allow itself to be caught up into the movement of the unitarian machine, it will not possess effective authority except insofar as it safeguards and favors everywhere the clean life of a healthy human community, of a society all the members of which vie with each other for the good of all humanity.

What a large amount of moral firmness, intelligent foresight and supple adaptation this world authority will have to possess, these being more than ever necessary in critical moments when, in the face of malevolence, people of good will need to be supported by authority. After all our past and present trials, should we dare to say that the resources and methods of the governments and politicians of the day are adequate? In truth, it is impossible to solve the problem of a world political organization without agreeing to leave the beaten track from time to time, without appealing to the experience of history and to a sane social philosophy, and also to a certain intuitiveness of creative imagination.

There, my friends, is a vast field of work, study, and action. You have understood this and looked it squarely in the face; you have the courage to spend yourselves for this cause. We congratulate you. We would express to you our wishes for your entire success and with all our heart we will pray to God to grant you His light and His help in the performance of your task.

If You Want To Practice Real Economy, Then Junk the St. Lawrence Seaway Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the Jackson (Miss.) News, of February 9, 1951, recommends the immediate junking of the proposal to construct the St. Lawrence seaway and power project.

The editorial follows:

THIS PROJECT NEEDS JUNKING

President Truman's renewed pleas for construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project, this time on the basis of defense necessity, should be shelved quickly and decisively by Congress. Even to debate this extravagant, impractical, repeatedly discredited venture would be sheer waste.

In his $71,600,000,000 budget message the President again trotted out this moldy old joker—it's been hanging around since 1895—along with a lot of other costly nonessentials. A few days later, in a letter to the chairman of the St. Lawrence deep sea waterway labor conference in Detroit, Mr. Truman said that "in the present emergency" the project has become urgent.

Furthermore, he added that, because our steel industry must be built up, the seaway was needed to bring in iron ore, not only from Labrador but from Venezuela by a route well protected from enemy submarines. Just how Venezuelan ore would be protected on the long ocean haul to the mouth of the St. Lawrence wasn't made clear.

But what, precisely, is the seaway's urgency from a defense viewpoint? This high-priced water connecting Great Lakes ports with the Atlantic Ocean is ice-bound about 5 months of the year, rendering it useless for long periods.

To transport ocean tonnage to lake ports would require the building of some 50 dams. One enemy bomb that shattered a single lock could tie up the whole system.

A few years ago the expense of this vast spending project was figured at $642,000,000, of which Canada would pay $204,000,000. In 1948, when the seaway was debated in Congress without action, the cost was estimated variously at $750,000,000 to $1,500,000,000. Today's cost would be vastly greater.

And that isn't all. By diverting ocean freight, including iron ore, to the Great Lakes, the seaway would cause untold losses to eastern United States seaports, including Philadelphia. Projected steel plants along the Delaware will require a great deal of that Venezuelan ore the President talked about.

Revival of the St. Lawrence seaway hoax now, when this Nation is faced with defense necessities involving multibillion outlays, is thoroughly inexcusable. Congress should pay no attention to the seaway bills already introduced, and get on with real security needs.

Who Is Cheering the Dismissal of MacArthur?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, a matter of days—4 to be exact—has intervened to give the Nation and the world an opportunity to evaluate the effect of President Truman's startling announcement that General MacArthur had been relieved of his command over American and United Nations forces engaged in bloody war with the Communist aggressors in Korea. There has been no abatement in the fiery protests of outraged citizens across the land despite the address of the President to the Nation which sought to justify the action. These protests have continued, and grown in volume, notwithstanding the fact that few argue the President's authority to act as he did. That is not the issue. The wisdom of his policy is challenged, not his authority.

The protests have come, not from organized groups directed by leaders self-appointed or otherwise. Rather they have come from individual citizens, from "the man on the street," the housewife, the mothers and wives of servicemen, from Americans without regard to creed or politics.

Perhaps, then, it would be significant to note the source of some of the reaction on the other side of the question. Who, if anyone, is applauding the action of the President?

It is now a matter of documented record that first favorable action came from foreign shores. Not on the American battle lines in Korea, to be sure, but from the seats of government in England and France, and most unfortunate of all, from the Lake Success headquarters of the United Nations. Unbiased news reports are the source of word of cheers for the dismissal of MacArthur in London, for instance. There the Socialist

Government of Britain hastened to announce the removal of MacArthur might pave the way for the admission of Red China to Japanese peace treaty discussions, the sacrifice of vital Formosa to our present enemy, the same Red China, and ultimately a seat in the United Nations for that nation. To go further to observe that such a policy would preserve Hong Kong and Chinese trade for the British would not be to depart far from the obvious.

France, even though to a lesser degree, has been reluctant to move too vigorously in the Far East with the hope of preserving in part a crumbling empire in Indochina. To this list, Italy can be added, and for similar reasons.

And the United Nations, embryo hope of ultimate world peace, found less and less interest in the efforts of a brilliant American commander who insisted on winning a war he did not seek and a war he was ordered to prosecute.

But most appalling of all is the cheering from quite another source. It comes from the heart of enemy power. It comes from the Kremlin itself. The Daily Worker, New York newspaper, acknowledged as the mouthpiece of the Moscow line and Joe Stalin himself, brazenly applauded the ousting of MacArthur. "Way paved for peace," the Daily Worker shouted. Peace on Moscow terms, of course, a second Munich so to speak. For the Daily Worker confidently predicted the terms cautiously voiced in London.

The American effort seeks peace, of course, as President Truman repeatedly asserted in his address Wednesday night. But the American people who have already suffered 60,000 casualties in the so-far-undeclared war in Korea do not regard any degree of appeasement with communism as peace. They do not regard the granting of rewards for aggression as any guaranty against future aggression.

Obviously, then, there must be an immediate reexamination of the entire problem of American foreign policy and American military policy. There must be a searching study of the Truman-Acheson foreign policy in which convicted traitor Alger Hiss once played such an important formulating role. For President Truman, in ousting General MacArthur, clearly has made his choice on the side of the Secretary of State, for he has shown he will not turn his back on the man who said he would not turn his back on Alger Hiss.

To the now vital review of American aims in the Far East, and, indeed, throughout the world, the views of one man can offer more substantial guidance than any other single person. That man, of course, is General MacArthur. It should not be necessary to force the Truman-Acheson-State Department clique to cooperate in making his views available. It should not be necessary to force reluctant administration leaders to invite MacArthur to appear before a joint session of the Congress at the earliest possible moment to give his countrymen the benefit of his views and experience. Those views should be sought voluntarily, immediately, and in justice to 200,000 American troops left behind to carry on a struggle bogged down not in the mud of Korea but in the bureaucracy of Washington.

It is only natural that much of the present demand for action should come from those who regard General MacArthur as one of the greatest military leaders of all time. Even those who ousted him concede the general's stature in the field of his life-long service. But the more important point has best been stressed by a distinguished colleague qualified to speak by background, experience, and intimate knowledge of the far-eastern problem. Representative WALTER H. JUDD, of Minnesota, after the news of the President's action, had this to say:

My concern is not for General MacArthur. He is a giant whom the pygmies cannot tolerate because he has been so consistently right about Asia and they so consistently wrong. His place in history is secure. It will vindicate him and condemn his opponents who threw away in five short years the magnificent victory in the Pacific which he and 4,000,000 Americans won at such great cost—108,000 of them with their lives.

My concern is for the peace and security of the United States.

Few people seem to realize the completely unique position of prestige and confidence which General MacArthur commanded in Asia, and especially in Japan. His removal is likely to open the way for the Communists to chip away and destroy the faith of the Japanese people in us and in the United Nations. If that happens, then a settlement in Korea will not end the war, it will just move from Korea to Japan. If we abandon Formosa in a futile effort to buy the Reds off, we do not end the struggle; we simply shift it from Formosa to the Philippines. And if we let the Philippines and Japan go, "in order to avoid war with Communist China," do we solve the problem? No. We just move the conflict to Alaska and Hawaii. And if we sell them out "in order to get peace," we do not avoid world war III; we just make certain much of it will be fought in the northwestern States of our own country. You have to stop this glacier somewhere. We did not stop it at the 50-yard line at the end of the last war. Instead we moved back to our 40-yard line and invited the Russians to take Eastern Europe, Manchuria, North Korea, and the strategically placed islands north of Japan. Now we are down to about our 30-yard line due to the idiotic attempt to make the Chinese Communists our friends by walking out on our Chinese allies. Now it is proposed, in line with British ideas, to move back to the 20-yard line—the move MacArthur opposed so strenuously. Just where are we to stop retreating? At our 10-yard line when only Europe remains? Or the 5-yard line when only the Western Hemisphere remains? Or the 1-yard line when only the interior of the United States remains?

I do not want to have to fight at the last ditch for the sheer survival of the United States; that is, the real issue: not the fate of MacArthur, but of ourselves.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of the facts, as we know them to exist now, it is impossible for the Nation to feel any measure of security in the words of President Truman as he sought to justify his willful and precipitate action. None will doubt his sincerity as he said the war in Korea is "a struggle for peace," but a careful study of his address gives rise to the conviction that though he hopes truly to avoid a general war in Asia, he has no real plan for the attainment of that goal.

The President quoted from intelligence documents revealing the Communists regard the United States as the only obstacle in the road for the "liberation"—Communist term for conquest—of all the countries in Southeast Asia. One of the documents asserted the Communists must "unify the people of Asia and crush the United States."

Commenting on this, the Washington Star, not an antiadministration newspaper, observed editorially:

Does Mr. Truman believe that these reports accurately reflect the Communist aims in Asia? Presumably so, for otherwise he would not have put them before the American people. But if he does believe them, if he believes that the real objective of the Communists is the conquest of Asia and the destruction of the United States, then he believes what General MacArthur believes, and what the general has been saying ever since the fighting began.

In the light of these Communist objectives, what justification is there for the hope that our enemies will agree to any settlement in Korea that will bring peace and an end to aggression in Asia? Is it not more reasonable to believe that General MacArthur is right—that the Communists have launched their bid for world domination of Asia, that they will not enter into any decent settlement in which we can have the slightest confidence, and that we have no rational choice except to take up the challenge and meet force with superior force? No doubt it was done unwittingly, but Mr. Truman has made himself a persuasive witness in support of the MacArthur thesis.

Mr. Truman's plan, if he can be said to have a plan, was summed up in this paragraph: "If the Communist authorities realize that they cannot defeat us in Korea, if they realize it would be foolhardy to widen the conflict beyond Korea, then they may recognize the folly of continuing their aggression. A peaceful settlement may then be possible."

"If" this and "may" that. A something-may-turn-up strategy in which the wish is father to the thought. What kind of a basis is that for the conduct of a bloody, bitter war which has cost the United States nearly 60,000 casualties and which will cost us thousands more? Is it right to send men out to fight and die in a war which depends for its objective on nothing more than a flimsy hope that somehow the Communists, who have betrayed every promise that they have ever made, will be induced to sit down and make a trustworthy settlement forsaking all of their self-proclaimed ambitions?

Hope may spring eternally, but it does not win wars. The more one weighs the President's remarks, the stronger becomes the conviction that we are simply deluding ourselves if we believe that the war in Korea can be won and peace restored to Asia by anything less than the maximum effort of which we are capable.

Mr. Speaker, out of indignation of Americans generally must come a new determination to examine the facts, to weigh the issues, and to formulate a policy which has for its goal the security of the United States. For only the security of the United States will preserve the hope of ultimate freedom for men and for nations. To that task General MacArthur may yet make his greatest contribution toward the preservation of his country. The hour is late, but not too late for a people united in purpose and strengthened in faith. General MacArthur has the capacity to crystallize that purpose and restore that faith.

The MacArthur Affair

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial which appeared in the Parkersburg Sentinel, Farkersburg, W. Va., April 11, 1951:

THE MACARTHUR AFFAIR

The angry storm of debate, criticism, and resentment which broke over the head of President Truman today as a result of his dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur will, it is safe to predict, overshadow any other single issue to date in his administration. The lines in Washington are going to be drawn largely along political boundaries, with Republicans hailing MacArthur as the savior of the West and Democrats expressing regret that he is such a devil. Neither description is true.

The confidence and trust which people in these United States repose in Gen. Douglas MacArthur—despite past criticisms—cannot be gainsaid. The course which he advocated in fighting communism in the Far East, in general, and Korea in particular, is the course which, we believe, the bulk of the American people would wish the administration to follow—and damn the Russian torpedoes.

MacArthur's great experience in the East, and his confidence in the policy he advocated carry tremendous weight in this country. Putting it briefly, General MacArthur wanted more troops and arms for an all-out war against communism, including hitting China proper and including the use of Japanese and Chinese Nationalist forces.

We agree—but the administration does not, and the President is General MacArthur's Commander in Chief, as he is ours. We believe that public pressure eventually would have forced a change in administration policy, but we must also remember that policy is formulated largely on the advice of our Joint Chiefs of Staff, who know our military capacities at this hour. It also should be remembered that the joint chiefs include men fully as able as Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

It is true, also, that there are sometimes many considerations—of which the public is not and cannot be aware—taken into account by the administration in formulating foreign diplomatic and military policy.

In spite of all this, the emotions of the people generally are going to figure largely in the debate over General MacArthur's dismissal. Yet there are certain incontrovertible facts, which lead us to believe that MacArthur's ego convinced him that he was so big a man the administration would not dare to dismiss him no matter how flagrantly he disregarded instructions. Even President Roosevelt, noted for his handling of men and for his inflexible insistence on discipline, complained about MacArthur's pronounced tendency to set his own judgment above all other considerations.

It is a fact which cannot be disputed that on December 6, 1950, the Joint Chiefs of Staff instructed all military and civilian bigwigs "to refrain from direct communication on military or foreign policy with newspapers, magazines, or other publicity media in the United States." This was clearly designed to prevent long-distance debates between military commanders and Washington, and between high Government officials and the administration. It also clearly implied that differences of opinion should be ironed out within the administration.

On top of that, MacArthur was informed on March 20 that the President planned to announce that the United Nations was under pressure for a negotiated peace in Korea, and that diplomatic discussions would be sought. In the face of these advices, only 5 days later—March 25—General MacArthur sought to grab the ball and run by offering to arrange a political settlement by meeting with the Chinese Communist commander in Korea. He was rebuked for that, and instructed that the December 6 order must be obeyed. Yet, thereafter a letter dated March 20, written to Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., Republican, Massachusetts, again challenged administration policy and called for all-out war against communism in the Far East.

The manner in which General MacArthur was dismissed rankles even with those who believe that an insubordinate general—no matter how high his position nor how much public favor he holds—should be deposed. It would have been a much more satisfactory solution, we are certain, if General MacArthur had been recalled to Washington—in itself a form of discipline—and given his choice of obeying orders or being dismissed. At least such a method would have satisfied those who have so much confidence in the general.

The conclusion is inescapable, we believe, that while the dismissal of General MacArthur was undeniably justified on the basis of his own considered acts, the manner in which it was brought about was far less than desirable. It is saddening to see the brilliant military career of a great man marred by such an affair, however necessary.

H. R. 1870, for the Protection of the Bald Eagle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1951, I introduced H. R. 1870 for the protection of the bald eagle which is legislation of great merit and which should be passed at once. In fact it was passed by the House in the last session of the Congress but did not receive Senate action due to lack of time. I hope it will be passed by both Houses and approved by the President at an early date.

I have just received a letter from Inez E. Moore, of Valdez, Alaska, urging the passage of this legislation and enclosing a poem entitled "The Bald Eagle," which is of interest in consideration of this important problem. I include the letter and the poem as part of these remarks:

VALDEZ, ALASKA, April 9, 1951.

Hon. HOMER D. ANGELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ANGELL: I see by the Alaska Sportsman where you tried to get a law passed to protect the American Eagle and now that Alaska has raised the bounty to $2.50 on Bald Eagles in Alaska I do hope you will try again to make it a crime to kill them.

I have tried to put into rhyme my feelings in the matter since I mailed a copy to Liberty magazine. I hope they will publish it and perhaps get some of the lawmakers awake to the fact before the bird is entirely exterminated. A copy of the poem is enclosed.

Thank you,

MRS. INEZ E. MOORE.

THE BALD EAGLE

I'm the emblem of Freedom with a price on my head.
No right have I now, my proud wings to spread.
My food I obtain with beak and with claw,
While predacious man is protected by law.

His meat he will get with dogs, traps or guns.
He'll gaff the poor fish when spawning time comes.
He kill off the caribou just for its hide
While a baby fawn starves, cause its mother he spied.

When you look at a dollar—with my wings outspread—
Remember, its two fifty he placed on my head.
Our Congress, almost, a bill did it pass
That would have protected my rights, but alas.

They squabbled and argued on this and on that
So the bill—it was shelved—and let me down FLAT.
When you look at your dollar—do this for me—
Look in their lockers and name what you see—

Moose, Caribou, Deer, and Fish out of season,
Ducks, Geese, and Swan—all without reason.
Then pass a law—"A bounty to pay."
For predacious man, who takes game that way.

Glenn H. Curtiss Memorial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, for many years, I have sponsored a resolution in the House of Representatives providing for the creation of a Curtiss Memorial Commission for the purpose of erection of a suitable monument commemorating the contribution of Glenn Hammond Curtiss in the discovery and development of the art of aviation and commemorating the first sustained kilometer flight and the first seaplane flight in all history.

Recently a communication has been sent me by Miss Joan Lofgren, secretary of the Glenn Curtiss Chapter of the Historical Association of New York State located at Hammondsport, N. Y., in which the pupils of the Hammondsport Central School express their reasons for urging the creation of such a memorial. I am pleased to extend in the RECORD this communication:

HAMMONDSPORT CENTRAL SCHOOL,
Hammondsport, N. Y., April 3, 1951.

Hon. STERLING COLE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are students of the Hammondsport Central School, Hammondsport, N. Y. This year we organized a branch of the Historical Association of New York State.

Hammondsport has a very interesting historical background. We were surprised to discover that no one had started a memorial here for Glenn Curtiss, one of the greatest pioneers in aviation. Glenn Curtiss was born and lived most of his short life here in Hammondsport. Our club's greatest ambition is to have a memorial in honor of Glenn Curtiss.

We visualize in our dreams a small attractive building in his memory. There are tentative plans for building a new school where he had the original hangars for his "infant" planes. We feel that back of our new school would be an ideal place for such a memorial. In this building which would be open to the public, we would put relics, pictures, and information connected with Glenn Curtiss and his achievements.

As young citizens we do not feel ashamed to ask the National Government for help in financing a memorial for so great a man. We feel he did much for our country. He founded the first flying school to which people from all over the world came. Glenn Curtiss had many inventors as friends such as Alexander Graham Bell, Henry Ford, and Harold McCormick. On March 2, 1908, Curtiss made his first little airplane. He flew the one-stop flight along the Hudson from Albany to New York. It was the first flight in the Empire State. In 1909 Curtiss won the James Gordon Bennett trophy in France.

He opened the Curtiss Exhibition Circus and people like Lincoln Beachy, Fred Havens, and Eugene Ely became well known with their daring stunts. When the First World War broke out Curtiss was kept busy making planes for the Government. When Curtiss died many famous men came for his burial. After all of these national achievements we feel that not only his community, but also his country, should have the privilege to honor him.

Respectfully yours,

GLENN CURTISS CHAPTER,
JOAN LOFGREN, Secretary.

What Honorable Men Are Doing in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 12, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, This week the former Governor of Georgia, M. E. Thompson, resigned his job as a consultant with the Office of Price Stabilization because he refused to accept a salary and expense account without working. He was asked to take the position of Codirector for Territories for the OPS at a pay rate of $53.48 per day. This is approximately $15,000 per year. He was listed as a consultant, but nobody bothered to consult him. He had not a single assignment in 12 weeks. So he quit.

In case you think that the Governor did not try very hard to get work, do not. He tried. On February 19, 1951, he told the President what was happening. The President called in his assistant, Mr. Donald Dawson, and ordered him to straighten out the whole mess pronto. It never was done. In resigning Mr. Thompson said:

Under the circumstances I refuse to accept salary and expense money from the taxpayers when I am rendering no public service. I am returning to my home. I refuse to be a parasite on the American taxpayers.

He added one additional thought:

There are thousands upon thousands of others rendering no service, but still on the public payroll, not only in Washington but throughout the United States.

Sweat on, Mr. Taxpayer, sweat on.

National Service Life Insurance Benefits Continued for Future Veterans—Amendment Sponsored in House Adopted—Veterans Gratuitous Indemnity Act Perfected or Improved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOE L. EVINS
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the conferees on H. R. 1 reached agreement on the Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1951 and today this measure has been adopted by both bodies. The work of the conferees in this connection was most creditable and insures that this meritorious proposal shall be made available for men in the service, those later called into the service, and to our future veterans.

It was the source of much gratification to me personally and to many other Members that the conferees saw fit to include in the conference bill the provision to permit future veterans to continue national service life insurance after service in the same manner that veterans heretofore have been permitted to maintain such insurance.

Section 8 of the conference report provides as follows:

Within 120 days after discharge (during which time the veteran is covered by the gratuitous indemnity) he may apply for, without medical examination, a term policy up to $10,000. The premium is to be based upon the 1941 commissioner's standard ordinary table of mortality with interest at 2¼ percent per annum. In the future all NSLI policies will be issued on this table which means greatly reduced premiums but no dividends will be payable, and the only plan on which the insurance will be issued will be on the 5-year level premium term plan.

Mr. Speaker, as we know, the House did not include these provisions in the bill which it passed. There were many members, like myself, who felt that the inclusion of such was most desirable—but the amendment which I was pleased to offer to that effect was turned down by the House. However, it was the source of much gratification that the amendment which I introduced and proposed has been adopted by the conferees and both Houses and is now near final enactment into law. The other features of the bill are excellent and desirable, and I consider that this important legislation has been perfected—certainly greatly improved.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent to have included with my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from debate on H. R. 1 when it was before the House. The excerpts, as presented here, are from the RECORD of January 24, 1951.

The excerpts are as follows:

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. EVINS. I think the gentleman should point out that while there is nothing in this legislation which would impair the right of contract with veterans of World War I and World War II, if part II of the bill is adopted there will be no further issuance of national service life insurance to future veterans.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Except those who are disabled, in accordance with the provision that I have mentioned.

* * * * *

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS].

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are considering here today is substantially the same measure as was reported unanimously by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the closing days of the Eighty-first Congress and passed by unanimous consent on the floor of the House at that time. It has been again favorably reported as was well pointed out. I think in view of the Korean situation it is very important that this constitute a part of the initial legislation of this new Congress. I have supported this measure both in committee and on the floor of the House. It has already been pointed out as to what the bill provides. It provides $10,000 indemnity coverage for all men called into the service. The bill is made retroactive to June 27, 1950, and covers the National Guard men who were killed in the train crash in Ohio last summer, and also the Tennessee guardsmen who were killed in an airplane crash while returning from maneuvers in South Carolina. There are other excellent features of the bill, including the monthly installment payment of $92.90 per month over a period of 10 years. The bill also restricts payments to member of the serviceman's family. The measure exempts the indemnity from claims of creditors and from taxation. All of these features of the bill are meritorious and beneficial and commend it for passage.

However, as has been pointed out, a new policy is injected into the bill with respect to part II of the bill. The position of the American Legion has not been made known heretofore with respect to this legislation. It has been said several times that two or three of the major veterans' organizations favor it, but we have here the testimony of representatives of the American Legion with respect to the measure. In brief, I might quote them as follows:

In testimony before the committee on this bill, T. O. Krable, chairman of the national rehabilitation commission of the American Legion said:

"We cannot be a party to any abridgment of the benefits and provisions that have been made by the Government to both veterans of World War I and World War II. The American Legion strongly urges that provision be made that veterans be permitted to continue their national service life insurance after separation."

Certainly the right of the veteran to obtain national service life insurance should be preserved and the right to existing benefits continued, all considerations of service being taken into account. The American Legion adopted a resolution at Indianapolis on November 19, last, reading, in part, as follows:

"The American Legion reaffirms its stand that national service life insurance and United States Government insurance contracts and trust funds established heretofore should be preserved, and that an opportunity to obtain national service life insurance should be continued for members of the Armed Forces and veterans."

I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk which would permit a man, after being discharged, to apply for national service life insurance if he cares to do so. The argument has been made that such a provision would continue the Government in the insurance business. Let me say that the Government is going to continue in the insurance business for a long time to come, regardless of the action we take here today.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. May I just finish this statement first, and then I will be glad to yield.

The information I have been able to obtain is that only one out of seven ex-servicemen have continued their national service life insurance after discharge. That is, as of now, only 10 percent of the veterans of World War I have continued their national service life insurance, and only 25 percent of the veterans of World War II have continued their insurance. So the number is not great, but those who wish to contract for Government life insurance should be permitted to do so after discharge. My amendment would permit this.

Here are some of the reasons why it should be done: Because it is a right that was given to veterans of World War I and extended to veterans of World War II. But to veterans of the Korean War we would deny them the right to have national service life insurance. Those men who are fighting today will probably be 2, 5, or 10 years older after the war, by which time the commercial insurance rates for them will have been enhanced. We do not know how long the emergency will continue. Commercial rates to some of our veterans might have become prohibitive by the end of the emergency and during the time they are in service. Disabilities might have been incurred which, although not recognized by the Veterans' Administration, might be recognized by commercial insurance companies, and a veteran thereby might be denied the right to take out insurance after discharge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS] has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. EVINS. I am wholeheartedly and strongly in favor of the automatic coverage feature of this bill and am, of course, supporting the legislation, but I feel my amendment would improve and perfect the legislation by permitting the continuance of national service life insurance after discharge. Let us not say in effect to our future veteran that "After you are released from the service we will forget all about your service;" but rather let us say that a grateful Nation appreciates the service and sacrifice of our men of arms. Let us say that America will not forget. Let us perfect this legislation and let us pass it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman has mentioned certain coverage. Would it cover a case of this kind? A plane from the Philippines to Okinawa went into the mountains on December 19. The plane went down and some Army personnel were killed. Would this bill cover a case of that kind?

Mr. EVINS. If the accident occurred after June 27, 1950, and if it were incident to call or maneuvers it would cover such an accident.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman four additional minutes.

Mr. EVINS. I thank the gentlewoman. I hope that the amendment which will be offered later may have the favorable consideration of the House.

The argument was made, as was pointed out, that this bill will take the Veterans' Administration out of the insurance business. May I say that it is going to be necessary for the Government to continue in the insurance business for the next 50 years because of existing contracts.

It has been further insisted that the bill will effect a savings in manpower. To the extent that the measure does so, I applaud the action taken. However, the manpower requirements of the bill will take effect largely after the war is over and history and experience of veterans' insurance show that only about one out of seven ex-service men continue their insurance and the manpower argument is not persuasive. As I say, I hope the amendment will be agreed to. If it is not adopted here, I feel sure I can predict that it will be adopted in the other body.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. In World Wars I and II men had no coverage unless they paid for it. Is not that correct?

Mr. EVINS. That is quite true.

Mr. MORTON. So the enlisted man gets the benefit of this indemnity even though he is not permitted under the terms of the bill before us to get in on the national service life insurance program.

Mr. EVINS. Not on the national life insurance program for that is, in effect, discontinued, but he is given war service insurance coverage. After serving a period of four, five, or more years, and after discharge the veteran may find the commercial insurance rates so high as to be prohibitive.

Mr. MORTON. We can deal with that when that question comes up.

Mr. EVINS. The gentleman has pointed to the crux of this bill, the question of insurance coverage after a man has been honorably discharged and released from the service. Our future veterans should be entitled to apply for national service life insurance on the same basis as veterans of World Wars I and II.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. May I inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether he has submitted this amendment to the committee and whether it was considered there? And, if so, what was the result?

Mr. EVINS. This amendment was not considered by the committee. The bill was reported out the first day that the committee met when the committee was organized, and the amendment was not considered. But I will say to the gentleman that it has had very careful consideration in its draftsmanship.

Mr. RANKIN. Why does not the gentleman from Tennessee tell the House that he did not bring this amendment before the committee, and that he seconded the motion to report the bill out as it is?

Mr. EVINS. I not only seconded the motion to report the bill, but I have consistently supported this measure. I think the bill is a good bill, but that we could improve upon it by adoption of the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. RANKIN. Another point I would like to make for the benefit of the Members is that in previous wars the serviceman did not have the benefit of this automatic insurance.

Mr. EVINS. I may say to the gentleman that representatives of the American Legion not only made Legion position clear in testimony before the subcommittee but also sent to me a statement of its position on this issue and this statement was passed around by me to members of the committee but was not acted upon.

What action we take here today may well determine the economic security of untold thousands of families of veterans in the future.

* * * * *

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amendment offered by Mr. EVINS: Strike out all of part II and substitute the following:

" 'PART II—ISSUANCE OF NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

" 'SEC. 10. Section 602 (c) of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, is hereby amended by adding the following new paragraph:

" ' "(4) Any person who has had active service on and after June 27, 1950, and prior to the termination of the present emergency, as proclaimed by the President, shall be granted national service life insurance upon application therefor in writing after discharge or release from such active service and upon payment of premiums and evidence satisfactory to the Administrator showing such person to be in good health at the time of such application: Provided, That in any case in which such application is made within 5 years after discharge or release from active service the Administrator shall not deny for the purposes of this paragraph that the applicant is in good health because of any disability or disabilities for which compensation would be payable if 10 percent or more in degree, and waiver of premiums under section 602 (n) shall not be denied in any case under this paragraph on the ground that total service-connected disability commenced prior to the effective date of such insurance: And provided further, That in any case in which insurance is granted by reason of the preceding proviso the premium paid on such insurance shall be credited directly to the national service life insurance appropriations, and any payments of benefits on such insurance shall be made directly from such appropriations."

" 'SEC. 11. This part may be cited as the "Insurance Act of 1951." ' "

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, this is a simple amendment. May I say that I have had the assistance of the Legislative Drafting Service, of the general counsel's office of the Veterans' Administration, and of the officials of the various veterans' organizations with respect to the language in this amendment. So it has been carefully prepared. It provides simply in substance that an honorably discharged veteran after the present hostilities may make application for and where qualified and on the same basis be granted national service life insurance as veterans of World War I and World War II. All this amendment does is give to future veterans the opportunity to acquire national service life insurance. We know that there will not be the great administrative cost of the insurance program during any future war under terms of this bill. The amendment which I propose would permit those who desire to contract for Government insurance after discharge the right to do so. We have already pointed out that the percentage of veterans who acquired insurance after discharge has, in the past, been limited in number, but those veterans who do desire to obtain veterans' insurance should be permitted to do so. My amendment provides for equity among veterans. It is a continuation of benefits that have already been provided. It is not a retraction, it is not a retrenchment and cutting back. My amendment would preserve benefits for future veterans which are presently existing in law.

I hope the amendment may be favorably considered by the House.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, of course this amendment would merely kill the bill.

Mr. EVINS. I disagree with the gentleman.

* * * * *

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. EVINS. The gentleman spoke of additional benefits. All we are going to do is to preserve and save the present benefits; not to cut back.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Let me answer that by saying this: That when we give increased and improved benefits to veterans of each succeeding war of this country, does the gentleman feel that there is an obligation, in addition to those improved benefits, to add thereto any benefits that any veteran has ever had in the history of the United States? I think that is about what the position of the gentleman amounts to.

* * * * *

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Chairman, the indemnity provisions of H. R. 1 are certainly sound and desirable, but there should be added to this bill the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which amendment would give to the veterans now in service the same opportunities to acquire national service life insurance that were given to those of us who served in World War II.

Truman Is Right

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the important factor in the Truman-MacArthur controversy centers around the determination of our American foreign policy. No military commander, no matter how brilliant he may be, shall have the right under the Constitution to assume the authority of determining our foreign policy.

General MacArthur, in assuming such authority, has created great danger to this country. Those who, like the Republican leaders, have encouraged him in his course for political reasons, should be made to understand that they are playing with fire and are subverting the safety of the country to their own sordid political end. Our ship of state cannot be guided by two men at the same time without endangering the ship.

The President had no choice but to recall General MacArthur, and in due course, the sober sense of the American people will prevail. The present intense emotional clamor will die down. The more intense the feeling the more quickly it is expended.

The President stated the aims of our Government effectively and with due solemnity when he appeared on television and radio this past Wednesday evening. Our policy is to thwart aggression in Korea and wherever else it raises its ugly head, in association with the members of the United Nations. We must act in concert with these nations. We dare not isolate ourselves. We will not go beyond Korea unless Communist China and Communist Russia force us to do so. By bombing Chinese bases and following the MacArthur suggestions we would be in a world war up to our necks. The American people do not want this, and the President has gaged properly the fundamental American viewpoint. If the Communists want world war, so be it. We have no choice. But the awful responsibility will be on them.

Under the Constitution, the President is Commander in Chief. General MacArthur disobeyed not only instructions given by the Commander in Chief, but he also disobeyed instructions of his other superior, Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. General MacArthur's course was also opposed by Admiral Forrest Sherman, Chief of Naval Operations. Admiral Sherman argued that we could not afford to get involved in a war with Communist China and that if we followed General MacArthur's insistence upon bombing Chinese bases, we would do so. Gen. Hoyt Vandenberg of the Air Forces, and Gen. Joe Collins, Army Chief of Staff, concurred in this view.

The War Department—

Remarked General Eisenhower before the Congress in 1947—understands its place in this Government and does not try to usurp anybody else's place. We are an executive agency. We recognize where the policy-making responsibility lies, and no matter what is done, we will be in there pitching to carry out exactly what we are told to do.

General MacArthur has failed to carry out the orders of the policy-making branch of the Government. General MacArthur is a strict disciplinarian. He would not tolerate any disobedience from any officer under him.

This is not the first time in our history that the civilian authority was compelled to crack down on the military when the latter sought to bypass its authority. President Lincoln did exactly what President Truman did when he relieved Gen. George B. McClellan of his command. McClellan was a brilliant soldier and the darling of his day with a large part of the public. McClellan's intransigeance and his bypassing of the White House in bidding for public support, caused the end of his military career. President Wilson was compelled to discourage in forceful manner the disobedience of Gen. Leonard Wood.

If General MacArthur differed with the over-all policy of the Government and wished emphatically to protest, his course was plain. He should have resigned his command and his commission, and as an ordinary citizen he could have vigorously fought his cause. But he chose to do this in uniform. That he could not do in our governmental structure.

I approve of the President's course, and I do this despite the past attainments and rare ability of General MacArthur.

Christian Churches Uphold MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I want to include the resolution passed by the National Association of Evangelicals in its convention in Chicago, Ill., on April 11, 1951, expressing admiration of General MacArthur's Christian character and personal integrity and calling for an immediate investigation of all circumstances attendant upon his recall:

Resolution passed by the special assembly of the National Association of Evangelicals called to consider the crisis facing the Nation:

"Inasmuch as Gen. Douglas MacArthur has opened the door and encouraged and welcomed Christian missionaries to Japan and the Far East; and

"Inasmuch as his Christian testimony has always been courageously given and his opposition to communism widely known; and

"Inasmuch as his position has made him one of the greatest foes to communism and friend of democracy or the American way of life; now

"In the light of his being relieved of his commands, we the National Association of Evangelicals desire to go on record expressing our confidence in the General and therefore be it:

"Resolved, That we send to General MacArthur this expression of our confidence and admiration of his Christian character and personal integrity, our appreciation of his devotion to the principles of Christian liberty, especially religious freedom during his term of duty as general in charge of the Army in the Far East, as general in charge of the occupation forces in Japan, and as general in charge of the United Nations forces in Korea, and assuring him of our prayers; be it further

"Resolved, That we now call upon all Christians within these shores and abroad to get upon their knees in prayer to the end that this Nation might be preserved in liberty and God be truly honored."

Resolution presented by special committee and unanimously passed by the general assembly of the National Association of Evangelicals, Chicago, Ill.:

"Whereas Gen. Douglas MacArthur has demonstrated irreproachable personal integrity in contrast with the lack of integrity and widespread corruption and graft in high places, and whereas General MacArthur has demonstrated his understanding and insight of communism by firm and unrelenting opposition to its extension, while others in high places have displayed their lack of understanding by their record of appeasement and failure to oppose Communist aggression, and whereas General MacArthur has proved in a decade his wise and able leadership both in war and reconstructive peace in a time when the American international policy has been vacillating, impotent, and culpable; and

"Whereas the national confusion and uncertainty growing out of General MacArthur's removal from command in the Orient, coupled with the lack of a stable and well-developed foreign policy, has resulted in immeasurable bewilderment: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the National Association of Evangelicals, representing 33 denominations and a service constituency of more than 10,000,000 Evangelical Protestants, declare in view of these basic facts, that we confidently leave with God and with the judgment of history the complete vindication of this great man; and further be it

"Resolved, That we call the American people to a national day of humiliation and prayer for divine guidance in this critical hour of national affairs, and that we call upon every pastor to set apart a portion of the morning service on Sunday, April 15, for special intercession for Government and Nation; and further be it

"Resolved, That, without implying our competence to judge the technicalities of this case, we appreciate the example of Christian citizenship and moral and spiritual alertness provided by General MacArthur in a period of national duress, and further, that we deplore the alarmist tactics of many of our present national leaders, which might easily plunge us into a third world war, and caution against the employment of the sense of urgency for purposes of political expedience."

A second and stronger resolution arising from popular demand unanimously passed by the general assembly, following the adoption of the above resolution:

"Moved, seconded, and unanimously carried that we call upon the Congress of the United States to undertake an immediate investigation of all the circumstances attendant upon the recall of Gen. Douglas MacArthur from his commands and take appropriate action."

Truman Versus MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 11, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the text of a telegram outlining my position on the Truman-MacArthur controversy, which my hometown newspaper, the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, had asked me to submit:

HAROLD HARRIS,
Brooklyn Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.:

While General MacArthur's departure as Far Eastern Commander has momentarily aroused a national controversy I feel history will eventually vindicate President Truman for the step he has taken. It is worth remembering it was done after deliberation and consultation with top governmental and military leaders. At stake here is not the fate of an individual, no matter how great or important, but the fate and future of the American people and of all western civilization. By continually thwarting the policies of the United States and the United Nations, MacArthur breached discipline to an extent which threatened to embroil the whole world in a new and most destructive conflagration, namely, a third world war which we are desperately trying to avoid. At the same time, the President was faced with the surrender of his policy-making functions as established by the Constitution. Civil authority had to be reestablished for the continuation of our democratic process, otherwise we would have drifted into military dictatorship. Let us not forget the example in Rome when the greatest and most powerful republic in ancient times came under the domination of popular military heroes who seized control and ended the republic forever. It is to the credit of the founders of our Republic who, in drafting the Constitution, were cognizant of Roman history and wisely entrusted supreme power to the civilian government over the military in our country. Hence the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of all our Armed Forces and the military authorities are subordinate to him. General Eisenhower made a very striking observation, saying "When you put on a uniform there are certain inhibitions you accept." In a democracy such as ours unruly generals are as such outmoded as indispensable men.

Congressman LOUIS B. HELLER.

Removal of General MacArthur a Severe Loss in the Fight To Prevent the Spread of Communism in Japan and the Entire Orient

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, April 13, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, an article in today's issue of the News, Washington, D. C., by Oland D. Russell, Scripps-Howard staff writer, points out forcibly and logically the disastrous effect that may result from the withdrawal of General MacArthur in the fight to prevent the spread of communism in Japan and other countries of Asia. I include it as part of my remarks in accordance with the unanimous consent granted by the House.

It reads as follows:

MACARTHUR WAS WORTH 10 DIVISIONS
(By Oland D. Russell)

Observers here familiar with the Far East are seriously disturbed by one aspect of Gen. Douglas MacArthur's dismissal that so far has got scant attention.

It is the fact that, in the eyes of 80,000,000 Japanese and many other orientals not yet behind the iron curtain, he will be irreplaceable as the symbol and outstanding proponent of resistance to Red aggression.

The able Lt. Gen. Matthew Ridgway in time may meet the expectations of his supporters as an over-all commander, administration, and occupation chief. But he can scarcely hope to reach the eminence of General MacArthur or his incomparable influence and hold on popular imagination of the Japanese and other free orientals.

To General MacArthur communism has long been the biggest threat to the postwar world, and he has been convinced that there is no mission more important than meeting this challenge—in Asia. This has been the underlying precept of his occupation policies as he sought to turn Japan into a democratic nation which of its own accord would resist communism.
